28. Sixty days' notice must be given by the purchaser, through the local land office, to the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the proposed date of cutting and removal of the timber, so that an official may be designated to supervise such cutting and removal, as required by the law. Upon application of purchasers, permits to erect temporary sawmills for the purpose of cutting or manufacturing timber purchased under this act may be granted by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, if not incompatible with the public interests. Instructions as to disposition of tops, brush, and refuse, to be given through the supervisors in each case, must be strictly complied with, as a condition of said cutting and manufacture.

29. The act provides that the timber sold shall be used in the State or Territory in which the reservation is situated, and is not to be exported therefrom. Where a reservation lies in more than one State or Territory, this requires that the timber shall be used in the State or Territory where cut.

30. Receivers of public moneys will issue receipts in duplicate for moneys received in payment for timber, one of which will be given the purchaser, and the other will be transmitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office in a special letter, reference being made to the letter from the Commissioner authorizing the sale, by date and initial, and with title of case as therein named. Receivers will deposit to the credit of the United States all such moneys received, specifying that the same are on account of sales of public timber on forest reservations under the act of June 4, 1897. A separate monthly account-current (form 4-135) and quarterly condensed account (form 4-104) will be made to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with a statement in relation to the receipts under the act as above specified.

31. Special instructions will be issued for the guidance of officials designated to examine and appraise timber, to supervise its cutting and removal, and for carrying out other requirements connected therewith.

BINGER HERMANN, Commissioner.

Approved June 30, 1897.

C. N. BLISS, Secretary.

Mr. CARTER. If we had continued to cooperate with the Secretary, I think beneficial results would have followed, but we suspended the reservations. The surveys have been prosecuted with woeful tardiness. Persons on the reservations are now at a loss to know what their rights are or are destined to be in the future. They are, so to speak, in limbo. They are where Mohammed's coffin was alleged to be.

The practical question to-day is, What shall we do in the future? I believe that the suggestion made by the Senator from Washington has much virtue, that the Geological Survey as an agency for the survey of the parts of these reservations to be excluded should be discarded and that the Interior Department should be authorized to employ a force of people sufficient in number and possessed of the capacity and intelligence, in the States where their reservations are located, to designate the parts of the reservations that are to be excluded.

With the understanding that that policy would be pursued vigorously and persistently and supported by the Appropriations Committee with an adequate sum of money from year to year, I would be prepared this morning to vote to sustain the report of the conference committee rather than to embark again upon the apparently hopeless task of securing a result by and through the surveys to be made by the Geological Survey.

Mr. WILSON. May I interrupt the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. The policy of which the Senator from Montana has just expressed his approval is the one which the Secretary of the Interior himself has approved and is eager and anxious to carry into force and effect. He has said to me within twenty-four hours that as soon as he can be provided with the adequate means he proposes to proceed vigorously and earnestly to cut down or eliminate portions of the reservations where forestry orders had been made and were not necessary.

Mr. CARTER. The only objection which I understand the Senator from Washington to have is that the amount now appropriated is inadequate.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator will see that the amount recommended by the House was cut down by the Appropriations Committee to $50,000 and then restored to $75,000. If the Geological Survey had $150,000 to make the surveys, it will be seen that the sum we now have will be entirely inadequate for this great work over 23,000,000 acres. We have got to have axmen; we have got to have men to clear up dead and burned timber, men to sell the timber for what it is worth; we have got to have inspectors; we have got to have men to put out the fires and to ascertain what portions can be excluded. There is a vast amount of work. The point I make is that we are not receiving for a great work of this character an adequate appropriation.

If the Geological Survey could have $150,000 in order to send out men to make the mere surveys, to take the areas and the amount of standing timber in one year, what can we do with $75,000? It is absurd. It is ridiculous. The point I want to impress upon the Senate for one moment, if the Senator will pardon me, is that now that they have undertaken to take charge of our property, so to speak, now that they have undertaken to control and dominate these forestry reservations, they must be prepared to make the appropriation now and in the future. It will cost no small sum. It will cost a great deal of money to fix this thing in the way they have started, and they must be prepared to meet it without begging and pleading every year.

Mr. CARTER. I am inclined to think that the chairman of the committee would do us good service by informing us at this time whether the appropriation for the inspection of these lands by the residents of the States appointed for the purpose, looking to the exclusion of portions that ought not to be included, can not be increased so as to make the amount measurably adequate for the work to be performed this year.

Mr. ALLISON. I know of no way to increase it except—

Mr. HALE. On the next appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLISON. On the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. There could be an additional appropriation on that measure, but it is impossible to do anything with it on this bill at the present time.

Mr. CARTER. I understand that to be true.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I observe that the provision as it passed through the House provided the sum of $75,000 and the Senate changed it to $50,000. I suggest to the Senator whether or not it is possible for the conferees on the part of the Senate to recede and accept the sum put in by the House.

Mr. ALLISON. We have done so.

Mr. WILSON. That has been done.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It does not appear in the copy of the bill I have. I did not know it had been done.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Washington that I think there will be no serious difficulty in providing whatever sum is necessary. The House put in the estimate of the Secretary and the Senate finally adopted that, and I do not think there will be any trouble in getting an additional appropriation on the deficiency bill for some proper sum.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know what a proper sum would be.

Mr. ALLISON. I confess I do not.

Mr. WILSON. It is all new business, and we do not want a dollar that is unnecessary, but we want the future provided for with what is necessary.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the Secretary of the Interior can perhaps propose an additional sum, and I will say to the Senator we can probably put on the deficiency bill an additional sum, and next year we can do what we have always done hitherto—if we find the amount wholly inadequate, deal with it next winter. I hope, in view of that fact, that Senators will allow the report to be voted upon now.

Mr. CARTER. Personally I believe that the underlying idea connected with the forest-reservation system is correct. I believe that the large lumber companies which are cutting trees and sawing them into lumber and selling the lumber in the open market should pay for the trees the reasonable stumpage value. I think the large mining companies using forests of timber each and every year should pay what the trees are reasonably worth on the stump. I do not know of a single mining company or a single sawmill company engaged in business in the State of Montana averse to doing this. This is particularly true in case the proceeds of sales of timber and such additional amount as may be necessary shall be used to protect the remaining timber from the ravages of fire.

Indeed, the companies are anxious to pay what they consider the timber reasonably worth, or what it may be appraised for by disinterested persons. They would prefer to pay the reasonable value rather than to be prosecuted as criminals or be brought up in actions of trespass to respond in damages from time to time. This bill as amended—and I have requested that the amendment be incorporated in my remarks—provides that the actual settler and the individual miner shall not be charged anything for the timber he may need. We are therefore reduced, in the matter of procedure, to the lines indicated by the chairman of the committee and the Senator from Washington, which I understand would be entirely satisfactory to my colleague and the Senator from South Dakota if we could have the assurance, first, that a reasonable amount would from year to year be appropriated, and, second, that the work of surveying and excluding the undesirable portions of the forest reservations would be continued under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior by residents of the respective States directly interested, in conformity with the idea expressed by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. MANTLE. If my colleague will permit me to interject a remark here—and that the appointments of persons to do this work shall be made from residents of the State in which the reservations are located.

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. MANTLE. Practically putting the matter back within the control of the people of the States, where it rightfully belongs.

Mr. WILSON. That is the intention.

Mr. CANNON rose.

Mr. CARTER. There is still another point to which I desire to direct the attention of the Appropriations Committee, if the Senator from Utah will indulge me for one moment, unless he desires particularly to interrupt me at this time.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to propound an inquiry to the Senator relating to the matter just passed.

Mr. CARTER. I yield.

Mr. CANNON. Do I understand the Senator from Montana to say that under certain circumstances and agreements he would be willing to yield and to accept the conference report?

Mr. CARTER. I have stated that with the understanding expressed by the Senator from Washington, that the Secretary of the Interior would appoint surveyors and other persons, resident in the States, to survey, and exclude from the reservations those portions of the country included which should not be included, and that we would likewise make due appropriations for the purpose of protecting the forests against fire, as contemplated by the law, the appropriation being sufficient in amount to justify the belief that the work would be promptly done, and further, that the work of extinguishing the fires would be continued, I think it would be well to accept the conference report.

Mr. CANNON. If I may be permitted, I call the attention of the Senator from Montana to the fact that the salient element has been left out of consideration. Will the Secretary of the Interior or any other authorized representative of the Administration here ratify that understanding? It might be very well for those who are contesting these forest reservations to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Montana were there any assurance that that would be the policy to be pursued, but there has been nothing to characterize the handling of this question by the Administration up to the present time to justify the hope that such would be the policy.

Mr. CARTER. I think I can assure the Senator from Utah that the President of the United States will at any time promptly and willingly issue an order excluding from a forest reservation any section of country which the Secretary of the Interior reports to him should be excluded.

Again, the Senator from Washington, who has discussed this matter quite recently with the Secretary of the Interior, has given the Senate the assurance, and I believe he has given it with ample authority, that the Secretary of the Interior will proceed to appoint competent persons, residents of the respective States, to examine the forest reservations, make needful surveys, and make reports of their observations and surveys to the Secretary, and that he will thereupon cause the proper orders of exclusion to be prepared and forwarded to the President for signature.

There is another feature to which I desire to direct the attention of the Committee on Appropriations. It is needless to undertake to continue these reservations in force so long as the continuance of the reservation results in the impounding of private property or in keeping individuals within restricted reservation limits. Each one of the States affected has large grants of land for school and other purposes. I know that the State of Montana has a goodly portion of its university lands located within one of these forest reservations. Owing to the isolated character of the tracts with reference to the country round about, this land will be of little value for sale, and the timber is not at present accessible and probably will not be for a long time to come in view of the establishment of the forest reservations.

Now, it is but just and fair that the State should be permitted to go without the limits of the forest reservations and select indemnity lands for the granted lands included within the reservations. The same holds good with reference to sections 16 and 36, the sections set apart for the common-school fund. The same holds good with reference to other grants of land within the limit of these reservations made by the General Government to others than the States.

I feel that the committee, through the deficiency bill, in making the appropriation for the continuance of the forest-reservation inspection and survey should likewise provide that the respective States and all grantees of lands having rights within the proposed reservations as finally determined should be permitted to go outside and select indemnity lands. Then you will have a reservation in each case where the United States will be the sole and exclusive owner. No private individual will be herded within the reservation by an imaginary line nor will private property be taken from individuals by the indirect course of creating a forest reservation including such private property.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator from Montana that in the State of Washington we have already selected 155,000 acres of land within these forest reservations that were granted to us for State purposes, and they are, of course, blocked up, as the Senator very properly stated. I think all are in the same condition.

Mr. CARTER. The amendment to which I have just called attention—and the Senator from Washington offers a very pertinent observation in connection with it—appeared in the sundry civil bill, but was excluded, I believe, by agreement in conference.

Mr. ALLISON. It was a part of the amendment which the Senate placed upon the bill, and I will say to the Senator from Montana that the House conferees argued with great force that all these matters were within the scope of the Committee on Public Lands, and that this legislation, because it does require legislation, should be taken up by that committee in this House and in the other and that it should not be dealt with on an appropriation bill and by a committee which necessarily is not so familiar with all these details.

In conversation with the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands of the House on these questions we were told that the matter was now under investigation in that committee; and I submit to Senators that these matters of pure legislation ought to be prepared with care by the Committee on Public Lands and presented to us early next session. There is no difficulty in passing this important legislation through both Houses.

The Committee on Appropriations received, as to the provision inserted here, a number of letters in the form of protests, saying it would be unjust to allow, for instance, as to the school sections, sections 16 and 36, the State of Washington to go into the State of California and take up unoccupied land in that State, and that if the provision as we had inserted it in the bill should prevail, the effect would be that all the States having these reservations and having school and other lands segregated and used for educational or other purposes of the State would fight down upon the other States having public lands and in that way do an injustice there.

So it seems to me that instead of undertaking to legislate upon the subject now, we should appropriate, if need be, a sufficient sum—and I am sure we will all aid the Senators in making the appropriation—but allow the legislation as respects this matter to go over until next winter, and during the vacation let some one or some member of the Committee on Public Lands, or some subcommittee of that committee, take up the question and deal with it comprehensively. I suggest that course to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CARTER. I beg to indulge the hope that the forest-reservation matter may be relegated to a state of repose by legislation at this session of Congress under such terms and conditions as will result in a complete and satisfactory solution of the unfortunate problems which have confronted us at each session of Congress for some time past. I submit that this felicitous result can not be hoped for if it is proposed in the very bill of repose to incorporate private property within public reservations and thereby deprive individuals of their property without due process of law. That thing which can not be done directly, which would be flagrantly illegal, unconstitutional, and unjust if attempted as a direct act, ought not to be indulged by indirection. There will be no difficulty, since the subject is with us in connection with this deficiency item which is proposed as the outgrowth of the conference this morning, to provide that indemnity lands may be taken not only by settlers, but by all persons, States, or companies having lands within the reservations as the lines thereof may be finally determined.

Mr. WILSON. Then let the complete control of these reservations go into the hands of the Government through its agents.

Mr. CARTER. Assuredly. Now, I trust, in view of the possibility, in fact, the probability, or the certainty, of reaching a conclusion on the main point at this time, that it can be understood that the Senator will concede the indemnity claim in addition to his former concession, as we do not insist on school or other indemnity land selections beyond the State where the loss is sustained on account of the inclusion of State lands in forest reservations.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I do not think that a proper solution of this vexed question can be reached by the process proposed. It seems to me that the Senator from Iowa, in suggesting that the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate should take it into consideration at once, shows the very ground upon which we would best rely if the conference report should be rejected and the demand heeded which comes from all sections of the country affected by the forest-reserve orders, that the orders themselves should be vacated. It will be very much easier for the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate and the similar committee of the House of Representatives to take into their purview the question of forestry reserves if there shall not already be existing improperly constituted forestry reserves. I beg the Senators who at first seemed inclined to insist that the conference report should be rejected that they will still maintain that position.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], in the course of his remarks, said that this question would not be settled right, and therefore not settled at all, until we should be allowed to begin de novo with the forestry reserves. The action of the Secretary of the Interior, however much we may trust him, and I have no idea but that he will be not only intelligent, but patriotic and considerate in dealing with this question, will be very much simpler if the forestry reserve orders should be swept away, and if he would be allowed to begin by a designation of the proper lands to be comprised within the new order which shall be made.

It is not necessary, after the remarks of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], for any one to attack the scientific committee which went West to make the investigation; but I wish here to record a fact in connection with their work, or lack of work, in making a designation of a forestry reservation in the State of Utah. No one of the commission ever set foot upon the forestry reserve. No one of them ever saw it even from a distance. I doubt if any one of them to-day, unless he had a map before him showing the forestry reserve marked upon it, could tell in what portion of the State the reservation is located.

It is a fact that ten trees grow in Utah where one was standing fifty years ago when the people entered there. A community capable of multiplying the natural forest by ten in fifty years ought to be allowed to express some judgment in regard to the setting apart of forestry reserves. No man, woman, or child in the State of Utah ever knew it was in contemplation to make the forestry reserve until after the order was enunciated by the President of the United States.

I still insist that we can only do justice by vacating the orders absolutely. I do not wish to charge that there has been any bad faith, but I well remember that a year ago when this matter was under discussion we were assured most solemnly that if we would consent to a postponement or a suspension of the orders rather than to a complete revocation of them within the time of the suspension, the President of the United States would revoke the orders and make new ones covering proper forestry reserves. Nothing of the kind has been done. It would seem to me that Congress owes it to itself and to the people affected in all their vital relations, in all their commerce, in their homes, and in all their industries within the localities concerned, now and here to revoke the orders.

Mr. MANTLE. Mr. President, it is unnecessary to go over the ground already covered so fully this morning and heretofore, touching the gross injustice perpetrated by the issue of these orders. The debate this morning has served very much to clear the atmosphere and to point the way to an agreement which shall possibly solve the difficulties of the situation as they now exist.

The remarks of my colleague [Mr. CARTER], it seems to me, have pointed the way for a perfect understanding upon this question, and I now desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of this body if the propositions meet with his approval relating to the placing of an amendment upon the deficiency appropriation bill now pending before this body looking to a substitution of lieu lands for those lands embraced upon these reservations, looking to an additional appropriation for the purpose of carrying into effect the desire to eliminate those sections which have already been embraced and which have no right within a forestry reservation, and also the other question touching the appointment of those who are to execute the law in respect to the proper segregation of those reservations, the care for them, and so forth, to be made from the States in which the reservations are located. I ask the Senator if these propositions meet with his approval, and if we may rely upon his support in the matter of an amendment to be proposed to the deficiency bill. If the propositions do meet with his approval, it seems to me that it offers a very wise and just solution of this difficulty. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if we may expect his support in carrying out these propositions?

Mr. ALLISON. As a Senator on the floor, I am willing to vote for and support any additional appropriation for the care of the forest reservations that the Secretary of the Interior will recommend. I can not promise in advance that I will vote for legislation on any appropriation bill. As to the matter of legislation, I leave it, of course, to the committee proposing it and to the judgment of the Senate when it comes here. The Senator now proposes some suggestions respecting the selection of officers and agents of the Government that I think ought to be adopted as a rule in our proceedings here, but there never has been such a proposition, so far as I know, inserted in any bill, either as legislation or as a matter of appropriation. I mention these matters now so that Senators may know, at least so far as I am concerned, what I am willing to do as respects these reservations.

I think there was much force, I will say to the Senator from Montana, in the protest which came to us from the State of California that it would be unwise and unjust to that State to allow Montana and Washington and Wyoming to locate substitute lands in the State of California to make up for lands lost in the State of Montana and other States. That made some impression upon me, and yet I may be willing to go as far as the Senators propose in this direction.

But it is manifestly impossible for Senators to have an expectation that on a deficiency appropriation bill this whole matter can be adjusted and settled. It does seem to me singular that Senators do not know, or do not observe if they do know, that it is impossible for us to secure such legislation in the Senate when in order to secure the legislation it is necessary to have the concurrence of the House of Representatives.

I fought for these provisions in this bill as long as I believed it was possible for us to have any hope of securing them, and I now feel certain that the House of Representatives will not agree affirmatively to set aside these reservations; at least they will not agree to it if their committees represent them. It is manifestly our duty to see that the bill passes with or without the legislation proposed by us and that we shall come to some understanding with the House of Representatives respecting this long bill, containing many items of absolute importance to the Government. Therefore, as far as I am concerned, I do not want to go beyond stating that I will vote for any adequate and necessary appropriation for this purpose in the deficiency appropriation bill if it is proposed.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not quite understand the point at issue between the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Iowa. I understood the criticism about embracing a lot of towns and desert lands in timber reservations, but do I understand the Senator from Montana now to be willing to agree to all this, provided there is a provision in the law or an understanding on the part of the chairman of the committee or the Secretary of the Interior that whatever officers or employees are appointed shall be selected from the States in which the lands lie? Is that what he now proposes shall be agreed to?

Mr. ALLISON. I understood the Senator from Montana to inquire of me whether I would favor such legislation on the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Would that of itself be satisfactory, if such a provision was put in the deficiency bill?

Mr. MANTLE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to answer—

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I want to say that if so, I have been very much at fault somehow in this matter. I supposed that this was a very grave evil, and I have sympathized very strongly with the views expressed by the gentlemen from those States; but if dollar that is unnecessary, but we want the future provided for with what is necessary.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the Secretary of the Interior can perhaps propose an additional sum, and I will say to the Senator we can probably put on the deficiency bill an additional sum, and next year we can do what we have always done hitherto—if we find the amount wholly inadequate, deal with it next winter. I hope, in view of that fact, that Senators will allow the report to be voted upon now.

That thing which can not be done directly, which would be flagrantly illegal, unconstitutional, and unjust if attempted as a direct act, ought not to be indulged by indirection. There will be no difficulty, since the subject is with us in connection with this deficiency item which is proposed as the outgrowth of the conference this morning, to provide that indemnity lands may be taken not only by settlers, but by all persons, States, or companies having lands within the reservations as the lines thereof may be finally determined.

Mr. WILSON. Then let the complete control of these reservations go into the hands of the Government through its agents.

Mr. CARTER. Assuredly. Now, I trust, in view of the possibility, in fact, the probability, or the certainty, of reaching a conclusion on the main point at this time, that it can be understood that the Senator will concede the indemnity claim in addition to his former concession, as we do not insist on school or other indemnity land selections beyond the State where the loss is sustained on account of the inclusion of State lands in forest reservations.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I do not think that a proper solution of this vexed question can be reached by the process proposed. It seems to me that the Senator from Iowa, in suggesting that the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate should take it into consideration at once, shows the very ground upon which we would best rely if the conference report should be rejected and the demand heeded which comes from all sections of the country affected by the forest-reserve orders, that the orders themselves should be vacated. It will be very much easier for the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate and the similar committee of the House of Representatives to take into their purview the question of forestry reserves if there shall not already be existing improperly constituted forestry reserves. I beg the Senators who at first seemed inclined to insist that the conference report should be rejected that they will still maintain that position.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], in the course of his remarks, said that this question would not be settled right, and therefore not settled at all, until we should be allowed to begin de novo with the forestry reserves. The action of the Secretary of the Interior, however much we may trust him, and I have no idea but that he will be not only intelligent, but patriotic and considerate in dealing with this question, will be very much simpler if the forestry reserve orders should be swept away, and if he would be allowed to begin by a designation of the proper lands to be comprised within the new order which shall be made.

It is not necessary, after the remarks of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], for any one to attack the scientific committee which went West to make the investigation; but I wish here to record a fact in connection with their work, or lack of work, in making a designation of a forestry reservation in the State of Utah. No one of the commission ever set foot upon the forestry reserve. No one of them ever saw it even from a distance. I doubt if any one of them to-day, unless he had a map before him showing the forestry reserve marked upon it, could tell in what portion of the State the reservation is located.

It is a fact that ten trees grow in Utah where one was standing fifty years ago when the people entered there. A community capable of multiplying the natural forest by ten in fifty years ought to be allowed to express some judgment in regard to the setting apart of forestry reserves. No man, woman, or child in the State of Utah ever knew it was in contemplation to make the forestry reserve until after the order was enunciated by the President of the United States.

I still insist that we can only do justice by vacating the orders absolutely. I do not wish to charge that there has been any bad faith, but I well remember that a year ago when this matter was under discussion we were assured most solemnly that if we would consent to a postponement or a suspension of the orders rather than to a complete revocation of them within the time of the suspension, the President of the United States would revoke the orders and make new ones covering proper forestry reserves. Nothing of the kind has been done. It would seem to me that Congress owes it to itself and to the people affected in all their vital relations, in all their commerce, in their homes, and in all their industries within the localities concerned, now and here to revoke the orders.

Mr. MANTLE. Mr. President, it is unnecessary to go over the ground already covered so fully this morning and heretofore, touching the gross injustice perpetrated by the issue of these orders. The debate this morning has served very much to clear the atmosphere and to point the way to an agreement which shall possibly solve the difficulties of the situation as they now exist.

The remarks of my colleague [Mr. CARTER], it seems to me, have pointed the way for a perfect understanding upon this question, and I now desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of this body if the propositions meet with his approval relating to the placing of an amendment upon the deficiency appropriation bill now pending before this body looking to a substitution of lieu lands for those lands embraced upon these reservations, looking to an additional appropriation for the purpose of carrying into effect the desire to eliminate those sections which have already been embraced and which have no right within a forestry reservation, and also the other question touching the appointment of those who are to execute the law in respect to the proper segregation of those reservations, the care for them, and so forth, to be made from the States in which the reservations are located. I ask the Senator if these propositions meet with his approval, and if we may rely upon his support in the matter of an amendment to be proposed to the deficiency bill. If the propositions do meet with his approval, it seems to me that it offers a very wise and just solution of this difficulty. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if we may expect his support in carrying out these propositions?

Mr. ALLISON. As a Senator on the floor, I am willing to vote for and support any additional appropriation for the care of the forest reservations that the Secretary of the Interior will recommend. I can not promise in advance that I will vote for legislation on any appropriation bill. As to the matter of legislation, I leave it, of course, to the committee proposing it and to the judgment of the Senate when it comes here. The Senator now proposes some suggestions respecting the selection of officers and agents of the Government that I think ought to be adopted as a rule in our proceedings here, but there never has been such a proposition, so far as I know, inserted in any bill, either as legislation or as a matter of appropriation. I mention these matters now so that Senators may know, at least so far as I am concerned, what I am willing to do as respects these reservations.

I think there was much force, I will say to the Senator from Montana, in the protest which came to us from the State of California that it would be unwise and unjust to that State to allow Montana and Washington and Wyoming to locate substitute lands in the State of California to make up for lands lost in the State of Montana and other States. That made some impression upon me, and yet I may be willing to go as far as the Senators propose in this direction.

But it is manifestly impossible for Senators to have an expectation that on a deficiency appropriation bill this whole matter can be adjusted and settled. It does seem to me singular that Senators do not know, or do not observe if they do know, that it is impossible for us to secure such legislation in the Senate when in order to secure the legislation it is necessary to have the concurrence of the House of Representatives.

I fought for these provisions in this bill as long as I believed it was possible for us to have any hope of securing them, and I now feel certain that the House of Representatives will not agree affirmatively to set aside these reservations; at least they will not agree to it if their committees represent them. It is manifestly our duty to see that the bill passes with or without the legislation proposed by us and that we shall come to some understanding with the House of Representatives respecting this long bill, containing many items of absolute importance to the Government. Therefore, as far as I am concerned, I do not want to go beyond stating that I will vote for any adequate and necessary appropriation for this purpose in the deficiency appropriation bill if it is proposed.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not quite understand the point at issue between the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Iowa. I understood the criticism about embracing a lot of towns and desert lands in timber reservations, but do I understand the Senator from Montana now to be willing to agree to all this, provided there is a provision in the law or an understanding on the part of the chairman of the committee or the Secretary of the Interior that whatever officers or employees are appointed shall be selected from the States in which the lands lie? Is that what he now proposes shall be agreed to?

Mr. ALLISON. I understood the Senator from Montana to inquire of me whether I would favor such legislation on the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Would that of itself be satisfactory, if such a provision was put in the deficiency bill?

Mr. MANTLE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to answer—

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I want to say that if so, I have been very much at fault somehow in this matter. I supposed that this was a very grave evil, and I have sympathized very strongly with the views expressed by the gentlemen from those States; but if after all there is nothing in it except an agreement to appoint those who are to look after the timber from the States in which the reservations are located, it is a matter of much smaller consequence than I supposed it was.

Mr. MANTLE. The Senator, I think, has misapprehended my position. I think the very best thing that could be done, the thing that ought to be done in this connection, is the absolute revocation of these orders. They were made in ignorance, without any knowledge of the conditions that existed in those States. They have worked a great injury, a great wrong to the people of those States, and they ought to be revoked. There is no doubt about that. The revocation of the orders is what I desire above everything else. But there is a question as to whether we can secure that revocation. The Senate conferees have receded from the amendment placed in the sundry civil bill revoking those orders. The Senator from Arkansas knows quite as well as I do as to what the probabilities are for our securing a retention of that amendment and giving it the force of law.

In the discussion this morning it has been sought to find a way by which the evils complained of might be modified. As a step in that direction, it has been suggested that wherever lands belonging to the States or belonging to individuals have been embraced within forest reservations lieu lands might be taken for them, so that no injustice would be done to the States or to individuals.

And here I may say, in reply to the Senator from Iowa, that it has not been our thought or our intention that lieu lands should be selected outside of the States involved. So the question which he raises, or which was raised by a protest from California, has no bearing whatever upon this discussion. It has no place here. We never intended to go into California to get lieu lands for the lands embraced in the reservations in our States.

The further proposition, I may say to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], whom, however, I do not now see in his seat, is that the men who are to execute this law in respect to the forest reservations shall be selected or appointed from the States concerned. It is simply an application of the home-rule principle, which I understand the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] indorses and which we think ought to be placed in the law itself, so as to insure the enforcement of that principle. In addition to that a further appropriation is suggested, it being conceded that the appropriation contained in the sundry civil bill is wholly and utterly inadequate to carry out the purpose of the law.

We feel that if we can not secure a revocation of the orders, which is the proper and just thing to do, with these amendments which it is now proposed shall be inserted in the deficiency appropriation bill, the situation would be very much modified, and out of it all perhaps we could work an approximately just solution of this evil.

Now, that is what we are endeavoring to arrive at. My question was directed to the proposition as to whether we might rely upon the Appropriations Committee when they came to the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill for their aid and influence in the matter of securing the adoption of these amendments. If we had some assurance of that sort, we might perhaps be reconciled to the relinquishment of the pending amendment to the sundry civil bill. Without some assurance of that kind, we shall feel that we have not done much to ameliorate the conditions which exist in those States and which have been so thoroughly and so clearly described here this morning. That is why I sought to elicit from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations some expression of his opinion.

I am sorry that his answer has not been as favorable as I should have liked. I understand the chairman to say that he will be willing and glad to incorporate in the deficiency appropriation bill any recommendations which may be made by the Secretary of the Interior bearing upon this matter. I have not myself talked with the Secretary, and I do not know how far he is willing to go in this matter, whether he is willing to make these recommendations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 1 o'clock has arrived, and it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the joint resolution (H. Res. 259) to provide for annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the joint resolution may be laid aside for a moment until we can finish the pending conference report.

Mr. DAVIS. Let the joint resolution be considered as being before the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is before the Senate and is laid aside informally. The Senator from Montana will continue his remarks.

Mr. MANTLE. I had just about concluded. In the absence of some definite or as nearly definite assurance as might be given under the circumstances, I for myself feel very much that it is my duty to endeavor to secure the retention of the amendment in the sundry civil bill unless some satisfactory understanding can be reached that this matter may be disposed of in a manner which shall to some extent satisfy the demands of the people of the States concerned.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I desire to say only a single word further upon this matter, and that has been called out by a remark or two.

I do not see the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] in his seat, but he propounded an inquiry as to whether this is merely a matter of securing some appointments in the various States. I desire to say that nothing is further from our intention, and that the Senators representing those Western States care nothing about it.

What I do desire and what I do hope is that in the selection of the administration of the forest reserves men who live near them and are acquainted with them and with the people there can be the appointees of the Department of the Interior, in order to report to the Secretary of the Interior what parts can be thrown open to public settlement and what parts shall remain forestry reserves. It is a very small matter as far as officers are concerned, and we do not propose to place it in that attitude.

I have had several conversations on this subject with the Secretary of the Interior. Of course I have no right to represent that honorable gentleman on this floor and say what he will do or what he will not do. But in his conversations with me in regard to this matter he has given me the most ample and complete assurances that as soon as he is provided with means he will proceed to segregate from the forestry reserves those portions which it is not desirable to continue in the same any longer, and for that purpose he has already, in conjunction with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, arranged so many acres.

He takes, for illustration, if I may be permitted, the three reservations in the State of Washington and appoints one superintendent for the three, then an inspector for each one, and then for patrolmen, axmen, and men to put out fires he divides the reserve in sections, townships, and, I think, ranges, so that the exact locality of every man who is employed in the forestry reservation may be known and how much of the reservation he must patrol. He is to report to his superior officer, and that officer to his superior officer, and the general superintendent is to report to the Secretary of the Interior, what part of the reservation can be eliminated from the forestry reserve.

Now, that is the plan. The Secretary has said to me, "Your people can get everything they desire, everything that is proper, and everything that is right. Ultimately the matter will be entirely adjusted to your own liking and to the satisfaction of all." That is what he has said to me, and I feel that I have a right to make that statement. I think the Secretary of the Interior, who is thoroughly interested in the matter, and is earnestly anxious to relieve those places where relief ought to be had, will immediately proceed in that work as soon as the pending appropriation bill becomes a law.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a moment. I sympathize greatly and sincerely with the Senators from the western portion of the United States who have brought a well-established grievance, with reference to ill-advised forest reservations, to the attention of this body, and I am surprised that relief has been delayed so long. But, Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate—

Mr. WILSON. May I interrupt the Senator from California at this point?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to him that the appropriation was made for the Geological Survey. They went out and made some surveys. When they returned, this amendment was proposed, four or five months ago, in the appropriation bill, but since the amendment was placed on the appropriation bill repealing the order the Secretary of the Interior has been unable to proceed until Congress has determined the question.

Mr. WHITE. The matter seems to have been referred to a committee of Paleozoic epoch characteristics, if we are to judge of the results. However, I do not wish to detain the Senate on this point at all. I desire to impress the Committee on Appropriations with the necessity of getting this measure through at the very earliest moment. I have no doubt they have labored with great assiduity, but yet there is one consideration which I can not, notwithstanding the necessity for economy of time, resist in stating to that committee and to the Senate.

This bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed April 22, 1898. On page 109 there is an item, regarding which there is no contest in the committee, with reference to a subject which has been often advocated in this body, as follows:

Improving harbor at San Pedro, Cal.: For construction of a deep-water harbor for commerce and of refuge at San Pedro, Cal., in accordance with the plans and specifications of the board appointed by the President, as provided in the act of June 3, 1890, $400,000; but nothing herein shall be construed to extend the limit of cost of improvement of the harbor at San Pedro, Cal., as authorized by said act of June 3, 1896.

Those who have been here for many, many years may remember when this controversy began. It passed through the War Department. Two boards composed of the most eminent engineers of the United States Army dealt with the subject and decided in favor of the location at San Pedro, Cal. After a contest which involved a great deal of discussion in this Chamber, and into the merits of which it is wholly unnecessary now to go, a third board was appointed, at the head of which was Admiral Walker, well known to everyone in this country. They made a report, contained in Senate Document No. 13, Fifty-fifth Congress, first session, which has no doubt attracted the attention of Senators. The Secretary of War, for reasons best known to himself, delayed action.

At my request the Senate passed a resolution calling for a justification of his course. His reasons were given in Senate Document No. 94, same session, and, in my opinion, were very flimsy, insolvent, alleged reasons. Afterwards the Secretary determined that he would seek authority. Believing that the act was ambiguous, he applied to the Attorney-General, now Justice McKenna, and that distinguished jurist rendered an opinion against the persistent views of the Secretary. His views are as follows:

AUGUST 9, 1897.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of August 3, in relation to San Pedro Harbor.

The inquiry you propound (which will be stated hereafter) grows out of the provision of the river and harbor act of 1896 and a report of a board of engineers provided to be appointed by it.

You express doubts of your duty and power under the act and report of the board as to whether the appropriation is sufficient to provide for a harbor both of commerce and refuge. After some discussion you say:

"It is possible, however, that in order to complete this harbor for commerce and of refuge there may be private subscription by those who are financially interested in the matter, to enable the building of the breakwater, and also to create or deepen the inner harbor and approach to the same. The opinion of the Attorney-General is therefore respectfully requested as to whether the War Department would be justified in advertising for the whole work and in making a depth of 25 feet instead of 30 feet, as suggested in my communication of May 18, heretofore referred to (which would be ample, in my opinion, for the present commerce of the Pacific centering there), and also for an inner harbor (harbor of commerce of, say, half the dimensions named in my letter of May 18)."

This inquiry, maybe, should be answered in the negative, but I think the law and your powers under it, and as determined by the report of the board, may be considered more broadly.

The provision of the river and harbor act is as follows:

"For a deep-water harbor for commerce and of refuge at Port Los Angeles, in Santa Monica Bay, Cal., or at San Pedro, in said State, the location of said harbor to be determined by an officer of the Navy, to be detailed by the Secretary of the Navy, an officer of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, to be detailed by the Superintendent of said Survey and three experienced civil engineers, skilled in riparian work, to be appointed by the President, who shall constitute a board, and who shall personally examine said harbors, the decision of a majority of which shall be final as to the location of said harbor. It shall be the duty of said board to make plans, specifications, and estimates for said improvement.

"Whenever said board shall have settled the location and made report to the Secretary of War of the same, with said plans, specifications, and estimates, then the Secretary of War may make contracts for the completion of the improvement of the harbor so selected by said board, according to the project reported by them, at a cost not exceeding in the aggregate $2,900,000, and $50,000 is hereby appropriated, so much thereof as may be necessary to be used for the expenses of the board and payment of the civil engineers for their services, the amount to be determined by the Secretary of War: Provided, however, That if the board hereby constituted, as in this section provided, shall determine in favor of the construction of a breakwater at Port Los Angeles, no expenditure of any part of the money hereby appropriated shall be made, nor shall any contract for the construction of such breakwater be entered into, until the Southern Pacific Company, or the owner or owners thereof, shall execute an agreement and file the same with the Secretary of War that any railroad company, or any corporation engaged in the business of transportation, may share in the use of the pier now constructed at Port Los Angeles, and the approaches and tracks leading thereto, situate westerly of the easterly entrance to the Santa Monica tunnel, upon such just and equitable terms as may be agreed upon between the parties, and if they fail to agree, then to be determined by the Secretary of War: and before any expenditure of the money hereby appropriated is made for the construction of a breakwater at Port Los Angeles said Southern Pacific Company, or the owner of the tracks and approaches leading to said pier, shall execute an agreement and file the same with the Secretary of War, that any railroad or transportation company or corporation desiring to construct a wharf or pier in Santa Monica Bay may, for the purpose of approaching such wharf or pier, and for the purpose of constructing and operating the same, cross the track or tracks, approaches, and right of way now used by the Southern Pacific Company under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, and upon the payment of such compensation as that officer may find to be reasonable: Provided further, That in event said harbor is located at Port Los Angeles, no greater royalty on the rock used for the construction of the breakwater than 12 cents a cubic yard shall be charged, and the Southern Pacific Company shall charge no more than one-half a cent a ton-mile for freight on rock transported over its road."

The statute, therefore, provided for a deep-water harbor for commerce and of refuge at one of two places—San Pedro or Port Los Angeles—and the appointment of a board to select the place and determine the plans of improvement.

It will be observed that the powers of the board are large.

There is a limitation of the amount to be expended; in all else the judgment of the board is free. They decide between the places, and the contracts of the Secretary of War are to be "according to the project reported by them." The decision of the board is final as to location, and it shall be their "duty to make plans, specifications, and estimates for said improvement," and upon their report "the Secretary of War may make contracts for the completion of the improvement . . . according to the project reported by them." The law itself besides indicates the project. Both the places mentioned are open roadsteads; in both, therefore, a breakwater is necessary to make protected water—a harbor of refuge, and this may be a harbor of commerce as well. Obviously so at Port Los Angeles, as we shall see.

The report is voluminous, too much so to be quoted, and yet it can hardly be understood any other way. The double function of the board to select and hence compare sites and report plans for both led them into comments and comparisons and an intermingling of considerations somewhat confusing; nor did they accurately discriminate that which was to be Government work from that which was to be the work of private enterprise, or that which was necessary now and that which might become so with the advance of time and trade. I do not think, however, that the quays or pier or wharves or the excavation of the docks formed by them are a part of the project reported. They are the means by which private enterprises may avail itself of the project. Some piers were already so erected at Port Los Angeles. They were the property of the Southern Pacific Company and were to remain so.

The law only required that other transportation companies should be allowed to use them, but, however, "upon such just and equitable terms" as should be agreed on, or, if agreement fail, "then to be determined by the Secretary of War."

From a careful consideration of the report of the board, I am of the opinion that the project reported by them is a breakwater and that it fulfills the provision of the law and will make within its meaning a harbor for commerce and of refuge.

Respectfully, yours,

JOS. MCKENNA,
Attorney-General.

THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

After having obtained an opinion to the effect that it was his duty to proceed under the act and that his criticisms were groundless the Secretary of War advertised for bids, and he not only obtained offers within the limits named in the act, but many valid bids made by responsible parties were duly tendered, some of which were more than one million less than the sum authorized. I must attract the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, as I have heretofore done personally, to the fact that in the proposition for bids which the Secretary thus made he limited the acceptance thereof in such a manner as to make the letting of the contract depend upon the passage of this bill during the present fiscal year. This constituted an unheard-of performance, but he did it.

Before seeking bids he stated that he could not advertise because he did not have the necessary money. The coin essential to defray the needed outlay, the enormous amount requisite, was a few hundred dollars. Numerous responsible newspapers in my State offered to do the advertising free, but the Secretary said that the Government could not accept a charity, although the Government has for years accepted post-offices all over the country free when any owner was willing to contribute a building in an appropriate situation.

Then he submitted the question to the Treasury Department whether there was any money on hand, and a decision was rendered again against him, to the effect that there was over $16,000 on hand. The decision referred to is as follows:

I have by your direction the letter of the Chief of Engineers of the 19th instant, in reference to the appropriation in the river and harbor act of June 3, 1896, for a deep-water harbor either at Port Los Angeles or at San Pedro, in California.

The question specifically submitted by the Chief of Engineers is this:

"I have the honor to request your decision whether the balance of $16,561.51 now remaining from the $50,000 appropriated by the act of June 3, 1896 (29 Stat., 213), can be legally expended in the necessary preliminary operations to place the contemplated work under contract, and to expend it in contract work and superintendence."

The appropriation in question, after providing for the creation and membership of a board to determine at which of these two places this deep-water harbor should be located and its duties, provides:

"Whenever said board shall have settled the location and made a report to the Secretary of War of the same, with said plans, specifications, and estimates, then the Secretary of War may make contracts for the completion of the improvement of the harbor so selected by said board, according to the project reported by them, at a cost not exceeding in the aggregate $2,900,000, and $50,000 is hereby appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be used for the expenses of the board and payment of the civil engineers for their services, the amount to be determined by the Secretary of War: Provided, however, That if the board hereby constituted, as in this section provided, shall determine in favor of the construction of a breakwater at Port Los Angeles, no expenditure of any part of the money hereby appropriated shall be made, nor shall any contract for the construction of such breakwater be entered into, until the Southern Pacific Company or the owner or owners thereof shall execute an agreement and file the same with the Secretary of War that any railroad company, . . . and before any expenditure of the money hereby appropriated is made for the construction of a breakwater at Port Los Angeles said Southern Pacific Company . . ."

From the facts as stated it appears that this board has performed the duties imposed upon it and that, in pursuance now of its recommendations, you desire to proceed with the work to the extent of advertising, printing specifications, etc., with a view of entering into the necessary contracts which you are specifically authorized to do by the terms of this act. You propose to meet these necessary expenses from the balance of some $16,000 remaining out of the $50,000 appropriated in this act. I am clearly of the opinion that you have authority to so incur these expenses and that the same are payable out of this balance.

This $50,000 is an absolute appropriation, available for any purposes connected with this work, and treated, in my opinion, as a part of the total contemplated cost of the work, $2,900,000. It may be expended in any way that the remaining $2,850,000, if appropriated, might be expended, and in addition to that it is also applicable to the expenses of the board and the payment of civil engineers as authorized in the act. The appropriation of so large a sum, it seems to me, as $50,000 evidently contemplated the payment not only of the expenses of the board but of all other necessary incidental expenses in entering into the contracts necessary for the execution of the improvement of the harbor when selected. To give any other construction to this appropriation is to ignore the provisions above quoted, prohibiting the "expedition of any part of the money hereby appropriated" for the construction of this breakwater until the Southern Pacific Railroad Company met certain conditions.

This proviso assumes that an appropriation has been made which is available for this work after the board has completed its labors, and it seems to me shows the intent of Congress to have been to treat this appropriation of $50,000 as the first of a series of appropriations, until the total sum to be expended in the work is reached. The Secretary of War has been authorized to enter into contracts up to $2,500,000 (less the amount expended by the board and for preliminary expenses) in behalf of the Government in the execution of this work, and these contracts will be binding obligations of the Government when made. To give any other construction to this act would be in part to nullify the evident intent of Congress that this work should be prosecuted under the authority of this appropriation.

Advertisements were published by the Secretary and bids solicited. The bids are in. Responsible contractors from various parts of this country have offered to complete the construction far below the figures named in the act. I am told by a Member of Congress from California that he consulted the Secretary recently and that that officer indicates that he will stultify himself and will not let the contract.

Now, Mr. President, in view of this declaration it is of importance, indeed, essential, that this bill shall be passed before the 1st of next month, and if the Secretary of War does not care to proceed, notwithstanding his explicit avowals and the advertising for bids, we will know it and we will be heard from.

The people of California, and especially of the immediate neighborhood of San Pedro, are intensely excited about this matter and the newly expressed official threat to ignore the law. Within the last few days I and my colleague have been most earnestly advised that there is nothing before Congress in which these valued constituents feel such a deep-seated interest. They are tired, very tired. I feel the same way.

If the Secretary had honest doubts, these were solved by the Attorney-General, and any further delay, whether to procure any other opinion more in harmony with his own views or for other purposes, would be outrageous.

Therefore I suggest, while there are, no doubt, matters in this bill which can not be very well laid aside without doing injury to some one, this is an issue which, in view of its long pendency, the earnestness of the contest, and the number of people and the extent of interests involved, ought not to be sacrificed to disputations of less moment. I say this with the greatest kindness for other propositions just now eloquently pressed, with which I must wholly and cordially sympathize.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I think the conference report, under all the circumstances, should be rejected and that the conferees should be secure, in connection with the forest reserves, either in adopting the Senate amendment or in a modification of it by which the reservations shall be vacated until the 1st of next January, until the areas that are improperly included are segregated and left open for settlement and occupation. I think it is outrageous that 15,000 people in my State should be kept year after year in the condition they are in.

Here is a matter which relates to five or six Western States, and every Senator and every Representative from those States is agreed upon this question. These reservations were ignorantly made; they embrace areas which ought not to be embraced. Not one of the Senators or Representatives from the States interested was consulted about the matter. We have presented it to the Senate at every session, and at every session the Senate has passed a provision giving us some relief; but we have been defeated in conference. A year ago we appropriated money to make a survey to have this segregation made, to have these boundaries properly adjusted, and nothing has been done. They have made the surveys, but they have not adjusted the boundaries.

What we insist upon is to have from now until January next to adjust these boundaries, and in the meantime that that portion of the country shall be opened to settlement the same as it always has been. We want that done which should have been done in the first place—notice given, and then an intelligent investigation of the matter, and the boundaries of these reservations established in the proper way. That is all we ask.

Mr. WILSON. Would the Senator have it done by the Secretary of the Interior or the Geological Bureau?

Mr. PETTIGREW. By the Secretary of the Interior or any other proper officer. I believe the Secretary of the Interior will do this work, and I believe he will do it by the 1st of January next. If this report is sent back to the conference committee, I believe beyond question that the House will agree to that modification, vacating the order after the 1st of January, and let the Secretary of the Interior adjust the boundaries of that country.

Is it fair, is it right, that 15,000 people in my State shall be locked up in one of these reservations made in the manner in which they are made?

Mr. TELLER. I want to ask the Senator a question. Is it not within the power of the executive department of the Government to make that change now without any additional law?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes; it is within the Executive power.

Mr. TELLER. Then why is it not made?

Mr. PETTIGREW. They do not do it; but we have the power to vacate the reservation until they do it; and that is all we ask so long as they will not do it. A year and a half has gone by since I first tried to have this wrong righted, but they do not right the wrong; and it seems to me Congress ought to right it until they will adjust the boundaries of these reservations in a proper manner.

Mr. WILSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. Is it within the power of the Executive to vacate a portion of a reservation? Must he not, under the law, if he vacates an acre, vacate the entire reservation?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Not at all.

Mr. WILSON. I think so.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Not at all. We passed a law last year which allowed the President to vacate a portion and readjust the boundaries and embrace a great area if he chose to do it; but nothing has been done; a year has rolled by since March, 1897; that country has been locked up, and we can not get anything done.

I say we want to vacate the reservations until the 1st of January, when Congress will again be in session, and give until that time to have the boundaries properly adjusted. If they do properly adjust them, and issue new Executive orders, they can do it, if they choose, within thirty days, and they can make these reservations, for the amendment as it stands does not curtail the President's power to issue orders even between now and January, properly adjusting the boundaries and creating new reservations, embracing a portion of the country already included and other areas. It seems to me it is a reasonable and proper request under the circumstances. Therefore I want this bill to go back to the conference committee and to have the conferees insist upon justice being done to these people. It ought not to take five minutes in conference to do it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like a word of explanation from the chairman of the committee as to the proposed amendment on page 2 of the report, amendment No. 149. The provision suggested by the conference committee is as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to cause an examination and investigation to be made of outrages and injuries alleged to have been perpetrated on individual Indians belonging to the Seminole tribe by an armed mob or band of lawless persons who invaded the Seminole country during the months of December, 1897, and January, 1898, and if, upon such examination and investigation, it shall appear that outrages and injuries have been so perpetrated, and that the United States is under treaty obligations to pay for such outrages and injuries, he shall ascertain the amount which should be properly paid said Indian or Indians, or their legal heirs or representatives, and pay such sum or sums as he may deem just and reasonable, and for such purpose a sum not exceeding $20,000 is hereby appropriated.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this is an extraordinary proceeding, and one that can, under the practice of the Government, scarcely be justified. I do not see very well on what grounds the Government of the United States can be held responsible for the perpetration of an outrage in the Seminole country. If this practice is once inaugurated, I do not very well see where it is to stop.

I note with pleasure that there is no absolute provision that this money shall be paid, but it is left in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. If he shall find that the Government is liable, then the amount of money shall be paid.

I think it is inconceivable that the Secretary of the Interior can find that the Government can possibly be liable under any conditions such as are recited here; but as this seems to me to be entirely a new course of legislation, I should be glad to have a word of explanation from the chairman of the committee, and to know if we are to enter upon a new practice of having the Government held liable for all outrages which may happen to be perpetrated within the bounds of the Indian country.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator, I suppose, remembers the circumstances under which these outrages were committed. They were committed under circumstances of great atrocity, and perhaps under great provocation, as the people who committed them supposed at the time. But the Seminole Indians believe that under the treaty stipulations we have made with them we are required to reimburse them for certain losses of property, if not to pay damages on account of the killing of these two boys. Finally the conferees agreed upon this amendment, which requires the Secretary of the Interior, in the first place, to ascertain whether these alleged atrocities were committed, and, secondly, whether under the treaties we are under obligation to pay in case he finds affirmatively on the first proposition.

I think, in view of the fact of our relations with these tribes, as we are trying to get on in a friendly way with them, and as they make this claim, it is a wise thing to have this proposed examination and investigation made by the Secretary of the Interior, although it may be somewhat outside of the usual routine.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator if he believes the Government can, under any circumstances, be held responsible for the action of outlaws?

Mr. ALLISON. I have not investigated the treaty with sufficient care to express an opinion which ought to be binding upon anyone; but undoubtedly the Secretary of the Interior will take the opinion of the Attorney-General upon this subject, and it will be a carefully prepared opinion, having in view all the treaties we have made with the Seminole Indians. There certainly can be no damage or harm in the provision.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I hope there will be no practical harm from this provision, but I do regret that the committee should have seen fit to put in an appropriation bill a provision that a claim so groundless should be examined.

Mr. ALLISON. I regret that we were obliged to do it; but under the circumstances it seemed to be necessary.

Now, I hope we shall vote on the conference report. I only wish to say that we are dealing in this matter with a coordinate branch of the Government—the House of Representatives—and that, so far as I know and believe, we have exhausted our power to secure an agreement with the House to the proposed postponement as to the forest reservations. This is a proposition which we made to the conferees of the other House, and if they do not agree to it, of course in the end we must recede. We held on to it as long as we could.

It is a question now whether all the other provisions, notably the provision suggested by the Senator from California, shall be hung up here indefinitely because the House of Representatives do not agree to three or four of the propositions made by the Senate. This bill must either pass by the 30th day of June or else all the appropriations under it will fail and fall, and we must enter upon the question of a new appropriation of public moneys for these purposes. I want Senators to know what is involved in the rejection of this conference report.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the conference committee to certain changes made in the provision making appropriation for the Paris Exposition. I do not think there is any such public sentiment prevailing in this country to-day in favor of that appropriation as existed at the time the bill was passed containing the amendment of the Senate, as follows:

The President shall also appoint as assistants to the commissioner-general twelve experts having special attainments in regard to the subjects of the group or groups in said exposition to which they may be assigned, respectively, and who, under the direction of the commissioner-general, shall assist in the selection and arrangement of exhibits to be sent to said exposition from the United States, and who shall be specifically assigned to the several groups into which the exposition will, under official regulations, be divided.

These twelve commissioners were to be experts, and the bill provided as to the character of duties that should be performed by them. Now we find that the amendment agreed upon by the committee of conference provides that—

The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall also appoint twelve commissioners, who shall be subject to the direction and control of the commissioner-general and perform from time to time such service as he shall require.

Twelve commissioners without any prerequisite qualifications whatever, with no duties prescribed, and the work of prescribing their duties turned over to the commissioner-general, instead of being prescribed by the Congress of the United States. What those twelve nonexpert commissioners are to do this Congress can not know. In point of fact, so far as this bill is concerned, there are no duties to be performed by them, except such as the commissioner-general chooses to assign to them; and they are to have no qualifications except that they must be confirmed by the Senate of the United States when their names are sent to this body.

There was a good reason for appointing twelve experts; there was a good reason for dividing the exposition into twelve departments; there was a good reason to have experts appointed to help to select the exhibits to be sent there and to arrange them; but there is no reason whatever why we should send twelve nonexperts to the city of Paris to discharge no duties prescribed by any law. But the experts are not dispensed with. In addition to these twelve commissioners appointed by the President the commissioner-general is still to have the right to select experts to perform the duties which would have been performed by the twelve selected by the President under the amendment adopted by the Senate.

I can see no reason for this change. I can see no good results to follow this change. I can not understand why the House of Representatives should insist upon a change which evidently renders the bill very much less effective than it would have been if no such change had been made.

Then the Senate amendment provided that of the three executive officers not more than two should belong to the same political party. All that is omitted; and we have a provision here for the appointment of twelve commissioners without qualifications, and three executive officers, without any suggestion by Congress that there ought to be a division of these gentlemen according to their political proclivities, as has always been heretofore done when we are preparing to participate in such expositions.

I can not see why the House of Representatives would insist that this change should be made and that the protective clause, that at least one of these executive officers should belong to a party not represented by the Administration, should be omitted.

My friend from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] suggests that there are too many parties for the places to go round. At least, if that be true, the majority party ought to be satisfied with two out of the three executive officers; and if we are to send twelve persons over there who are to be merely ornamental and to have no duties to perform, in order to publish our glory and grandeur, then I insist that those twelve ought to be divided between the four or five political parties in the country, so that the people in Europe should have fair specimens of the representatives of the political parties in this country.

There was no reason for these changes; no reason why the House conferees should insist upon them; and no reason why the Senate conferees should surrender upon such a question.

I find that the committee insist where there is a provision that cuts off an officer legally in office, whose term will not expire on the 1st day of July, from any further payment of salary after that date. If our committee was so much bent on carrying out the will of the Senate in regard to this particular provision, why not hold out where at least common fairness was provided for in the original amendment adopted by the Senate, proposing to make an appropriation and to provide officers to look after American interests in the Paris Exposition?

Mr. ALLISON. Only a moment, Mr. President. I will state to the Senator from Kentucky that the provisions relating to the Paris Exposition were very carefully considered, and the new provision inserted at the request of the House conferees as to the commissioners was to give the officials who go to Paris a recognition that they would not have unless they were named as commissioners. That was the contention of the House conferees, and we thought it was a very fair and reasonable one.

As to the question of dividing these officers among the political parties, the members of the conference were satisfied, and I think the Senator from Kentucky will be well satisfied, that the President of the United States in the execution of this part of the provision will make a suitable distribution among the political parties of our country. If he does not do so, it will be within the power of the Senate of the United States to give such criticism as it chooses by its vote upon his failure to do so. I am sure that there will be a disposition to see to it that a suitable proportion of these public officers, who are to serve in a foreign country, shall belong to the political party so well represented by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY], and I should be glad to see the party of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] also represented upon this commission. I have no doubt there will be a suitable division of all these places.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the President would desire to make a suitable distribution of these offices among the several political parties and that he would be obliged to Congress if Congress were to indicate to him in some authoritative way that that was its desire. It would protect the President against importunities, which it will be very difficult for him to resist if Congress fails to indicate its wishes upon this subject.

My friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] says that if the President does not make the appointments as they ought to be made, if the different political parties are not recognized, the Senate may decline to confirm the appointments. We did not think that when we were preparing for the Chicago Exposition; we did not think that when we were legislating to establish the Interstate Commerce Commission and various other commissions similar to the one we have under consideration; and it is a little peculiar that the House of Representatives should stand out against a proposition so manifestly fair as that contained in the amendment as it left the Senate. If the other House expected the President would do that in any event if the Senate indicates its desire or opinion that it ought to be done, why should the other House object?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendment No. 231.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator to wait until the conference report is agreed to, and then his motion will be in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report of the conference committee.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Now, I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendment No. 231, which is an amendment to establish a sanitarium at Hot Springs, S. Dak., as a branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. A bill for this purpose has passed the Senate two or three times, and has been reported favorably from the Committee on Military Affairs in at least two sessions of the Senate.

I wish briefly to read what Gen. W. B. Franklin, president of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, says on this subject:

There is no question in my mind that another branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers should be established in the territory between the Mississippi and the summit of the Rocky Mountains, that one now in existence being constantly overcrowded and unable to meet the requirements.

The location at Hot Springs is an eligible one, and with the appropriation a hospital could be erected which would relieve the hospitals of the other Branches at once, and form the nucleus of a larger branch should one be required.

Thirty soldiers who had the rheumatism were taken to this point some three or four years ago and kept there sixty days in a home which the State of South Dakota has built there, and nearly every one of them—80 per cent of those who had rheumatism—were entirely cured in sixty days, so great are the curative properties of those waters.

Last winter I received a letter from General Averell, who is assistant inspector-general of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, urging the passage of this bill. The letter was entirely unsolicited on my part. I ask unanimous consent that it may be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

The letter referred to is as follows:

BATH, N. Y., January 8, 1898.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I hear that there is a movement in Congress toward the establishment of a sanitarium at Hot Springs, S. Dak., for the treatment of disabled volunteer soldiers afflicted with rheumatism or other complaints. As I have been inspecting the South Dakota Soldiers' Home at that place annually since 1891, I have had uncommonly good opportunities to note the results of the use of the water by rheumatics. I have seen there many ameliorations and apparent cures of rheumatism.

A considerable percentage of members have been annually discharged from the Home, at their own request, having been cured and having become able to work at manual labor. At my first visit in 1891 I noticed a man painting a dado along the wall ascending the main stairway. He was working rapidly and skillfully and I congratulated the commandant on having so good a workman, and he remarked that the man had been brought into the Home in a blanket only a few weeks before, helpless with rheumatism. This seemed almost incredible, but it invited me to an investigation, from which, after two more inspections, came the conviction that I had learned enough to justify the recommendation of a careful, professional, and official test.

This purpose, and the reasons which supported it, were submitted to General Franklin, president of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and he authorized me to take the action that you may find described in my report of 1893, page 194. In this you will find that thirty members of the Western Branch of the National Home were selected from those who were most afflicted with rheumatism, which in several of the cases was complicated with other diseases, and some were incurable. All were thoroughly and carefully examined by a surgeon of the Home, and the diagnosis of each was recorded before their departure. On their arrival at Hot Springs, the thirty members were again carefully examined by another competent surgeon, who made a similar record to the one which had been made at the Western Branch. The same examination and record were made on their departure from Hot Springs and on their return to the Western Branch as was made sixty days before.

These patients remained under treatment only sixty days. That so many complete cures and great ameliorations of the disease of rheumatism should be effected in a period so brief is at least remarkable, and that when this disease was complicated with other diseases and it alone was eliminated, it is reasonably certain that the water is efficacious for rheumatism.

A description of the locality of Hot Springs and the analysis of the water are given in my annual report of 1891, page 40.

There is a complete set of all my reports in the library of the Military Committee of the House. Rheumatism is one of the most prevalent diseases in the Soldiers' Homes. There is a large percentage of afflicted members who are not incurable and might be cured and restored to industry for a while.

There is no question of the necessity for such a sanitarium. If several hundreds who are afflicted with rheumatism, and not too old to be moved, were sent from the Homes to an adequate sanitarium at Hot Springs, they would at once make room for worthy, needy, and eligible soldiers who are pressing for admission, and if the sanitarium was full, some of those that were cured might make their way and leave room to be filled with fresh accessions.

With the hope that this important project will receive the favorable consideration of a generous and patriotic Congress,

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. W. AVERELL, U. S. A.,

Assistant Inspector-General,

National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Hon. R. F. PETTIGREW,
United States Senate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move that the Senate further insist on its amendment. A similar amendment was in the sundry civil bill last year, and it went off in conference.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], that the Senate further insist on its amendment No. 221.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MANTLE. Mr. President, I desire to make the same motion with reference to Senate amendment No. 14. I move that the Senate further insist on that amendment. I have already spoken upon this matter, and do not wish to take any further time upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANTLE], that the Senate further insist on its amendment No. 14.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate still further insist upon its amendment No. 13, upon its amendment No. 186, and its amendments Nos. 223 and 223, and that it ask a further conference with the House of Representatives upon the disagreeing votes on these amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. ALLISON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. GORMAN were appointed.

HOOR OF MEETING.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That on and after to-morrow the hour of the daily meeting of the Senate be 11 o'clock a. m. until otherwise ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. FAULKNER and Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let it go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution will go over.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next at 11 o'clock a. m.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota. [Putting the question.] The Chair doubts.

Mr. DAVIS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LINDSAY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. McMILLAN]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. ROACH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. McLAURIN] on the main question, but I am at liberty to vote on this question, and I vote "nay."

Mr. SULLIVAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON]. He being absent, and not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON]; but on this question, or rather on the question underlying this motion, he and I agree. Therefore I am at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. WILSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO], who I think is absent on an investigation connected with the Book Concern of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. At the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], I will transfer that pair to his colleague [Mr. CHANDLER], and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], but on motions of this kind I have the liberty of voting. I vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER. I will state that my colleague [Mr. CHANDLER] has a general pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. McENERY], but on this vote he stands paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO].

Mr. MALLORY. I desire to inquire if the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont has not voted.

Mr. MALLORY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont. I do not know how he would vote on this question, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. GEAR. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. BACON. As the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE], with whom I have a general pair, is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MANTLE (after having voted in the affirmative). I should like to inquire if the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. MANTLE. I have a general pair with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 11; as follows:

ADDITIONAL CADETS.

Mr. HALE. I should like very much to have passed the bill (S. 4808) authorizing the President to appoint additional cadets at large at the United States Naval Academy, which went over yesterday on a single objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HALE and Mr. FRYE. The bill has been read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has been read.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yesterday the bill (S. 4800) to increase the efficiency of the Quartermaster's Department of the Army was passed. It has not yet gone to the House. By an oversight the word "Quartermaster's" was left out. I move that the vote by which the bill was read the third time and passed be reconsidered.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move, in line 5, to strike out the word "his" and insert "the Quartermaster's," so as to read: "labors of the Quartermaster's Department."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANNEXATION OF THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. DAVIS. I call for the regular order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 250) to provide for annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States.

Mr. TURLEY. Mr. President, when I closed yesterday I had stated that there had never been up to this time any attempt practically to pass a treaty by legislative act, but that the whole contest was on the question whether Congress practically had the power to nullify a treaty by failing to exercise such legislative action as might be necessary to put the treaty into full effect. That was the point in dispute.

Now, a little further on that point, so that I may get into my remarks how it was viewed by the men connected with the Government shortly after the adoption of the Constitution, I wish to read Chancellor Kent's view of this subject as given in the second volume of Wharton's Digest, bottom of page 23. He says:

Treaties of peace, when made by the competent powers, are obligatory upon the whole nation. If the treaty requires the payment of money to carry it into effect, and the money can not be raised but by an act of the legislature, the treaty is morally obligatory upon the legislature to pass the law, and to refuse it would be a breach of the public faith. The department of the Government that is intrusted by the Constitution with the treaty-making power is competent to bind the national faith in its discretion, for the power to make treaties of peace must be coextensive with all the exigencies of the nation, and necessarily involves in it that portion of the national sovereignty which has the exclusive direction of diplomatic negotiations and contracts with foreign powers. All treaties made by that power become of absolute efficacy because they are the supreme law of the land.

It will thus be seen that he and President Washington took the position that when a treaty was once made, if it required the appropriation of money in order to carry it into full execution, Congress is bound to make the appropriation and has no discretion to refuse it. The contrary is well expressed by Mr. Calhoun in his Discourse on Government, as quoted in 2 Wharton, bottom of page 24. He says:

The treaty-making power is limited by all the provisions of the Constitution which inhibit certain acts from being done by the Government. It is also limited by such provisions of the Constitution as direct certain acts to be done in a particular way, and which prohibit the contrary, of which a striking example is to be found in that which declares that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations to be made by law.

This not only imposes an important restriction on the power, but gives to Congress as the lawmaking power, and to the House of Representatives, as a portion of Congress, the right to withhold appropriations, and thereby an important control over the treaty-making power, whenever money is required to carry a treaty into effect, which is usually the case, especially in reference to those of the most importance. There still remains another and more important limitation, but of a more general and indefinite character. It can enter into no stipulation calculated to change the character of the Government, or to do that which can only be done by the constitution-making power, or which is inconsistent with the nature and structure of the Government.

Now, the same view is expressed by Dr. Meier, in his work on our Constitution, which is highly commended by Professor Wharton and quoted at the bottom of page 26 in his second volume. He expresses the idea as follows:

Congress has under the Constitution the right to lay taxes and imposts, as well as to regulate foreign trade, but the President and Senate, if the "treaty-making power" be regarded as absolute, would be able to evade this limitation by adopting treaties which would compel Congress to destroy its whole tariff system. According to the Constitution, Congress has the right to determine questions of naturalization, of patents, and of copyright. Yet, according to the view here contested, the President and Senate, by a treaty, could on these important questions utterly destroy the legislative capacity of the House of Representatives.

The Constitution gives Congress the control of the Army. Participation in this control would be snatched from the House of Representatives by a treaty with a foreign power by which the United States would bind itself to keep in the field an army of a particular size. The Constitution gives Congress the right of declaring war; this right would be illusory if the President and Senate could by a treaty launch the country into a foreign war. The power of borrowing money on the credit of the United States resides in Congress; this power would cease to exist if the President and Senate could by treaty bind the country to the borrowing of foreign funds.

And so on, enumerating various other powers which are expressly fixed in Congress, and which he holds can not be encroached upon by the treaty-making power. Just so, while the treaty-making power can not encroach upon these powers vested expressly in Congress, neither can the House of Representatives nor Congress in its general legislative capacity trespass upon the powers which belong to the Senate and the President legitimately under the treaty-making power.

The same principle which prevents the President and the Senate from interfering with the express powers of Congress would prevent Congress from interfering with the express treaty-making power conferred upon the President and the Senate, and hence it is that the result of this investigation and of this history establishes simply the fact that the House of Representatives has maintained that under its right to appropriate money and under other powers conferred upon it by the Constitution, after a treaty is once made and perfected, if Congress is called on to pass legislation in order to put it into effect, then it can exercise its discretion as to whether or not it will pass it, and in that way has some control over the treaty-making power.

But never has there been any claim that Congress could step in and usurp the treaty-making power by putting a treaty in the form of a joint resolution or a bill and passing it by a majority of the two Houses.

I wish for a few moments to notice the only positions upon which the joint resolution has been justified. As we all know, no argument has been addressed to the Senate in support of the constitutionality of the joint resolution, but in the course of the debate, while the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] was addressing the Senate the other day, certain suggestions were made as grounds upon which the joint resolution could rest. One was made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], and that I may be accurate I will read a portion of his remarks in the RECORD:

The right of Jefferson (and Jefferson himself had some doubt upon it, it seems) to acquire territory by treaty or in any other way was denied. It seems to me we fail to see what I think everybody ought to recognize, that it is the right of every sovereign power, every nation, to add to its territory whenever it sees fit. I assert here that the Government of the United States may add territory to territory without any constitutional provision whatever, and that must have been understood by the fathers, because that was a recognized power of sovereignty which they could not have overlooked; and if they had not intended at the time that that should be done, they would have provided against it. They did not provide against it, and in the very beginning of our administration of public affairs we took in the Louisiana purchase.

I read from the remarks of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] in Monday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The first proposition is that it is the right of every sovereign power, every nation, to add to its territory whenever it sees fit. Properly construed, that could only apply to the war-making power. Any sovereign nation whenever it sees fit can go to war. If it is unmindful of whether it has a just cause or not, on any and every occasion it can involve itself in war, and if it has power and strength enough it can conquer territory. But it is not correct to say that every sovereign nation under any and all circumstances can annex foreign territory whenever it sees fit.

Unless it is annexed by forceful measures, by war, it can only be annexed by some kind of agreement or compact, and that requires the consent of some other nation or some other people. The fact that one nation sees fit to annex territory can not accomplish the objects, leaving out the idea of conquest, but it requires the concurrent action of two nations, just as much so as it requires the consensus of two minds to make a contract between individuals.

As to the balance of this quotation, with respect to the right of every sovereign nation to annex territory, I do not disagree with that. The power to annex territory is one of the elements of sovereignty. That I admit. But when we come to view our own Government, the question becomes more complex. I do not deny and I have not argued that the Government of the United States has not the sovereign power to annex territory, but the question is how under our Constitution is it to annex the territory? Is it possible that under a Government where the general powers granted to the General Government are either expressed or such as by implication are proper to carry out expressly granted powers, we can go outside of the Constitution and say the power to acquire territory has nothing to do with the fundamental principles of our General Government?

The fact is that the Government of the United States in itself does not possess all the elements of sovereignty. It possesses certain elements of sovereignty, but not all. Take any other sovereign nation, take England, France, Germany, any civilized nation, and the central government as a general rule possesses every sovereign power, possesses the power not only to regulate and control in intercourse with foreign nations, but all sovereign powers connected with internal government.

That is not the case with our Government. Our Government is divided. Certain sovereign powers are retained by the States. Certain powers which are incident and elements of sovereignty are retained by the States. Others are expressly granted to the General Government. The principal idea is that those powers which relate mainly to intercourse with foreign nations are vested in the General Government. I do not mean those alone, but that is one of the class, while the powers with reference to internal affairs of the country are generally reserved to the States.

Yet when you take the United States and consider the General Government and the State governments together, these combined do possess every element of sovereignty, but take them separately and neither system possesses every element. Of course the acquisition of territory is a matter which pertains to the General Government. The powers granted to it are either expressed or those which by implication are proper to be exercised in order to carry out the express powers, and I repeat, as I said yesterday, when you come to the Constitution, where is the power to acquire foreign territory? It either rests under the power to admit a State or rests under the treaty-making power.

The framers of the Constitution understood international law. They were men of learning and education and great capacity. They knew then as well as we know now that the treaty-making power embraced the power to acquire foreign territory—that it was, outside of conquest and probably discovery at that time, the only means of acquiring foreign territory, and the treaty-making power was vested in the Senate and the President; and I respectfully submit that it is begging the question to say that every nation has the right to acquire foreign territory.

That I admit. But when we come to our form of government, the question is, By what means has it the right to carry such power into effect? How has the Constitution provided the means? To what branch of the Government has it intrusted the power? Not whether it has the power or not, but where does the power reside? That is the question in this debate.

The next point which is made was made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], and I believe by the Senator from Massachusetts, but I will quote from the Senator from Ohio. He first said:

I am loath to interrupt the Senator, but I have been desiring for some minutes since he got on this proposition to put a question to him. The question I desire to put is this: Would it not be competent for the Congress of the United States to prescribe by law certain terms and conditions upon which any independent government might come in and become a part of the territory of the United States by complying with the terms and conditions prescribed by the Congress of the United States?

Suppose, for instance, to make plain what I have in my mind, we should provide that any independent people or government, doing what this preamble recites the people of Hawaii have done, should, upon complying with certain conditions, those and others that we might see fit to make, become a part of our territory, they notifying us that they had complied with all the terms and conditions, could we not thereupon declare them to be annexed and make them a part of the territory of the United States, and would not that be a more competent power for the Congress than it would be for the treaty-making power?

Now, Mr. President, I submit this idea in reply to that proposition: Certainly there is nothing in the Constitution which squints at any power to pass any such law. The only line on this subject in the Constitution, outside of that lodging the treaty-making power in the Senate and the President, is the provision about the admission of new States. This proposition involves the idea of a general law, directed to every independent country in the world.

If it is good for one, if it is good for two, it is good for all. If the proposition is true, to-morrow Congress could pass a law providing that every independent power in the world, any or all of them, could become a part of the United States upon complying with certain conditions; that the most ignorant population could come in on the same terms with the most educated and intelligent; that the Malays in the Philippine Islands, or these Kanakas in Hawaii, or the negroes in Africa, any government that was an independent power, could come in on these terms and conditions.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Ohio? Mr. TURLEY. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to suggest that the point he is now making will not go to the question of power, but only to the question of policy, about which I was not talking when I made the remarks from which he is quoting. It might be good policy or bad policy in any given case.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. I will say, without going into details, it is a subject of great regret to me that upon as important a matter as this there is not a larger attendance at this time upon the part of Senators who have declined to discuss this question. I think the Senator from Ohio who has just spoken is almost the only representative of his side. I am not speaking of the large number who are here upon the other side, nor suggesting the inadequacy of a presence to prolong the discussion.

Mr. TURLEY. Now, in reply to the Senator from Ohio, I submit that when you are unable to find in the Constitution of the United States an express grant of power to do what you are seeking to accomplish, or, in other words, if a proposition is submitted as constitutional and it can not be found expressly within the Constitution, or it does not appear to be necessary and inherently proper to carry out some expressly granted power, then it is a legitimate argument to see where it leads in order to determine whether the framers of the Constitution have intended to vest it where it is claimed it has been vested. In other words, I submit that in all doubtful questions—

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Tennessee excuse me for interrupting him again?

Mr. TURLEY. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not mean to express, and I hope the Senator did not understand me by anything I said when making the remarks which he has quoted to express, an opinion as to whether that would be good policy or bad policy. I was simply speaking of the question of power and giving that as an illustration of what I thought might possibly be done, and constitutionally. It does not follow that because I think that could be constitutionally done I would advocate it as a good measure.

Mr. TURLEY. Certainly I did not understand the Senator from Ohio as saying that any such proposition would be good policy, but I understand him to say to me now that the position I am arguing is one of policy, and that what I say throws no light on the question of power. I do not think I mistake him on the point that my argument is applicable to the question of the policy of the idea and not to the question whether the power really exists.

Now, what I am attempting to reply is, if you are seeking in the Constitution some power which is not expressly granted or which is not clearly granted, in other words, if as a court or as Senators here determining upon the constitutionality of the question there may be doubt as to whether power exists under the Constitution to do certain things, it is a legitimate argument to see where that power would lead us to if it exists. In other words, we may argue against the existence of the power from the fact that great danger and peril would come to the country if such power really exists. I mean in all doubtful cases.

Of course, if it is an expressly granted power there can be no question of it; but wherever it is a question of doubt as to whether the power exists, if we see that the existence of the power would be dangerous, that its exercise would threaten the destruction of the country, we may then look to that as a reason for saying the framers of the Constitution never intended to vest in any branch of the Government the right to exercise such power.

So I say now that if the question had been asked in the convention which framed the Constitution, "Have we invested Congress or do we intend to invest Congress with power to pass a law under which every independent nation existing on the globe can come into this compact and into this Government and become inherent parts of it?" the reply would have been in the negative, that it never entered the minds of the framers of the Constitution that they were investing Congress or any department of the Government with the power by any such law as is referred to in this proposition to admit into this Union or into this Government as component parts of it any existing power in the world.

Now, I go a step further to the next proposition. The Senator from Ohio very frankly admits that if a foreign power were by agreement to cede us a part of its territory upon certain terms and conditions agreed upon, it would necessarily have to be done by treaty. I will read the whole quotation:

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me just one word further, I agree with almost all he has said; but at the point where I differ from him the difference becomes vital. I think that when you make a compact with a foreign power it must be in the nature of a treaty, but that contemplates the continued existence of the foreign power. Therefore, if a foreign power were by agreement to cede to us a part of its territory upon certain terms and conditions agreed upon, it would necessarily have to be done by treaty.

And further on he says:

In a word—

In order to understand this proposition, I will read a little from what the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] said:

Mr. President, I am utterly unable to see the force of that argument. It is in either case an agreement by which sovereignty existing over certain territory is abandoned, or rather annulled, and by which the sovereignty of this country is given to it. Why should the change of sovereignty as to a part be the subject-matter of negotiation and the change of sovereignty as to the whole be not the subject-matter of negotiation?

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] replied:

In a word I can answer that. Because there is no continuance of a compact. The whole thing is at an end by its consummation.

Now, the idea seems to be this, if I understand it, and it is very plainly and clearly expressed, that even though the right to be gained has its inception in a compact or agreement, still if it is not a continuing compact, if, in the language of the Senator, there is no continuance of a compact, then it ceases practically to be the subject-matter of treaty; in other words, that only those things have necessarily to be done by treaty which are done between two nations which continue in existence, and where there is a continuity of the contract or a continuance of the contract.

I produced authorities yesterday and discussed the proposition that a treaty is simply a contract between two sovereign powers; that nations deal with each other by treaty like individuals do by contract. It is no objection to the validity of a contract as a contract, it does not deprive it of its character as a contract, that it is consummated in its execution; that there is no continuity in it; that it ends when it is made; that it is one act and there is nothing further to be done.

Every deed, every grant where the money is paid, is a contract of that sort. There is no continuity in it. There is no continuance; nothing further to be done. It is ended completely, just as the treaty by which Russia conveyed to us Alaska. When the money was paid, it was an ended contract, as every executed contract is.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TURLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will not be interrupted I should like to ask a question.

I listened with a great deal of interest to his discussion of the term "treaty" and his definition of what is meant by the word "treaty." I understood him to define it yesterday, as he has repeated to-day, that a treaty is simply a contract between sovereign powers. He also insisted, as other Senators have done, that the treaty is not a treaty until it is consummated.

Of course everybody agrees with him as to that. The treaty that was negotiated between this Government and the Hawaiian Republic, therefore, has never become a treaty. It has been simply negotiated. It will be a treaty if it shall be ratified, and not otherwise. Until the moment of its ratification there is no contract between Hawaii and the United States.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President—

Mr. SPOONER. What of the cession which you say you accept?

Mr. WHITE. That is exactly what I was about to ask.

Mr. FORAKER. The one referred to in the joint resolution? I will come to that in a moment. A great deal has been said, if the Senator from Tennessee will not object—

Mr. TURLEY. I do not object.

Mr. FORAKER. I will take occasion now, as other Senators have interrogated me, to make answer to that.

Mr. TURLEY. I do not object.

Mr. FORAKER. A great deal has been said about the word "cession" being used here.

Mr. WHITE. It is in the preamble.

Mr. FORAKER. It might be that in framing this, if I had framed it, I would not have used that word, but I see no objection to the use of it, used as it has been used. The "said cession," the resolution reads, is accepted. What cession? That which is referred to in the preamble which immediately precedes, and in the preamble the facts are correctly recited, for the preamble recites that a treaty has been negotiated; in other words, that, in accordance with the provision of the constitution of the Hawaiian Republic, the Hawaiian Government has negotiated and done all it can do and all that it is necessary for it to do to manifest its willingness to make an agreement on its part to cede the territory belonging to the Republic of Hawaii. Then follows the resolution, and referring to that preamble and to that transaction, it uses the expression, "said cession." Nobody can misunderstand that language as it is thus employed.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. LINDSAY. If it will not disturb the Senator, I should like to present this idea to him.

Mr. FORAKER. I am answering a question and I hope not to get too far away from it.

Mr. LINDSAY. This will be pertinent, I think, to the question.

Mr. FORAKER. Very well.

Mr. LINDSAY. The cession named in the act is the cession provided for in the treaty, as I understand it.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. LINDSAY. Article 7 of the treaty provides:

This treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, on the one part.

I wish to ask the Senator whether a joint resolution, concurred in by the two Houses but passed through the Senate by less than a two-thirds majority, can be treated as equivalent to the ratification of a treaty by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate?

Mr. FORAKER. It is not precisely the same thing, but the legal effect of the whole transaction is necessarily the same, according to the view I entertain of the power of Congress with respect to that particular matter, because the result is an absolute cession of the territory belonging to the Republic of Hawaii and an absolute acceptance of it on the part of the United States. Now, I shall show why that is so.

Mr. LINDSAY. One other question, and then I will not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. LINDSAY. After this joint resolution shall have been adopted and approved by the President and presented to the Hawaiian authorities, I ask the Senator if they will not have a perfect right to refuse to accept the benefit of the joint resolution upon the ground that a treaty has not been ratified by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States?

Mr. FORAKER. Undoubtedly they would have a right to ignore all the action that they took previously having reference to the negotiation and ratification of the treaty. They could treat this whole question de novo and take action with respect to this. I do not know that anybody ever contended for the contrary.

What I am commenting upon is that which the Senator from California called my attention to. The employment of the word "cession" here is not ambiguous and it is not an inappropriate word to employ, because it has reference to something that immediately precedes, which is clearly defined, and which is in strict accordance with the facts.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. We all know the Senator from Ohio is distinguished in law as he is in other avocations. I wish to ask him whether he does not think a cession means a grant, and whether a grant does not presuppose not merely the execution of an adequate instrument, but its acceptance by the grantee, and if that must not be so in the case of a cession?

Mr. FORAKER. Undoubtedly. I stated when I first touched upon this matter that if I had been drafting this resolution I might have employed a different word. But what the word ordinarily means is not necessarily what we are to be governed by here. We must look at the whole instrument and see what it is that the word is intended to mean. When you look at the whole instrument the word "cession," as there employed, has reference to the preamble, and whether it be a correct description of that which the Hawaiian Republic has done or not, it can not mislead anybody, because, interpreted in the light of the context, it simply means to refer to the fact that the people of Hawaii have done all in their power necessary for them to do to manifest to the people of the United States a willingness on their part to cede all their territory to the United States upon the terms and conditions here imposed.

Now, that is all that word means; all it can be made by anybody to mean; all that it can be claimed that it means. Of course it is true that the ordinary interpretation of the word "cession" would imply a consummated transaction—a deed, a bargain, sale, conveyance; but we have to interpret this word according to its context.

Now, coming back to the point where I was when I was interrupted and addressing myself to the point I wanted to make to the Senator from Tennessee, if I recollect correctly I had gotten far enough along to call attention to the fact that he had been arguing there could not be any treaty or any contract until the consummation of it. His contention was that a treaty was simply a contract and that there was not a contract until the treaty was ratified. That contention is correct. A treaty can not be anything but a contract, and there can not be a contract until we approve. But, Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee will not differ from me when I say there can be no contract unless there be at least two parties to it.

The very minute that there ceases to be two parties to it there is no longer a contract; it is something else; there is no mutuality. The Senator and all the other Senators on his side of the question have argued that there is nothing here, no cession, no contract, on treaty, until this transaction is consummated. Now, I ask Senators to state whether or not there is a contract after it has been consummated. I am speaking of the treaty and not of this resolution. After this treaty shall have been ratified by the Senate, as we were requested by the President of the United States to ratify it, will there be any continuing contract?

No, certainly not; for in the consummation of that transaction the Republic of Hawaii ceases to be, and it is an absurdity on the face of things to say that there can be a continuing contract and that it ought to be a treaty for that reason between the United States and a power that is no longer in existence. Therefore it is that I say—

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President—

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator from California will allow me just a moment, I say there are cases in which territory may be ceded where it is not at all the proper subject-matter, according to the view I take of it, for a treaty.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to inquire of my friend from Ohio whether the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which he is a member, did not report and earnestly advocate, until within a very short period past, the adoption of such a treaty absurdity as that which he describes?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I did not mean to say that this particular case was an absurdity. I should have said there might be cases where it would be an absurdity to contend that a cession of territory could be acquired only by treaty. But I will say to the Senator from California that I never did have the idea that this was a proper subject-matter for treaty, and I will tell you why. Let me put a case. When we took the Louisiana purchase by treaty, we did not take all the territory of France, but only a certain designated portion of it—that in this country, and that described by the treaty.

If we had taken that territory without anything more being stipulated for than merely the payment of a certain sum of money, the whole transaction would have been consummated when the treaty was signed and the money was paid, and that would have been the end of it. That might have been done, I contend, by an offer on the part of France to cede to us that territory and an acceptance on the part of the Government of the United States and the appropriation of the money by the Congress of the United States and the payment of that money. That would have closed it all.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President—

Mr. FORAKER. But, if you will allow me just a moment, there was something else in that treaty. Certain rights were preserved to the people living in that territory, and we stipulated that those rights should be preserved to them. Therefore, there was a continuing obligation, and there were two contracting parties continuing after the consummation of the transaction, the one to enforce the transaction as against the other. That was a case of a continuing contract. It was a proper case for a treaty. It could not have been anything else, having that continuing obligation, except only a case of treaty.

Now, suppose another case. Suppose England were to-day to offer to cede to the United States the Bermuda Islands for the payment of a stipulated sum of money and that was all there was of it. Suppose she were to say to us, in a proper way, "Pay us $5,000,000 and take those islands." I think we could take them, and take them constitutionally, if we would simply say, "Here is your money; we accept your offer." It would not have to be by treaty, although there would be two parties remaining in existence to the transaction to enforce the contract, if there were any contract to enforce or anything to be enforced.

But suppose that instead of saying, "Take these islands for so much money, cash down," England should say, "We propose that you shall take them for so much money, but you shall guarantee to us the enjoyment of a coaling station, which we reserve, and guarantee to us certain other rights in these islands which heretofore we have enjoyed," and suppose we had accepted her offer upon those terms; that would of necessity be the subject-matter for a treaty, because, after the consummation of the contract by the signing of it, there would remain two existing parties to it, one to enforce it against the other, and there would remain certain rights and conditions upon which they had stipulated. It could not be anything else than the subject-matter of a treaty.

But this is a wholly different case. Here comes the Republic of Hawaii and says: "We are authorized by the constitution of our Government to enter into a treaty for the cession of these islands to the United States. We have entered into such a treaty upon our part; here it is; we propose it; we offer it to you. Will you ratify it?"

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me to ask him whether there can be a treaty unless both parties have agreed to it, and whether, therefore, the provisions of the Hawaiian constitution have been to any extent complied with?

Mr. FORAKER. I will answer the Senator from California at as full length as he desires if he will only let me finish the proposition which I was about to put.

The Hawaiian Republic comes and says not that "we are willing to cede to you one of our group of islands in order that you may make a coaling station there;" not that "we are willing to cede to you a part of our territory for some stipulated purpose and upon certain stipulated conditions;" but she says, "We come and we give to you all our territory, and upon your acceptance of this proposition we cease absolutely and forever to be."

Mr. President, there is not any contract, and, therefore, no treaty, until that proposition has been accepted and ratified by a two-thirds vote of the Senate—until that moment there is absolutely nothing that has any legal effect or binding force whatsoever upon anybody.

Is there anything in the nature of a treaty remaining after its acceptance? There are two parties to a contract necessarily. Can there be two parties when only one party is still in existence? The Hawaiian Republic, according to this proposition, ceases to exist the very moment this transaction is consummated. In the consummation of it one party perishes.

Therefore, Mr. President, there is not any contract remaining; and, according to the definition insisted upon by Senators who are arguing here in opposition, there is no treaty, for they tell us with grave emphasis that a treaty is a contract. That is true; but you can not have a contract, and therefore you can not have a treaty, unless you have two parties to it. The very moment you destroy one of the parties your treaty is gone, your contract is gone. But suppose now within a year after this treaty, if it should be ratified and would be consummated—suppose within a year after its ratification we should refuse to pay the money or do something else that it is stipulated we are to do upon the consummation of that transaction, would there be anybody in existence to compel us to do it?

The Republic of Hawaii would be no longer in existence; the Republic of Hawaii, with all the machinery of government, perishes the very minute this transaction is consummated, and the people of Hawaii become subjects of the United States; they become merged with us; they cast in their lot with us; they can not call us to account; it is our common obligation, and they treat with us, relying that we will act in good faith, and they take the risk of that. There would be a treaty, an executed instrument, but no longer in existence except only as a consummated transaction, because there would be nobody to enforce the provisions of it.

Therefore it is, Mr. President, that I say with respect to this matter of acquiring territory that there are cases where of necessity, it seems to me, the acquisition should be by treaty, and there are cases—and this is one of them—where the acquisition should be by a legislative act of Congress. I see no difficulty about the acquisition of the territory of Hawaii in this way for the reasons I have undertaken to state.

I have occupied so much of the time of the Senator from Tennessee that I owe him an apology. I did not think I would interrupt him to this extent, and would not have done so had not other Senators joined in with interrogatories.

Mr. TURLEY. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him where he gets his constitutional power to annex by a joint resolution?

Mr. FORAKER. I will ask the Senator from Nebraska where he gets his constitutional power to annex by treaty? The Constitution of the United States is silent on that subject. What does the Constitution of the United States say about the annexation of territory? Not one word. It is one of the implied powers; and I contend that it is inherent. But Senators here take exception to that, and say this is a Government of limited powers; that the organic law of this country is the Constitution made by the people thereof; and they say the General Government has no power except only that which is delegated.

Pass by, for the sake of argument, the proposition that it is an inherent power of our sovereignty, as it is of sovereignty generally, and I answer the Senator that it is included within the implied powers. The Congress of the United States is especially empowered to promote the general welfare. If the acquisition of an island in the sea be necessary to the promotion of our general welfare, Congress is expressly endowed by the Constitution with power to acquire it.

It is not necessary that I should speak about the war power. I do not rest my purpose to vote for this acquisition upon anything connected with the war. I was just as unequivocally and unqualifiedly for the acquisition of Hawaii a year ago or ten years ago as I am now. The war has but developed the necessity which those favoring the acquisition of Hawaii foresaw years ago would be developed whenever we might come to such a time as we have now reached, when we are in war, and when we are required to keep a navy in the Pacific in order that we may protect our interests.

So I say, Mr. President, if the Congress of the United States sees fit, in the exercise of her power to promote the general welfare, to annex this island or any other, it is competent for Congress to do so.

Mr. ALLEN. Then I will ask the Senator another question, with his permission—

Mr. FORAKER. I will say I mean in this kind of a case, with the limitations I stated a while ago.

Mr. ALLEN. Have we the power to deal with any foreign nation except by treaty?

Mr. FORAKER. I think so, undoubtedly.

Mr. ALLEN. I think we have not.

Mr. FORAKER. There is no provision in the Constitution which says we can not deal with other nations otherwise than by treaty.

Mr. ALLEN. That is not the question. The question is whether we have the power to do it.

Mr. FORAKER. The Supreme Court of the United States held that there was such a power under the reciprocity clause of the McKinley Act—

Mr. ALLEN. That was by treaty.

Mr. FORAKER. It was not by treaty.

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly it was.

Mr. FORAKER. No; we simply provided by law that whenever the President of the United States should ascertain a certain fact, he then might make a certain declaration which would govern the rates of duty on imports from certain countries. There was no treaty about it.

Mr. ALLEN. We authorized the President of the United States to enter into a treaty by reciprocity.

Mr. FORAKER. But the Senate did not ratify it, and the President did not enter into any treaty. He simply ascertained certain facts. The Supreme Court of the United States held that it was constitutional for Congress to so provide, because it was only an exercise of administrative power, and the President was engaged only in administrative acts when he ascertained those facts.

Mr. ALLEN. Congress authorized the President to consummate certain things if he found the existence of certain facts. The act of Congress, together with the act of the President, made a treaty.

Mr. FORAKER. But the House did not join in it except to help make the law. The Senator was talking about a treaty which the Senate ratified. The Senator from Nebraska, if he will stop and think for a minute, will see that the suggestion involved in his interrogatory is not at all tenable, not only in that case, but in many others, doubtless.

Mr. ALLEN. I can not myself conceive of an instance where we can deal with another nation involving the question of jurisdiction or territory independent of the methods of a treaty.

Mr. FORAKER. We did so deal in the case I put. I do not think of any others now, but there are doubtless others, and I will try to think of some of them by the next session of the Senate.

But, however that may be, this is a case where, if I am right in the view I have undertaken to express, it is not proper to deal with it by treaty, at least not so proper as to deal with it by an act of Congress.

When I so express myself as to indicate that I think it might in some sense be proper to deal with it by treaty, I want to be understood. The explanation is this: When they undertake to negotiate a treaty on the other side, and we join with them in agreeing to a treaty, and it is submitted to the legislative branch yonder and to the Senate here, and is ratified and becomes a treaty, although it may not be the proper subject-matter of a treaty, it amounts to the same thing in legal effect as legislation, because it is the expression of a willingness and the offer on their side to make a cession and a willingness and an actual acceptance on our part of that which has been offered.

That is all there is in the legislative act, and the one is therefore the equivalent of the other in ultimate results. I think it is more regular to do it as we are now proposing to do it than by treaty, because, as I say, you can not have a treaty without having a contract, and you can not have a contract without having two parties to it.

Mr. ALLEN. That is true.

Mr. FORAKER. And if one party disappears on the signing of the contract you no longer have a contract.

Mr. WHITE. What becomes of it?

Mr. ALLEN. There are two parties to the contract up to the moment of its execution.

Mr. FORAKER. But there is no contract until it is executed.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well; the moment the contract is signed and delivered it is an executed contract.

Mr. FORAKER. But one party is dead and the contract can not continue as the term "treaty" implies.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well; but that party did not die until after the delivery of the contract.

Mr. FORAKER. Suppose you do not pay the money, who will there be to enforce payment? The people of Hawaii become merged into the United States.

Mr. ALLEN. What is true of a treaty with the United States is true of any treaty.

Mr. FORAKER. No; it is not true of any treaty, because when the term "treaty" is properly employed it has relation to a continuing contract between sovereignties—sovereignties which will exist after the contract.

Mr. ALLEN. Not necessarily.

Mr. FORAKER. As in the case I undertook to put before, as an illustration, of England ceding to us the Bermudas. She would part with a portion of her territory by treaty. That would be by contract, and she would remain in existence to execute and enforce the contract according to its terms and provisions, if we did not.

Mr. ALLEN. But the fact that one party may die after the execution of the contract does not change the binding force of the contract.

Mr. FORAKER. What I wanted to say to the Senator, and what I have been trying to say all the while, is that while you can legitimately annex these islands by what we call a treaty, yet you can just as legitimately do it, and more appropriately do it, by an act of Congress, by a joint resolution. You can do it more appropriately, because, in the first instance, when you undertake to do it by treaty the transaction amounts to nothing more than a tender on the part of one side and an acceptance on the part of the other, and that is all there is in the legislation that we are now considering.

Mr. ALLEN. That is a ground I contest seriously.

Mr. FORAKER. Allow me to say further to the Senator, I wanted to finish the answer to the other question.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to say this, that I have not any more doubt about the lack of power to annex the Hawaiian Islands—the lack of constitutional power outside of treaty methods or regulations—than I have of my existence, not the slightest. It is only an indirect way of undertaking to destroy the necessity of having a two-thirds majority for a treaty in this Chamber.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, whatever may be the purpose, the Senator can have any interpretation of that he wants; that is not what I am talking about. If we had two-thirds, no doubt the treaty would have been ratified; but from the beginning, as I have been contending throughout this debate whenever I have taken occasion to say anything at all, I have contended that it is more appropriate to do this by legislation, for the reasons I have indicated.

Mr. SPOONER rose.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will wait until I answer the Senator from Nebraska. I shall be glad to answer the Senator from Wisconsin or anybody else if the Senator from Tennessee will allow me. This is one of those questions I have convictions about. They may be wrong, but I have them and I have my reasons for them, and nobody can ask me any question which I can not at least undertake to answer and give the reason why I entertain that opinion.

Senators talk about it being unconstitutional to annex except only by treaty, as though the Constitution of the United States had provided that there should be annexation by treaty. Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States is silent on the question of the annexation of territory. It does not seem to have entered into the minds of the framers of the Constitution to put into that instrument any express provision on that subject. They contented themselves, as they wisely did with other subjects, in regard to this subject with a general provision. They gave to Congress the power to promote the general welfare, and that carries along all the implied powers essential to the consummation of that purpose.

When they came to the treaty-making power they did not say in the Constitution what should be the subject-matter of a treaty. They simply said that treaties might be negotiated by the President, subject to ratification by the Senate; they did not say what we should treat about, and I agree with Senators on the other side that a treaty is a contract. You can not have a contract unless you have two parties to it, and you do not have any contract—that has been your contention throughout—until the treaty has been signed on both sides. The very minute that is done one of the parties is gone, and there is no continuing contract. Therefore it is simply a cession on their part and an acceptance on ours, and it might be done just as well by legislation as otherwise.

Mr. CLAY. I understood the Senator to say that a treaty was a contract which required two parties—

Mr. FORAKER. At least two.

Mr. CLAY. Two parties or more; and if we accepted this territory one party was done away with, and therefore this is not a treaty, and that we could acquire this territory by legislation instead of by a treaty.

Now, I should like to ask the Senator, if that be true, is not his position simply this: That if we treat with the Government of those islands for a part of the islands, they reserving the balance of them, then it would be a treaty and it would require a treaty to acquire that territory; in other words, if we simply take a part of the country, then a treaty is necessary to acquire it; but if we take the whole of it, then it requires simply legislation. Is that the position of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FORAKER. I stated that position here without any qualification in that way a few days ago when engaged in a colloquy with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. I want to qualify it, as I should have done at the time, to this extent: There may be cases, as I have already illustrated in the remarks I have been making now, where it is not necessarily the subject-matter of a treaty to accept a part of the territory of a foreign country, but in most cases it would be, and I illustrated that—the Senator was not here, and I will be pardoned for repeating the illustration—by supposing that England were to-day to offer to cede to us the Bermuda Islands—

Mr. CLAY. Or Canada.

Mr. FORAKER. Or anything. Suppose she would offer to cede to us one of her islands in the sea for a stipulated sum of money and the Congress of the United States, or the President of the United States, representing both, would signify our willingness to accept and we should appropriate the money and pay it, it would not be necessary to have any treaty about it, I apprehend.

There is nothing in the Constitution which requires a treaty. It is a tender on one side and an acceptance on the other, but if, instead of making it in that simple way, she were to tender to us one of those islands for so much money, saying: "I will give you the island, subject, however, to the right, which I reserve, and which you guarantee to me for the enjoyment through all time to come, of a coaling station," or of some other right or privilege there, where she has been heretofore supreme, and we were to accept the cession subject to the terms and conditions, there would be a continuing obligation, and there would be two continuing contracting parties, one of which could enforce it against the other, and that would of necessity, as it seems to me, be a proper case for a treaty, and not a case for acceptance by an act of Congress.

But that is not this case, and I want to distinguish this case from that. I say, as a broad proposition, that the Congress of the United States has power expressly given to it to promote the general welfare, and if we deem it a promotion of the general welfare to acquire any island of the sea that has its own government—but I will take the case before us—if we deem it to be a promotion of the general welfare to accept the cession from the Republic of Hawaii of all its territory, one of the conditions being that the Republic of Hawaii ceases to be, it is not a proper case for a treaty, for the very minute the treaty is consummated there is no treaty—there is no contract, for one of the contracting parties is politically dead and gone.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me again a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. FORAKER. I yield by the permission of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TURLEY], who is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. I beg the Senator's pardon. This resolution recites in the preamble that "the Republic of Hawaii having, in due form, signified its consent" for the cession of its sovereignty. Then it resolves:

That said cession is accepted, ratified, and confirmed.

Is not that a treaty, if the joint resolution passes?

Mr. FORAKER. If it is, then all the objections which have been urged to this resolution fall to the ground, for the objectors say they would not object if it was a treaty. I am assuming, for the sake of this argument, that their objections are well taken, that it is not a treaty, but a joint resolution or an act of Congress. I have said it is equivalent to a treaty.

Mr. ALLEN. What I want to call the attention of the Senator to is this, that it recognizes the existence of two parties to this transaction, the Republic of Hawaii on the one hand and the Government of the United States upon the other, and the necessity of the consent of both of these parties to annexation. What is that contract, treaty, or stipulation between these sovereigns?

Mr. FORAKER. With that question I am not concerned.

Mr. ALLEN. I think the Senator ought to be concerned.

Mr. FORAKER. I am perfectly willing to be concerned in order that I may accommodate the Senator from Nebraska. What I meant to say was—not to cavalierly dismiss the question the Senator would ask—the character of my argument does not involve a consideration of that matter.

The question before us is whether it is competent to acquire this territory by act of Congress, it being conceded that it would be competent, as I understand it is conceded to acquire it by treaty. I have said I think it would be competent to acquire it either way, and I explained why. But I have said also that I think it would be more appropriate to acquire it by joint resolution or by bill, by act of Congress, as we are now proposing to acquire it, than by treaty, for the reasons I have given.

It is true that the joint resolution recites that the Republic of Hawaii have indicated a willingness to make a cession of that territory. We do not say they have ceded it.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. FORAKER. Let us see if we do. I interpreted that word a while ago, but I think the Senator from Nebraska was not in the Chamber at the time. Let me read the whole of it, so that it may go into the RECORD, and so that what we are saying may be understood:

Joint resolution to provide for annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States.

Whereas the Government of the Republic of Hawaii having, in due form, signified its consent, in the manner provided by its constitution—

That is true, is it not?—

to cede absolutely and without reserve to the United States of America all rights of sovereignty of whatever kind in and over the Hawaiian Islands and their dependencies, and also to cede and transfer to the United States the absolute fee and ownership of all public government, or crown lands, public buildings or edifices, ports, harbors, military equipment, and all other public property of every kind and description belonging to the Government of the Hawaiian Islands, together with every right and appurtenance thereunto appertaining: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That said cession is accepted, etc.

Now, what I say is that while the word "cession" ordinarily would imply that a cession had been actually made, that the deed had been signed, that it was in full force and effect, you must construe the word "cession" as there employed in the light of the context it refers to, the preamble; and when you refer to the preamble you see the word "cession" properly interpreted means nothing more as here used than a declaration on our part that we will accept the tender which they have expressed a willingness to make. Whether the word was appropriately used or not, that is what it means of necessity.

Mr. ALLEN. When we pass this resolution and it becomes a law, the transaction is consummated except the delivery of the property.

Mr. FORAKER. It would have to be accepted on the other side. This is not the ratification of a treaty. We can not by a joint resolution annex Hawaii.

Mr. ALLEN. But the joint resolution says so.

Mr. FORAKER. We can recite the fact that they have manifested a willingness, as shown by the treaty which we had in mind when that joint resolution was drafted, to make a cession to us; but when we do not ratify the treaty, but do something else, namely, pass a joint resolution, the transaction is not consummated until they agree to it.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me a word further?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. The joint resolution reads:

That said cession is accepted, ratified, and confirmed, and that the said Hawaiian Islands and their dependencies be, and they are hereby, annexed as a part of the territory of the United States and are subject to the sovereign dominion thereof, and that all and singular the property and rights hereinbefore mentioned are vested in the United States of America.

Mr. FORAKER. I say the whole phrase must be interpreted, as I said a while ago, in the light of the preamble. The language of the resolution refers to the preamble; and what is already recited in the preamble? Not a cession actually made, but a willingness to make a cession, an expressed, manifest desire that they should be annexed to the United States, and that we are willing to accept them.

I admit that ordinarily the language would go further than that, but you must interpret it in the light of the preamble. I say it is not a consummated transaction; it does not seem so to me, at any rate, when we simply pass this resolution, because we can not by a resolution affect the territories of other countries without their consent.

Mr. ALLEN. If I make a written proposition to transfer to the Senator certain property for a certain consideration and he accepts that in writing, is not that a consummated contract except so far as the mere fact of delivery is concerned?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, it is.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well. When the Hawaiian Government, without any restriction or proviso, say they transfer their sovereignty to us, and we say we accept the transfer and thereby assume jurisdiction over that property, is not that a consummated contract?

Mr. FORAKER. I say this in regard to that, if the Senator from Nebraska will allow me, that they have made a tender to us. That is consummated upon our unqualified acceptance of it; but the recital of the preamble is only that they have manifested this willingness; but if this resolution goes to the extent that the Senator from Nebraska contends, I certainly do not object to it. I should be glad if the transaction were closed by the mere passing of this resolution. It may be possible that that may be the construction of it, and, if so, I would be pleased.

Mr. ALLEN. The question I regard as of the most importance is this: The proffered cession by the Hawaiian Government and the passage of this resolution recognize two parties to the transaction. Is not that correct?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. Now, suppose one of the parties dies absolutely on the passage of this law as completely as by an ordinary treaty?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly; and for that reason and because the whole transaction is ended I say it ought to be by act of Congress instead of by treaty.

Mr. ALLEN. If one of the parties dies by virtue of the passage of the joint resolution, why should we adopt this form?

Mr. FORAKER. We ought to adopt this form, as I have been trying to explain all the while, because, in my judgment, it is better to make a contract by legislation for the acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands than by a treaty, which is not, rightly considered, a contract executed by its consummation, but a continuing contract.

Mr. ALLEN. Not necessarily so.

Mr. FORAKER. I think it is necessarily so, or, at least, more properly so. Take the case I put a while ago of a cession by England to this country of an island, with the reservation of certain rights which we guarantee to preserve for her and protect her in the enjoyment of. That is a case for a treaty, because there is an existing contract which is to continue through years, and there are two parties to it. If it is a transaction that is consummated by merely signing the documentary evidence of it, I do not think it is necessary to have it by treaty.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to say that there can be no force in what the Senator says, if he will permit me, on this proposition, because the Hawaiian Republic dies as quickly and as effectively by the passage of this resolution as by the adoption of the treaty.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly; that is what I claim. It dies, no matter which way you consummate it; and because it dies alike in both cases, this is the preferable way.

Mr. ALLEN. Then, why should we throw aside all the traditions of our Government and all the precedents and undertake to avoid the constitutional objections of the necessity of two-thirds to ratify a treaty and adopt this resolution by a majority?

Mr. FORAKER. I say you do not throw away any tradition, nor do you throw away any precedent; on the contrary, you conform to the precedents in so far as precedent has anything at all to do with it. I know the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] made a very able argument the other day to distinguish between the acquisition of Texas and the annexation of the Hawaiian Republic, the one being the admission of a State into the Union and the other the admission of territory, but in no case similar to this has it been held that you could not annex by statute or by joint resolution, because we have never had any such case. Then why should Senators talk about precedents and traditions?

Mr. ALLEN. I submit to the Senator that the question was submitted to a popular vote of the people of Texas.

Mr. FORAKER. If that is the point of objection, we are not talking about that. I have heard a great deal said about the people of Hawaii being consulted on this matter and about the iniquities of this thing on that account; that we should order a plebiscite and take the sentiment of the people there. Why, Mr. President, Senators who manifest such concern about the people of Hawaii being consulted about this matter seem to have overlooked the fact that the people of Hawaii have never in all their history been consulted in respect to the character of their government. They adopted a constitution in 1840, the first they ever had. Until that time they had an unlimited monarchy.

How did they get that constitution? The King simply promulgated it. Nobody was consulted. In 1852, when that constitution was changed, the people were not consulted. The King then simply promulgated an amended constitution. In 1864 they had the same thing over again; in 1887 the same thing again, and in 1893 Queen Liliuokalani was proceeding to do the same thing, and that precipitated the rebellion of that time.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President—

Mr. FORAKER. Let me say further, before I conclude, that her predecessor had been elected by a legislative body, which consisted, I believe, of thirty or forty members. He had a majority of the legislative body, a very large majority, but when he was elected, the people, whom we are told must be consulted in all these things, rose in a riot; they had anarchy, they broke into the Government house, and undertook to murder the man who had been elected to be their King; and why and how was murder prevented?

Mr. President, it was prevented by the marines of two United States ships, which happened to be there in the harbor, being landed and being marched up to the Government house, taking possession, holding it for ten days, until that King who had been elected without any consultation of the people could be firmly established upon the throne he had taken. This talk about consulting the people of Hawaii is unusual in two respects.

The idea that our Government should go behind the Government of Hawaii in order to consult the citizens of that Republic is a thing unheard of in international law and diplomacy, and in the second place it is an extraordinary manifestation of interest in the suffrage rights of a people who never had any suffrage rights, who never were consulted in any case.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator hold to the doctrine that the legislative and executive power of the Hawaiian Islands can transfer the sovereignty of that power and destroy its Government without consulting the people?

Mr. FORAKER. I hold that there is a Government in Hawaii, and that Government is called the Republic of Hawaii. It is acknowledged to be the lawful Government and the only Government in the islands of Hawaii, acknowledged not only by this Government, but by all the governments of the world that have acted in the matter at all, recognized as the true and lawful Government of the islands of Hawaii, and I say it is competent for that Government to act.

It is not for us to look how it was established, although I have no hesitation to look at that. I find no trouble about that. When that Government thus recognized sees fit to enter into a treaty with us, it would be an extraordinary thing if we were to undertake to consult the people behind it in order to see whether or not they were willing that their constituted authorities should make the kind of treaty they have proposed.

Mr. ALLEN. Then the Senator holds to the doctrine that the legislative branch of the Government, or any branch, or all combined, who are the agents of the Government to carry out its purpose, may lawfully and constitutionally overturn and destroy that of which they are the agents?

Mr. FORAKER. Unquestionably, when they are authorized to do so; and they are authorized by the constitution of Hawaii to do that very thing.

Mr. ALLEN. But it was established during a revolution.

Mr. FORAKER. Suppose it was. Is it not the lawful government? What was the revolution in Hawaii? There was not anything done in connection with the revolution that you and I and every Senator would not have joined in doing if we had been there.

Mr. BACON. I beg to enter a disclaimer for myself.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President—

Mr. PETTIGREW. There is not a Senator on this floor who would be a party to such a transaction, and I will show that clearly before I get through.

Mr. FORAKER. That is a matter of opinion. I have read the history of that transaction in Hawaii, and I do not see that there was anything done by the representative of the United States in Hawaii that ought not to have been done to protect the property interests of our citizens and to protect the honor and dignity of this country.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me to say it—it may not be very germane, but I have no doubt—I was in the Chamber when the revolution took place—that the act of Mr. Stevens was absolutely and inexcusably unlawful, and if President Cleveland had promptly taken steps to right it and had not waited months and months until a change of government took place, I would have been one of the Senators who would have supported him.

Mr. FORAKER. After all that has been said, I say again, as I said before, that that is a matter of opinion. I have my opinion, and I say, having read the history of this transaction, that the representatives of the United States, and particularly Mr. Stevens, did not do anything in Hawaii with respect to the revolution which it was not their duty to do; and the fact that they landed the marines there is no more potent objection than when the marines were landed a few years ago, to which I called attention a few minutes ago.

Mr. CAFFERY. This discussion is very interesting. I have not heard the whole of it, but I should like to know the Senator's position on the matter of the treaty. If I state his position correctly, I will follow it with a question. If I do not, the Senator will correct me. I think he stated that the Hawaiian Government authorized a tender, made a tender, of the territory of Hawaii; did not absolutely cede it, because they could not do so, but made a tender of cession.

Mr. FORAKER. Pardon me. What I said was this: I said the facts as recited in the preamble amounted to an expression of a willingness to cede it.

Mr. CAFFERY. Very well; amounted to a willingness to cede it.

Mr. FORAKER. To an expression of willingness.

Mr. CAFFERY. The Senator says when we accept it, when we meet that willingness by a joint resolution, that that does not amount to a full alienation of the territory of Hawaii to the United States; in other words, it is not a contract consummated.

Mr. FORAKER. Now, the Senator must remember what I said about that. I said that was a matter about which I was not disposed to raise any contention, but I thought it might be contended that because they expressed that willingness in the form of a treaty, which we had refused to ratify, they might say that they were not bound by such action as we are proposing to take, by joint resolution, because when they made the offer it was in the form of a treaty which we refused to ratify. Whether they will regard themselves as bound by this—I have no doubt they will—is a matter about which there might be debate. In my judgment, it would not be held that this was the end of the transaction, because the proffer was by treaty. But upon that I have no disposition to be contentious. I may be in error.

Mr. CAFFERY. In other words, they made the proposition in the form of a treaty, and we accept it in another form.

Mr. FORAKER. We made a proposition to take them at the same time they made a proposition to come. We both acted by treaty, and it was in the contemplation of both that they would act by treaty. I can understand, if the Senator will allow me to state more plainly what is in my mind, how the Republic of Hawaii might say, "I am perfectly willing to go in by treaty, as was agreed and contemplated and as I expressed a willingness to do, but I have some question about this procedure. I have read the debates of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TURLEY] and the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and other Senators to the effect that it is unconstitutional to take me in in this way, and I do not want to go in unconstitutionally. Therefore I decline to go in. This is a different road from the one we agreed upon." I have in my mind the thought that they might see fit to take some such action as that, if they are not willing to come now as they were when we negotiated the treaty, and in that event I think they would be free to take such position.

Mr. CAFFERY. I understand that if the Government of Hawaii accepts this joint resolution, it would then amount to a contract.

Mr. FORAKER. I think it would.

Mr. CAFFERY. Is that the Senator's contention?

Mr. FORAKER. It would be an executed contract, certainly, and the Government of Hawaii would pass out of existence. So, if we ratified the treaty, it would pass out of existence and there would not any longer be a treaty. It would be an executed contract. There would be no longer two parties to the contract.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio a question in this connection. If, on the other hand, the Government of Hawaii were to refuse to stand by what it has heretofore agreed, would not the joint resolution be absolutely null and void and of no effect?

Mr. FORAKER. It is possible. That is what I have said.

Mr. BACON. There is no possibility about it. Must it not necessarily be so?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not say necessarily.

Mr. BACON. Unless we are going to enforce it by war, as a matter of compulsion.

Mr. FORAKER. I can explain to the Senator, if he will allow me, just what I have in my mind when I say "possible." If the view which I suggested as possible to be taken by Hawaii should be taken, that this was not a ratification of the treaty, that she had never proposed to come in in this way—if she should take that view of it and refuse, it might be construed that she has a right so to construe it. So it is one of the debatable propositions, because she did not offer to come in by a joint resolution. She offered to come in by treaty. If, on the other hand, she should say "I regard this as an acceptance," and I think she will, then she will come in.

Mr. BACON. In other words, the validity of the joint resolution must depend at least upon the consent and agreement of Hawaii. Is not that necessarily so?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly. That is what I have contended all the time.

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him another question which I intended to ask? In response to my first inquiry he stated that the act of the Government of Hawaii was a mere tender, a mere expression of willingness to cede.

Mr. FORAKER. So the preamble recites.

Mr. CAFFERY. Then, if we accept by joint resolution the offer of willingness to cede, does that make anything more than an executory contract?

Mr. FORAKER. I say that is one of the debatable propositions. It is not necessary for me to pass upon it. I have called attention to the fact that I think there might be controversy over that. There is room there for argument as to what the construction should be. It is not necessary that I should settle it. What I am endeavoring to establish is that, according to my view, we may constitutionally accept the islands by legislative act.

Mr. WHITE. Before my friend the Senator from Ohio leaves the floor, if I am not interrupting him, and I feel that I have interrupted him several times, I should like to know whether he pays any attention to the thirty-second article of the Hawaiian constitution.

Mr. FORAKER. I have called attention to it.

Mr. WHITE. I should like to know whether he thinks that the general-welfare clause of the Hawaiian constitution covers all the omitted authority with reference to a grant of that Republic.

Mr. FORAKER. I have called attention to it already, and I will say to the Senator that I think we can afford to dismiss it by saying that is Hawaii's part of the business.

Mr. WHITE. If we are making a contract with a nation, I suppose the ability of the nation to contract is of some materiality. It is to me, although it seems it is not to the distinguished Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. No; the Senator from California does me injustice when he imputes that I have no regard for the ability of Hawaii to contract. What I had in mind—I did not mean to be discourteous—in my answer to the Senator was that that is the constitutional provision. They have in making the treaty acted in conformity with the requirements of that provision. The Senator from California so contends, I believe.

Mr. WHITE. I do not. I say there has been no treaty made.

Mr. FORAKER. I know; in proposing the treaty, then. There is no contract.

Mr. WHITE. They have taken one step.

Mr. FORAKER. I know. In proposing that they have acted in conformity with the Constitution. If we should ratify the treaty and they should ratify it—I believe they have ratified it—there would be a treaty, and they would have acted in conformity with that provision of the Constitution. Now, then, how they will act when the joint resolution is passed I do not know. That is something to be hereafter dealt with. What I meant to say to the Senator was that it has no relation to the question I am arguing of the constitutional power of Congress to accept the territory.

Mr. WHITE. I feel, as the Senator from Ohio is a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations and the only member of the committee who has thus far ventured any defense of what I consider to be a very preposterous proposition—

Mr. FORAKER. Let me say to the Senator that he does the Foreign Relations Committee a very great injustice when he makes that remark. The Senator from California must remember, and it ought to be made to appear in the RECORD, that we considered the treaty for months in executive session, and in executive session this whole subject was most elaborately and exhaustively discussed by the friends as well as the opponents of annexation.

Mr. WHITE. And having been so discussed, the distinguished Senator comes here admitting the justness of criticisms made upon the phraseology of this long-entertained resolution, and expresses doubt as to whether the measure, which was thus long considered and reported after great deliberation, was in reality the proper method of procedure.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from California is unwarranted in his statement that I admit that there is ground for criticism of the language employed. The fact that I might not have employed the word "cession" is not equivalent to criticizing it. I contend that it is a perfectly appropriate word when considered in the light of the context, as it should be considered. There can not be any question as to what is meant by the word "cession," because it says the "said cession."

Mr. WHITE. What the preamble says is very little said, as we know in usual matters of legislation. The word "cession" has a well-defined meaning, admitted by the Senator from Ohio to be in accordance with the definition given to it by myself and other Senators upon this side of the Chamber. That resolution is now before the Senate. It is not a case where we are considering something done and attempting to find out the meaning of a legislative body which has passed a law, but we are now framing a law containing an admitted ambiguity which there is no suggestion to correct.

Mr. FORAKER. So the word "grant" has a definite meaning.

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. If you use it with respect to personal property and the context shows it, every court would say it has reference to the passing of personal property and interpret it accordingly.

I am much obliged to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TURLEY].

Mr. WHITE. I wish to thank the Senator from Ohio for his liberality to me in the matter of interruption.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator from Ohio permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FORAKER. I have an engagement to be at the depot at 3.45, and it is now 3.30.

Mr. CLAY. Just one minute. I understood the Senator to state on the floor of the Senate that it was absolutely necessary to acquire the Louisiana purchase by treaty from the simple fact that there were continuing rights to be enforced by the United States to the people occupying that territory. If the Senator takes that position, is not the case now pending before us a similar one? If we adopt the joint resolution, are there not continued rights due from us to the people of that island? Is it not true that the argument which he has applied to the purchase of Louisiana would apply in this case?

Mr. FORAKER. Not at all. The case of Louisiana affords ground for the broad distinction which I have been making. The French owned Louisiana and they ceded it to the United States. The French Government continued in existence. They ceded it, not merely for a sum of money, but upon certain stipulated conditions as to the rights of the occupants and inhabitants of the country, which conditions continued into the future. Therefore, I say it was a case where a contract was made and the contract did not perish when it was consummated, because both parties continued to exist afterwards as before. But here the distinction is that the minute you consummate the contract the Republic of Hawaii falls to the ground, and there can not be such a thing as a contract without parties.

Mr. PETTIGREW. There are conditions in the treaty which we have to carry out.

Mr. FORAKER. To pay money.

Mr. PETTIGREW. We assume a debt.

Mr. FORAKER. We assume to pay a debt, and the very moment that the treaty is ratified, if it should be, the people of the Republic of Hawaii become citizens of the United States, become our subjects, pass under the dominion of our law, and the Government of the Republic of Hawaii passes out of existence.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The only distinction is that there is no country in existence that can punish us for breach of contract.

Mr. FORAKER. The only distinction is that there is not any contract where there are not two parties.

Mr. PETTIGREW. There are two parties when the contract is made.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly; and the contract was consummated when it was made. That is all the distinction there need be.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Its terms do not carry consummation when made.

Mr. FORAKER. It is not a question of good faith. We are talking about the constitutional power—whether of necessity this must be done by treaty, and I say no.

Mr. TURLEY. Mr. President, I was glad to hear the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], because so far his is the first defense of the joint resolution which we have had from its supporters in the Senate. If I understand his position, he briefly outlined it in what he had to say on last Monday, which I have quoted already, which he has now elaborated. I understand him to admit that a transaction which takes the shape and essence of a contract, if it occurs or takes place between two nations, is a treaty and has to be carried out by treaty.

In connection with that he takes the further position that there must be two parties to a contract, and if the effect of the transaction is to destroy the existence of one of those parties, then it ceases to be a contract. That, of course, would apply only to such transactions between nations. But his idea is expressed better in the latter part of his interruption while the Senator from Georgia was speaking, that there must be two parties, and there must be a continuance of the contract.

Mr. President, I wish to illustrate this by just the condition of affairs which is before the Senate now. It is admitted that if the joint resolution is adopted the Republic of Hawaii can determine whether or not it will accept the provisions contained in the joint resolution. In other words, the adoption of the resolution does not consummate the transaction. The Republic of Hawaii does not become part of the territory of the United States by the adoption of the joint resolution, but after its adoption and signature by the President and after it becomes the law of the land the Republic of Hawaii may refuse to accept the terms contained in it and remain an independent and sovereign state.

But what would be the condition of affairs if the Senate accepted the treaty? What would be the condition of affairs if the treaty were ratified? It has already been ratified by the Republic of Hawaii, and the action of the Senate ratifying the treaty would complete the transaction, and afterwards the Republic of Hawaii could not withdraw from it. It illustrates as perfectly as could be that this whole dealing between the United States and the Republic of Hawaii as it now stands is in every essential particular a contract.

The joint resolution itself, it is admitted, amounts to nothing so far as carrying any effective force is concerned. It does not bring that country within our boundaries. It does not consummate itself. The Republic of Hawaii may reject it, but nobody will deny that this treaty having been ratified by the Republic of Hawaii, having been agreed to by it, if it is ratified by the Republic of the United States it becomes a perfect contract, and if the Republic of Hawaii attempted to withdraw from it we would be entitled to enforce our rights to the territory by war and by arms. What better illustration could we have that this in its every essential element is a contract. It seems to me that all these illustrations show, when we come to analyze them, that this is a contract between two sovereign nations which all admit ought to be carried out by a treaty and not by joint resolution.

Let me go a little further to illustrate. It is said, treating it as a treaty, that when the United States ratifies it, thereby the sovereignty of Hawaii ceases to exist; one of the parties ceases to exist, and all the elements of a contract cease, and there is no longer any continuance of the contract. The language of the Senator from Ohio is that there is no contract remaining; in other words, that on a consummation of the treaty the sovereignty and the dominion of Hawaii are transferred to the United States and instantly it ceases to be a contract and there is no contract remaining.

The argument is, therefore, that it was never a contract; it was something which could be done without contract. Let us see how that would be. If that proposition is true, if this transaction, because the result of it is to transfer the entire sovereignty from the Republic of Hawaii to the United States over the territory now governed by that Republic, is not a contract and has not the elements of a contract, then the day after the joint resolution is passed Congress can pass another law repealing every provision contained in the joint resolution for the benefit of the citizens of Hawaii, and also for the benefit of the creditors of that country.

If it is not a contract, if it is simply a legislative matter, if there is no contractual force connected with it, what would prevent this Government from next week or next month, or whenever it chose to do so, passing a law repealing the provision of the joint resolution by which the proceeds of the sale of the public lands are devoted to certain educational and other purposes in the Territory of Hawaii? What would prevent us from repealing the provision by which we assume the public debt? It is true the holders of that debt—individuals—might call upon the nations to which they belong to hold us responsible because we had taken control of this territory; but so far as the nature of the transaction is concerned we could repeal all the liability which we had assumed by this act itself.

Now, certainly no one would contend that any such result could be reached if the treaty is accepted. Suppose the treaty is ratified and we have received all the considerations for which we have stipulated; we have acquired the sovereignty; we have acquired the territory. Is it possible that we could repudiate these conditions? Let me illustrate by individual contracts on this point. The Senator from Ohio admits that a treaty is as between nations just what a contract is as between individuals. I can imagine valid contracts where one of the parties ceases to have any earthly interest in the subject-matter of the contract.

Take the case of a holder of a life estate. He conveys it absolutely upon the consideration that the grantee will do certain acts for a third person. Now, when that contract is consummated, the grantor in it can never thereafter have any further interest in the subject-matter or in the contract. The estate that he has granted ends with his life. His heirs can set up no interest in it. His administrator can set up no interest in it. It has become a matter of obligation and duty between the grantee in the contract and the third person whose rights have been created under the contract. Here the Government of Hawaii is indebted to certain parties. It owes $4,000,000 of debts. It has public lands which it wishes to devote to certain purposes.

If we acquire the sovereignty by agreement or an arrangement which makes it a consideration to us for assuming the debt, whenever that transaction is completed, there becomes a binding obligation upon this Government, based upon a valuable consideration, moving to it from the Republic of Hawaii, which has vacated its sovereign powers in favor of the holders of this debt and in favor of the people to whom the proceeds of the public lands are to be devoted.

With this treaty consummated, with this transaction carried out by the treaty, suppose an attempt were made to repeal the provision of the treaty by which all of the proceeds of the public lands were to be devoted to certain purposes. I will just read that clause from the treaty:

The existing laws of the United States relative to public lands shall not apply to such lands in the Hawaiian Islands; but the Congress of the United States shall enact special laws for their management and disposition: Provided, That all revenue from or proceeds of the same, except as regards such part thereof as may be used or occupied for the civil, military, or naval purposes of the United States, or may be assigned for the use of the local government, shall be used solely for the benefit of the inhabitants of the Hawaiian Islands for educational and other public purposes.

If there is no element of a compact in this matter because of the virtual death of the sovereignty of Hawaii, then, I repeat, by act of Congress that clause, as it is expressed in this resolution, could be repealed. But suppose this treaty is adopted, and suppose a subsequent act of Congress is passed attempting the repeal of that clause, would the courts of this country sustain such legislation? That is a test of the question whether it is a contract or not. If it is a contract, it is a contract which has its inception beginning of a policy the end of which no man can see.

The Senator from Ohio further says that in the case of the Alaskan treaty it could have been accomplished by legislation and need not have been perfected by treaty. In other words, as he proceeds with his argument he seems to reach the point that it is only an executory agreement between nations which falls within the definition of a treaty. If there be international law that gives such definition as that to a treaty, I have been unable to find it.

He says Russia could have ceded Alaska to us in any way which was legitimate under her form of government, could have indicated her willingness to give us Alaska, and then Congress could have passed a law appropriating $7,000,000 for the payment of Alaska; that that would have completed the transaction; that there was no necessity for a treaty in it at all, because it is a consummated matter which ends with its consummation. So, too, England, he says, can cede us the Bermudas, and we could accept the Bermudas in that way and a treaty would not be necessary. If an instance of that kind can be found consummated between independent sovereign nations except by treaty, I have never heard of it.

I could pile up example after example where one sovereign nation had exchanged territory with another sovereign nation just as two individuals exchange two tracts of land, and in every instance it is done by treaty. Such a transaction is just as complete and perfect a contract as an executory agreement is. There is no distinction when you come to define what contracts are with reference to their essential elements between executed and executory contracts. Of course, you can classify contracts and treaties. You divide contracts between individuals into executed and executory; so, too, you can divide treaties between nations into executed and executory. That distinction has no earthly influence on their character as contracts.

Now, when you come to the Louisiana purchase, the Senator says that the reason that had to be done by treaty was because the citizens of that territory ceded to us were guaranteed certain rights under the United States Government. So, too, in this transaction, the citizens of the Hawaiian Republic are guaranteed certain rights under this Government. The guaranties in this case are as strong, as important, as binding on this country as the guaranties in the Louisiana case. No man can read the two and distinguish between them.

It seems to me that the fallacy of the whole argument rests in this, that it leads to the conclusion that over some classes of contracts between sovereign nations Congress has power through its power to enact laws and over other classes of contracts the President and the Senate have jurisdiction through the treaty-making power. The true distinction is that if the transaction amounts to a contract, if in its essence and in its elements it is a contract, then the power to consummate it is conferred upon that branch of the Government which has the treaty-making power. It is the substance, not the name, you give it.

When we go back to the condition of affairs when the Constitution was adopted, just as was said by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] the other day, the framers of the Constitution were aware of the use and meaning of the terms embraced in the Constitution, and, as I argued yesterday, the extent of the treaty-making power was perfectly understood at that time. It was well known that all transactions of this kind between independent sovereigns were accomplished through the treaty-making power. And hence it is that when the Constitution conferred upon the President and the Senate the treaty-making power it conferred upon the President and the Senate authority to do all those things that were usually accomplished by the treaty-making power.

It is just exactly like a power of attorney to an agent to make contracts upon a certain subject-matter, because a treaty is a species of contract between nations about international matters. The power to make treaties included in it the power to do whatever at that time was customarily done between nations under international law by way of treaty, and it was intended to confer that power upon the President and the Senate, not upon Congress.

Now, Mr. President, I have consumed as much time on that branch of the subject as I feel like giving to it; and just briefly one or two words with reference to the general merits of this question.

No matter how we may view the joint resolution, whether it is constitutional or unconstitutional, if I was in favor of this annexation I could not vote for the pending joint resolution, because I deem the measure unconstitutional; but if I was convinced that it was constitutional, I could not vote for the proposed annexation on other grounds, which I will briefly state.

I do not think that it is going to make a great deal of difference to this country whether Hawaii is annexed or not. If I believed it was simply a question as to the annexation of these islands alone, I would not view it with so much concern, but I do not think any Senator should deceive himself on this subject. I believe as firmly as I know I am standing here that it is but the beginning of a policy the end of which no man can see.

The views which are entertained by the people who favor this policy find expression here just as they find expression in the popular press and in other ways in which public opinion is expressed. I wish to quote from a prominent newspaper, the Louisville Post, the platform which it thinks the country ought to adopt on this subject. It says:

We wish to have the Democratic party put the past behind it; we wish it to turn from 1896 to 1900 with views and plans and policies for a great development of our international commerce. We wish to declare for—

The freedom of Cuba.

The acquisition of Puerto Rico.

The annexation of Hawaii.

The acquisition of the Philippine Islands.

The building of the Nicaragua Canal.

A navy twice the size it is to-day.

A regular army of 100,000.

The militia under the drill and discipline of the Regular Army.

That, Mr. President, is what is called the imperial policy. It is proposed that a free republic shall embark upon an imperial policy. I can never give my consent or my vote to a move which it seems to me is leading to ends like this. Up to this time there has never been a foot of territory acquired by this country except under conditions where it could become, and where it was expected to become, one of the States of this Union. Every foot of territory acquired up to this time has been acquired with that reference and to that end.

The whole policy and scope of our Government is opposed to our holding any people, any country, any nation as a dependency or colony. I wish to read, because it expresses so much better than I can express it, the views of two of our statesmen on this subject.

I read first from 1 Wharton's International Law, page 579, from Mr. Frelinghuysen, Secretary of State, June 20, 1883, and February 1, 1884. He says:

The policy of this Government, as declared on many occasions in the past, has tended toward avoidance of possessions disconnected from the main continent. Had the tendency of the United States been to extend territorial dominion beyond intervening seas, opportunities have not been wanting to effect such a purpose, whether on the coast of Africa, in the West Indies, or in the South Pacific. No such opportunity has been hitherto embraced, and but little hope could be offered that Congress, which must in the ultimate resort be brought to decide the question of such transmarine jurisdiction, would favorably regard such an acquisition as his excellency proposes. At any rate, in its political aspect merely, this Government is unprepared to accept the proposition without objection to such wishes as Congress and the people of the United States through Congress may see fit to express.—Mr. Frelinghuysen, Secretary of State, to Mr. Langston, June 20, 1883. MSS. Inst., Haiti.

A conviction that a fixed policy, dating back to the origin of our constitutional Government, was considered to make it expedient to attempt territorial aggrandizement which would require maintenance by a naval force in excess of any yet provided for our national uses has led this Government to decline territorial acquisitions. Even as simple coaling stations, such territorial acquisitions would involve responsibility beyond their utility. The United States have never deemed it needful to their national life to maintain impregnable fortresses along the world's highways of commerce. To considerations such as these prevailing in Congress the failure of the Samana lease and the St. Thomas purchase were doubtless due. During the years that have since elapsed there has been no evidence of a change in the views of the national legislature which would warrant the President in setting on foot new projects of the same character.—Mr. Frelinghuysen, Secretary of State, to Mr. Langston, February 1, 1884. MSS. Inst., Haiti.

Mr. Bayard, on the next page, says:

The policy of the United States, declared and pursued for more than a century, discountenances and in practice forbids distant colonial acquisitions. Our action in the past touching the acquisition of territory by purchase and cession, and our recorded disinclination to avail ourselves of voluntary proffers made by other powers to place territories under the sovereignty or protection of the United States, are matters of historical prominence.—Mr. Bayard, Secretary of State, to Mr. Pendleton, September 7, 1885. MSS. Inst., Germ.

As I have just stated, the whole policy of the Government was simply to acquire territory of that character which could eventually come into the Union, and at no distant day, as States on an equal footing with the other States in the Union. Never up to this time has this country been asked or has it ever entertained the idea of acquiring the possession of distant countries occupied by races totally dissimilar from us and unsuited to our form and principles of government.

It is true that the representative system of government, as it is embodied in our Constitution, is capable of almost indefinite expansion, with the qualification, however, that it must be amongst people of sufficient intelligence to appreciate it and exercise it. Would any Senator, would any member of the House of Representatives, advocate the admission of the Hawaiian Islands as States into the Union? Does any man believe that the inhabitants of these islands will in years and years to come ever possess the qualifications which make safe American citizens?

So far as the Chinese are concerned, their habits and their mode of thought have been stamped into them for centuries. They never change. The other inhabitants of that island are equally unfitted to be citizens of this Union, with the exception, probably, of two or three thousand whites. What will be the result if other islands of the same kind are to be acquired, because if we once start, where are we to end? The cry is now not simply to take the Hawaiian Islands, but to take the Philippines and Puerto Rico and all the colonies that may be under our control at the time the present war may end.

We have no need of any such policy. We are not in the condition of any country which has adopted this policy of colonization. We have the most favored portion of the globe as our country, a country of inexhaustible resources, a country of indefinite development. We can easily increase our population until it reaches the sum of probably more than 200,000,000. This country is capable of supporting in comfort and happiness a population of that size. With such a population as that, situated as we are, what do we need with more?

What do we have to fear from the whole world combined or from any portion of it? Let me state our foreign commerce in the year 1896. I read from the Statistician and Economist, 1897-98. Our imports were $779,724,674 and our exports $882,606,938, making more than a billion and a half dollars. What our internal commerce is it is almost impossible to estimate, but it is many times more than that. With our country developed as it can be developed, with our commerce and trade developed as it can be developed in peaceful ways, what more do we need? We have every facility for our citizens. We have undeveloped country within our own territory in which they can find employment. If there ever was in the history of the world a country which did not need foreign possessions, it is ours.

It is contrary to our policy from the beginning of the Government. It is contrary to our theory of government. Think of it, Senators! Our Government had its birth because the doctrine that representation and taxation must go together was violated; and yet, what shall we be asked to do if we adopt this imperial policy? What shall we be forced and compelled to do if we acquire these islands and annex to this country 10,000,000 or more people incapable of self-government? We shall force taxes from them without representation. We shall govern them as dependencies. We shall in our colonial policy violate every principle which has made us the grandest and most glorious country on the face of the globe.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I submit an amendment to the pending joint resolution, which I ask may be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

That the contract-labor laws, and all laws, civil or criminal, now in force in said islands by which men are held for service for a definite term, except in punishment for crime whereof the party has been duly convicted, are hereby repealed, and all existing contracts are hereby declared void.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It is now past 4 o'clock on Saturday afternoon. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that it would be well to allow us to have an executive session and then an adjournment.

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask our friends on the other side if we can not come to an understanding this afternoon by unanimous consent as to when a vote shall be taken upon the pending joint resolution?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not know about the majority. So far as I am concerned, I will be perfectly willing to agree to a vote at a reasonably early day in the next session.

Mr. DAVIS. Of course that is entirely illusory and can not be entertained. I ask unanimous consent that a vote upon the pending joint resolution be taken on next Thursday, commencing at 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is very much more illusory than the proposition I made to the Senator a moment ago.

Mr. DAVIS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Of course, if the Senator insists on keeping us in session he must expect to have the Senate in attendance.

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I suggest that there is no quorum present.

Mr. DAVIS. Let the roll be called.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Arkansas allow me?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I withdraw the suggestion for a moment.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the printing of a bill and report. The cost will be $223.22. It is not, therefore, necessary to have the order go to the Committee on Printing. I ask for its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANTLE in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama ask for the present consideration of the order?

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Arkansas has suggested the want of a quorum, and that can not be withdrawn. I do not object to the order, but I want the rule strictly enforced. Whenever a Senator suggests that there is not a quorum present, the roll must be called.

Mr. MORGAN. I think the Senator is mistaken about the situation. The Senator from Arkansas said he would suggest the want of a quorum. He did not make it to the Chair as a point of order.

Mr. TELLER. It was the suggestion of the want of a quorum, and I shall not withdraw the objection. I shall not interfere with the Senator's order the moment a quorum appears, but I think we must keep to the rules.

Mr. MORGAN. All right; but I think the Senator from Colorado misunderstood the situation. The Senator from Arkansas did not raise the question of the want of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas suggested the lack of a quorum and then withdrew the suggestion.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. He could not do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado raises the point that the suggestion can not be withdrawn. The Chair holds that the point of order is well taken. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen,	Daniel,	Heitfeld,	Platt, Conn.
Allison,	Davis,	Hoar,	Pritchard,
Bacon,	Deboe,	Jones, Ark.	Rosch,
Baker,	Elkins,	Lodge,	Roswell,
Bate,	Fairbanks,	McBride,	Shoup,
Berry,	Frye,	McEnery,	Spooner,
Burrows,	Gallinger,	Mallory,	Teller,
Caffery,	Gear,	Mantle,	Turley,
Clark,	Gorman,	Morgan,	Warren,
Clay,	Hansbrough,	Penrose,	Wilson.
Cullom,	Harris,	Perkins,
	Hawley,	Pettus,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

THE NICARAGUA CANAL.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That 2,000 additional copies of Senate bill 4792 (Calendar No., 1307) and of the accompanying report of the committee be printed together for the use of the Senate.

ANNEXATION OF THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 259) to provide for annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States.

Mr. PETTUS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I understand there is some opposition to this motion, and I must confess I do not sympathize with it. I expect to vote for the resolution about which there has been so much discussion here, but so far I have not seen a Senator—

Mr. BURROWS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understood the Senator to make a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORGAN. That was the motion he made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] made a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BURROWS. Is that debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the motion is not debatable.

Mr. BURROWS. I make the point of order that it is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PETTUS. I will make the motion at all events, even if I am not allowed to give my reasons for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAVIS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GEAR (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. MANTLE's name was called). The present occupant of the Chair is paired with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], but am permitted to vote on collateral questions, and I vote "nay."

Mr. McBRIDE. I have a general pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], but under an arrangement with him in connection with the Hawaiian annexation resolution I feel at liberty to vote on this question, and I vote "nay."

Mr. BACON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE], and as he is not present, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. NELSON. I suggest to the Senator from Georgia that we transfer our pairs. I have a general pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], and we can transfer our pairs so that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE], with whom the Senator from Georgia is paired, will stand paired with the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BACON. On the suggestion made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], I will permit my vote to stand, our pairs being transferred in the way indicated.

Mr. GEAR. In order to make a quorum I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WILSON (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO], and if a quorum has voted, I will withdraw my vote. If not, I will allow my vote to stand to make a quorum.

Mr. NELSON. Under the transfer of pairs agreed to by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and myself, I am at liberty to vote; and I vote "nay."

Mr. WILSON. I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], and will allow my vote in the negative to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—15.

Allen,	Caffery,	Daniel,	Roach,
Bacon,	Chilton,	McEnery,	Spooner,
Bate,	Clay,	Mallory,	Turley.
Berry,	Cockrell,	Pettus,

NAYS—34.

Allison,	Fairbanks,	Hoar,	Proctor,
Baker,	Foraker,	Lodge,	Sewell,
Burrows,	Frye,	McBride,	Shoup,
Carter,	Gallinger,	Morgan,	Stewart,
Clark,	Gear,	Nelson,	Teller,
Cullom,	Hale,	Penrose,	Warren,
Davis,	Hansbrough,	Perkins,	Wilson.
Deboe,	Harris,	Platt, Conn.
Elkins,	Hawley,	Pritchard,

NOT VOTING—40.

Aldrich,	Jones, Nev.	Mitchell,	Sullivan,
Butler,	Kenney,	Money,	Thurston,
Cannon,	Kyle,	Morrill,	Tillman,
Chandler,	Lindsay,	Murphy,	Turner,
Faulkner,	McLaurin,	Pasco,	Turpie,

Gray,	Mantle,	Platt, N. Y.	Wellington,
Hanna,	Martin,	Quay,	Wetmore,
Heitfield,	Mason,	Rawlins,	White,
Jones, Ark.	Mills,	Smith,	Wolcott.

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALLEN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. DAVIS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. MANTLE's name was called). The present occupant of the chair is paired with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. NELSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]; but with the consent of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] I will make the same transfer of pairs with him as was made on the last vote, so that the Senator from Missouri will stand paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE]; and I vote "nay."

Mr. BACON. That is satisfactory to me, and I vote "yea."

Mr. WILSON (when his name was called). I again announce the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]; and I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GEAR. For the purpose of making a quorum, I will vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—10.

Allen,	Berry,	Clay,	Turley.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. ALLEN. I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday at 11 o'clock—a time certain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Nebraska that a motion to that effect was passed earlier in the day.

Mr. ALLEN. The motion which was passed during the day was a motion to adjourn until 11 o'clock on Monday when we do adjourn. I now make the specific motion under the rule to adjourn to a time certain, fixing the hour at 11 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the same time which was fixed by the order of the Senate this morning, so that the motion is not of any value. The motion that was then made was not that we now adjourn, but if we had adjourned we would have adjourned until 11 o'clock on Monday. We did not, however, adjourn. The Senator's motion is not in order, in my judgment.

Mr. ALLEN. Then, Mr. President, the Senate having transacted business since the announcement of the last vote by the remarks of the Senator from Alabama and others, I withdraw the motion I made, and now suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll; and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Cullom,	Heitfield,	Proctor,
Bacon,	Daniel,	Hoar,	Roach,
Baker,	Davis,	Lodge,	Sewell,
Bate,	Deboe,	McBride,	Shoup,
Burrows,	Elkins,	Mallory,	Spooner,
Caffery,	Fairbanks,	Mantle,	Stewart,
Cannon,	Frye,	Morgan,	Teller,
Carter,	Gear,	Nelson,	Turley,
Chilton,	Hale,	Penrose,	Warren,
Clark,	Hansbrough,	Perkins,	Wilson.
Clay,	Harris,	Platt, Conn.
Cockrell,	Hawley,	Pritchard,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. ALLEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAVIS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no!

Mr. DAVIS. I withdraw the call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nebraska, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALLEN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the demand for the yeas and nays sustained?

Mr. HAWLEY. It is not sustained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the demand is not sustained.

Mr. BURROWS and Mr. DAVIS. Regular order!

Mr. ALLEN. Six or eight hands went up.

Mr. WILSON. Regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair counted only five hands.

Mr. BATE. I ask for a division.

There were on a division—aye 6, noes 38; no quorum voting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being disclosed, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll; and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon,	Davis,	Hoar,	Proctor,
Baker,	Deboe,	Lodge,	Roach,
Bate,	Elkins,	McBride,	Sewell,
Berry,	Fairbanks,	Mallory,	Shoup,
Burrows,	Foraker,	Mantle,	Spooner,
Cannon,	Frye,	Morgan,	Stewart,
Carter,	Gear,	Nelson,	Teller,
Chilton,	Hale,	Pasco,	Turley,
Clark,	Hansbrough,	Penrose,	Warren,
Clay,	Harris,	Perkins,	Wilson.
Cullom,	Hawley,	Platt, Conn.
Daniel,	Heitfield,	Pritchard,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. ALLEN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the Senate adjourn. [Putting the question.] The motion appears to be lost.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask for a division.

There were on a division—aye 9, noes 29; no quorum voting.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator can not call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILSON. I rise to a question of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum is disclosed, only thirty-eight Senators rising. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Baker,	Elkins,	McBride,	Rauch,
Bate,	Fairbanks,	Mallory,	Sewell,
Berry,	Foraker,	Mantle,	Shoup,
Caffery,	Frye,	Morgan,	Spooner,
Cannon,	Gear,	Nelson,	Stewart,
Cartar,	Hale,	Pasco,	Teller,
Chilton,	Hansbrough,	Penrose,	Turley,
Clark,	Harris,	Perkins,	Warren,
Daniel,	Hawley,	Platt, Conn.	Wilson,
Davis,	Heitfeld,	Pritchard,
Deboe,	Lodge,	Proctor,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present.

Mr. FRYE. I ask that the names of the absentees be called.

Mr. ALLEN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MORGAN. I rise to a question of order. I wish to hear the list of absentees read from the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator has that right.

Mr. ALLEN. Before that request was made I was upon the floor and moved that the Senate adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate is now dividing. The motion is not in order when the Senate is dividing.

Mr. ALLEN. I thought the result had been announced.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the names of the absentees. Does the Senator from Georgia desire to be recorded as present?

Mr. CLAY. I desire that my name be called.

The name of Mr. CLAY was called, and he responded.

Mr. HOAR and Mr. BURROWS entered the Chamber and responded to their names.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask that my name be called.

The name of Mr. ALLEN was called, and he responded.

Mr. MORGAN. Since the Senator from Nebraska has answered to his name, I withdraw my request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nebraska that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ALLEN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the call for the yeas and nays sustained? It takes nine hands to sustain the call. It is not sustained. The motion was rejected.

Mr. ALLEN, Mr. PASCO, and others called for a division.

Mr. DAVIS. Regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is the joint resolution (H. Res. 259) to provide for annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States.

Mr. PASCO. A division was called for.

Mr. MORGAN. It is too late.

Mr. PASCO. Several Senators called for a division.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The demand was for the yeas and nays and not for a division, and it was not sustained.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to know what is the motion before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is no motion before the Senate.

Mr. PASCO. A division has been called for. If not, I call for it now.

Mr. WILSON. It is too late. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] says to me, "You can not play that game." You have already commenced the game. I am not playing the game.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator states that I am playing any game, he states what there is nothing in the RECORD to show and what is not the fact. I have been here and have answered to my name.

Mr. WILSON. So have I. The Senator has no cause of complaint.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order. This is not debatable.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts is correct.

Mr. BURROWS. Regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is House joint resolution No. 259.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I desire to say that the statement of the Senator from Washington, that I have been engaged in any kind of a game or filibuster is utterly unwarranted by the facts. There is nothing in the RECORD to show it, and the remarks were not justified on his part.

Now, I want to say a few words in regard to this evening. It is now nearly 5 o'clock Saturday evening. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] moved an executive session in good faith. It has been almost universally customary in the Senate by unanimous consent to let a statement be made on such an occasion.

The Senator from Alabama was denied that right and cut off when he began to give the reasons why he wanted an executive session this evening. I think it is utterly unreasonable to expect the Senator from Georgia at this late hour on Saturday evening to take the floor and argue the pending question. Therefore I think the attempt to force him to do so is not in accordance with the practices of the Senate and is not calculated to bring about a more speedy vote upon the joint resolution now pending.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia desires to take the floor upon the joint resolution for the purpose of discussing it, nobody in the Senate is going to undertake to force him against his preference to go on this afternoon. But the evident purpose here is to block progress upon the joint resolution by a filibuster. It is due to a majority of the Senate, it is due to the cause, to the occasion, it is due to the situation of the country that the Senate of the United States should not refuse to do its duty one way or the other upon the joint resolution. This country is not in a condition to be trifled with. The people of the United States are not going to put up with us if we trifle with the general and public welfare upon an occasion of the solemnity and importance and necessity of the present.

The President of the United States will be compelled, indeed, he has already been compelled by the tardiness of Congress and by its refusal to perform its constitutional duty, to seize upon a friendly State merely because it is dependent upon us and can not help itself, to send our armies there for refreshment and repose, for coal to work our ships in an attack upon Spain at Manila and elsewhere.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire to what State the Senator has reference?

Mr. MORGAN. Hawaii.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator mean to state to the Senate that that has been done without the consent of the authorities?

Mr. TELLER. We do not hear a word of what is going on.

Mr. MORGAN. I mean to say that the authorities of Hawaii, who are the legislature of that Government, as I understand, and in control of the political power and destiny of that country, have not consented.

Mr. HOAR. I supposed that such a question was for the Executive of Hawaii. I supposed that nothing had been done by this Government except with the assent of the Executive of Hawaii, who has power to assent.

Mr. MORGAN. If there has been any official assent on the part of the Executive of Hawaii, I have not heard of it.

Mr. HOAR. It is a very serious statement to make, and I do not myself believe that the Senator is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. May I ask the Senator from Alabama a question?

Mr. TELLER. If Senators expect us to listen, they must talk loud enough so that we can hear. We have not heard a word that the Senator from Alabama or the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Nebraska has said.

Mr. ALLEN. I understood the Senator from Alabama to say that the President had seized upon the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; virtually.

Mr. ALLEN. What I want to know is whether the seizure goes any further than simply a friendly act on the part of the Hawaiian Government in permitting our troops to rest there, to refresh themselves.

Mr. MORGAN. Vancouver, Victoria, would be a very nice place from which to send out an expedition with coal from Seattle to the Philippines, but if we dared to send a ship there and land troops or take coal from that station we would have the guns of Great Britain thundering at us in five days. We are taking advantage of Hawaii simply because we know that she is bound to us with hooks of steel, or, rather, with stronger hooks of affection, and that she is as American as we are. We know that; and because she is in that situation, for mere political purposes, for the mere sake of controlling the November elections, the Senate of the United States is permitting itself here to stand and higgie and to put the President of the United States to shame in the presence of the nations of the world and of international law. That is what we are doing.

Now, sir, I will bring a parallel case. When we started this war we declared, on the motion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], and on the report also of the committee, that Cuba of right is and ought to be a free state.

Mr. WHITE. We never said it was a free and independent state.

Mr. TELLER. That the people were independent.

Mr. DAVIS. That the people were independent.

Mr. MORGAN. That the people were independent. That is stronger than the state.

Mr. WHITE. It may be. We will find out some day.

Mr. MORGAN. We will find out some day whether the people are stronger than the state. We will find it out here now. We are testing that matter now. Here is a part of the state that is obstructing the will of the people beyond all question as it came to us from the House of Representatives, and we will soon find out whether the people are not stronger than the end of the state which is in this Chamber.

At all events, that the people of Cuba are and of right ought to be free and independent. That is the declaration of this body and of the other body, approved by the President of the United States, and that is the attitude of the United States Government. General Shafter is now conducting a war in Cuba of heroic kind, filled with sacrifice and death both from the missiles of the enemy and the diseases of the climate, and no more important, no more heroic attitude has ever been taken by a Government in this world than is represented by the flag of our country at Santiago de Cuba to-day.

Yet that attitude is taken in a country where the people are and of right ought to be free and independent. The government of Cuba has not officially invited us there. I have not heard of any message from the President of Cuba inviting us to go there with our flag and our arms and to occupy that country. They are receiving us precisely as Hawaii is receiving us, except for a better reason. Hawaii is sacrificing her independence, her autonomy, her sovereignty over those islands, for the purpose of exhibiting her friendship to the people of the United States, her love for the people of the United States, without any ulterior confidence moving her, for the political situation, so far as Hawaii is concerned, has been that of annexation, and the treaty of annexation was ratified by her Senate before the war started.

I should like to know whether these fine, silken, glossy arguments about the Constitution of the United States and about the right of the President of the United States to coal his ships and stop and refresh his troops in Hawaii and in Cuba are to stand for a moment in the presence of the events that are encumbering this people and causing them to lay their lives down at our command, and whether we can afford to stand here and quibble about little points like this, and obstruct the war, prevent it, and put to peril the troops that we have sent out upon the high seas. I should like to know it. We have got to face it, and I am delighted to find there is a majority here willing to do it. And I am delighted to act with them, though they are not my friends politically. I will stand by them through thick and thin for my country and its flag.

Mr. President, we shall presently be having wounded men and men sick with all manner of tropical diseases coming back from the Philippines. Are they there unlawfully? Are they there without our command? Are they there in some unholy exploit from which we are not willing to relieve them, or have they, while they are there, and those who go to reinforce them, been marking upon the records of history the highest tribute to American power and American character that has ever been drawn by the hand of man with the sword? These men will be coming back presently, many of them, and Senators are here on this floor filibustering to prevent those men from having a friendly welcome and a landing under their own flag and their own country at Hawaii as they come back, saying, "We will make you sail across the Pacific or else die while you are trying." That is the situation we are in.

No, sir; I repudiate it from my soul. I repudiate it; I will have none of it; I will not be a party to any miserable political trick and intrigue like that. There are men on this floor, plenty of them, and they have already started the movement to defer the question of the annexation of Hawaii until next winter. When the Senate of the United States makes that vote, what do we do with the President of the United States but to express our disapprobation that he in the meantime should permit one of his soldiers to land upon those islands for refreshment?

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator assumes all the way through that we would be violating the law of neutrality if our sick and wounded soldiers were landed at Hawaii and were cared for there. Does the Senator hold to that doctrine?

Mr. MORGAN. Just as much there as if they were landed on the shore of Great Britain, north of us in Canada.

Mr. ALLEN. I want to enter my solemn protest against the correctness of that doctrine.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator can protest as much as he pleases about that. Still it is the law of nations.

Mr. ALLEN. I think I can show to the contrary.

Mr. MORGAN. I am not going to give the Senator an opportunity to do it in my time. If he can show a single case where any nation in this world has secured and exercised the right of landing its coal, and its troops, and its sick and wounded, and establishing its hospital upon the territory of a friendly power when this nation is at war with another power, I shall be very glad to see it, because it has never occurred within my recollection in the history of international law.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me, I do not want unnecessarily to interrupt him, but I think the Senator will find it to be true that the law of hospitality, in the case of the sickness or wounding of soldiers or any class of people is not violated by their being entertained or provided for by a neutral power.

Mr. MORGAN. If hospitality is proffered as an act of good will it is not violated, but if it is not proffered it is. So we are forcing Hawaii to proffer her hospitality, while we are keeping her out of doors as an unworthy thing to be received into the American Union.

Mr. ALLEN. Then Hawaii would not dare to extend our sick soldiers hospitality when our enemies themselves would be required to do it if our sick soldiers fell into their possession?

Mr. MORGAN. The sick soldiers of the United States in Hawaii are not prisoners of war. They are there supposed to enjoy hospitality either by the compulsion we put upon them or else by their hospitable act, one of the two. They are not prisoners of war. Spain is bound to treat her prisoners with humanity under the laws of nations. Hawaii is not bound to extend any hospitality if she does not choose to do it. But if we go and take it by force it is our act and not the act of Hawaii.

Mr. ALLEN. But suppose she does choose to do it, is that a violation of any international law?

Mr. MORGAN. Not by any means.

Mr. ALLEN. Then the conclusion—

Mr. MORGAN. And we here, the great Senate of the United States, bemoaning and belittling those splendid people in Hawaii, say, "We will keep you out in the cold; we refuse you any recognition; we will declare that you are unworthy to come in here, and at the same time we will expect of you, through your Christian generosity, hospitality for our sick soldiers." That is where we stand.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator a question. He has spoken about filibustering, and I regret the disposition on the other side to do that. But is the Senator now—

Mr. WILSON. We can not hear a single, solitary word that the Senator from Nebraska says. I think we are entitled to hear it. I do not care very much about it myself, but I think we are entitled to hear.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Washington is the only man who needs knowledge that I know of.

Mr. WILSON. I never will acquire it from the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ALLEN. No; because I have not the patience to impart it.

Mr. WILSON. I am glad to know the Senator has not any patience whatever. The fact is that that is notorious. He has no patience in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. I have the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. ALLEN. I just wanted to ask—

THE VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. The facetious remark of the Senator from Nebraska charging the other side with filibustering does not do justice to the record. It does not do justice to the truth. It does not do justice to the solemnity of this occasion. The Senator from Nebraska has himself set up a regular filibuster, as we call it here—I do not know any better name for it—and he has been continuing it for the last hour.

Mr. ALLEN. The accusation is very serious, and I hope the Senator will permit me to say a word. I do not yet know whether I am going to vote with the Senator from Alabama or not. I do not know what policy ought to be pursued respecting these islands. It is a grave question. If the Senator will permit me to occupy his time just a moment, here it is 5 o'clock Saturday night, and we are to meet at 11 o'clock Monday morning. Now, because I protest against going on with this debate to-night, when we can accomplish nothing, does the Senator feel that I ought to be characterized as a filibuster? I leave that to his sense of propriety.

Mr. MORGAN. I have not characterized the Senator as a filibuster. I merely characterized what has been done here as falling within that category, the disagreeable things that I call filibustering, for the purpose of preventing a majority of this body from voting.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Alabama permit me to call his attention and the attention of the Senate to the fact that the motion to go into executive session was made in good faith by his colleague [Mr. PETERS], who is in favor of annexation, and was not made by one who is opposed to it?

Mr. MORGAN. I have as high an admiration for my colleague as any man on this floor. I have every confidence in him, and the utmost degree of respect for him. I differed with him upon that motion, and voted against him not with any reluctance at all. I thought the Senator from Alabama was not exactly in the line of precedents when he took the subject out of the hands of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, who has charge of this measure and who was making motions adverse to that. It makes no difference what his motives were; they are always good. He never acted in his life except upon good motives. But it does not follow that I am overawed or overruled by his judgment of what belongs to him as to his own personal conduct. The quotation is inapt, Mr. President. The authority is not sufficient.

Now, sir, personal convenience is spoken of, an afternoon of Saturday; "it is hot;" "Senators are fatigued." Do you suppose that General Shafter's troops, who expect to fight your battle to-morrow, Sunday, as it is of great magnitude, are saying to their commanding officers this afternoon, "It is personally inconvenient for us to move to-morrow or this evening; we prefer to consult our ease; we do not want to go into the fight to-night?"

Mr. President, who are we representing here? Men who are shedding their blood for us upon the field of battle, and we are talking about personal inconvenience! We are spoiled to death, Mr. President, by our prosperity. If this Senate had to march out and shoulder arms for the defense of this capital, and stand guard to-night and for the next week, it would do us all good. We would then learn what it was to stand for our country, not to sleep on our posts, and have our little political intrigues for the next November elections and talk about personal inconvenience.

Sir, when the pending joint resolution has been debated to the full extent of the wishes of the gentlemen who oppose it, it ought to be allowed to be voted upon. That is all of it. There ought not to be an interposition here of tactics of the sort exhibited this evening for the purpose of throwing enormous burdens upon the President of the United States. Why, sir, if these men force the President of the United States to raise our flag in Hawaii and to take care of it there in order to shelter our wounded and sick people who are coming back from Manila, and the coal, and the supplies, and the water necessary for the maintenance of the crews on our ships, the very men who force him into that category will be found here rising on their feet and moving to impeach him because he violated some possible shadow of their interpretation of the Constitution of the United States.

I am glad, sir, that I have got the opportunity just at this moment to anticipate that miserable scheme and lay it bare to the bone. You will not be heard, gentlemen, hereafter to accuse the President of the United States of violating the constitutional rights and powers of the Chief Executive when he and his friends and his countrymen, whether of his political party or not, turn to you and say: "You forced him to that situation by conduct on your part that made it absolutely indispensable in the name of Christianity and humanity that he should do such a thing."

When you return to your constituents, gentlemen, and meet the fathers of the sons who have gone to Manila, and tell them that you obstructed by filibustering tactics the passage of a law that would make it legal for them to stop in Hawaii on their return with their wounds or their sickness and find shelter in the bosom of that hospitable and splendid people, that father will spurn you as not being his representative or the representative of the true American spirit.

There is such a thing, thank God, as an American spirit. It is hovering over the Senate now. It keeps Senators in their seats who have strong reasons for being absent. It has not been strong enough to invite all the absentees to be here, but their names ought to be put on record to see who it is who is not willing to stay here and serve his country while the men in Manila and the men in Santiago de Cuba are fighting under our flag for their country. They ought to be put on the record to show who they are and why they are not present here performing this beautiful, splendid, easy, nice, comfortable, and distinguished duty of voting to the people who are in the Army the allowance of a hospitable reception in the Island of Hawaii.

There is such a thing, Mr. President, as an American spirit, and I rejoice in it. It is my privilege to do so, and I will not be found doing anything at all that in the slightest degree obstructs the full flow of that glorious and magnificent spirit which already has won for us a fame that time itself will honor the longer time shall last. For deeds have been performed even during the brief period of this war which show two things: First, that the United States is capable of waging war with all the resources and all of her men for the sake of humanity, Christianity, and liberty. That response coming back from the people of the United States at the close of the nineteenth century is a proper and fitting response to that splendid spirit of our fathers who planted this magnificent Republic upon this wonderful country of ours. There is such a spirit here.

Not only, Mr. President, are they fighting in a cause in which they have no motive but justice, liberty, humanity, and Christianity, but, sir, they are fighting with intrepidity and honor, with marked skill, ability, valor which have not been excelled in any history that has ever been written by the pen of man. No nation stands higher to-day than the United States on the rolls of glorious warfare and magnanimous conduct.

The very example we have set before the world in the last two months will warn the nations of this earth that while we are a peace-loving people and are disposed to do all that can be done to keep on good terms with humanity and all the nations of the world, there is not that nation which exists, though it may be the most powerful monarchy that was ever knit together by the hands of oppression and craft, that does not feel to-day that the people of the United States and their Government are more powerful than any other nation that exists on the earth—not powerful only in war, but powerful in the motives of war. That we have already achieved.

I can not reconcile it to myself that this great and august body, of which I have had the honor of being a member now for twenty-one years, could set itself in the attitude we occupy this evening of antagonism to the Administration that is conducting this war, and doing it so well and with such high purposes and motives; that we should be here laying pipe for the purpose of controlling elections in November, and that that should be the motive of our conduct. If that is not the motive, let the joint resolution come to a vote when the debate is exhausted.

Mr. President, I hope we will not have any more of this procedure on this case, to say the least of it.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, the Senators upon this floor, I presume, have a right to their opinions. They may have regard for the opinions of others. But they may not care for the order even by the Senator from Alabama. When the Senator from Alabama makes any charge against other Senators involving the honesty of their intentions or their purposes, in so far as I am concerned and those who concur with me, it is distinctly repudiated. An accusation that in a debate such as that which we are conducting there has been anything but the highest and best motives is founded upon a misconception of the fact; but that it may be based on other motives is of but little moment to me. The dictator of the Senate, be he old or young, ought to be odious, and he is not, as far as I have been able to observe, very lofty in regard. There are Senators here who think that this is an important issue and who have been debating it in good faith. An assertion that they are debating it otherwise proceeds either from corruption or imbecility.

Mr. President, let us remember that if at half past 4 o'clock upon the afternoon of Saturday we see fit to try to adjourn, we may be honest in endeavoring to absent ourselves without filibustering. I have sat here for hours when there has been in the Senate but one-seventh of a quorum, and I have never made the point. Yet a Senator dares to charge that we are filibustering when he has absented himself from the ranks; and with that inconsistency which is his characteristic and attribute, he throws upon others the burden that should depend upon himself.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from California seems to have a little desire to be personal toward me. I wish to say to the Senator that this is not the proper place for personalities. If he thinks he has got any quarrel with me, there is a better place to settle it than this. We can settle it outside of this Chamber.

Mr. WHITE. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama, with his characteristic fairness, seeks to place upon the record here charges against men who are associated with him in the discharge of a public duty and denies to them the right to traverse his unfounded suggestions. He can not influence anything I say by anything of that sort.

Mr. President, from the initiation of this debate to this minute we have been ready to proceed according to order, and we have so proceeded. This afternoon, our last afternoon, when the Senator from Georgia wished to speak, notice was given to those who control this debate that he would rather have the debate postponed. We know it has been an oppressive day; we know we have been honestly trying to have this matter pressed forward, and have advanced only such arguments as appeal to our consciences and our judgments, and when we are accused of filibustering, for myself—and I know I have the concurrence of all those who have stood with me and all those who agree with me upon this topic—I am justified in saying it is utterly without foundation that we are procrastinating.

Mr. President, in your capacity as presiding officer of this body [the Vice-President in the chair] you can vindicate my statement when I assert that when there were arguments made by able men here—I do not refer to anything I have said—there were very few in this Chamber, and yet no attempt was made to compel presence; and here to-night, I suppose for pyrotechnic purposes, to be continuously further advertised, we are informed that there is a filibuster in progress. That statement is utterly untrue; absolutely untrue.

We insist that at this time on Saturday evening the Senate ought to adjourn. We have already agreed to a resolution to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday, for which I myself voted; and after having stood here and discussed this question, when nearly half the day has been taken up by the friends of annexation, it is certainly not a ground for exhibiting us before the country as filibusters that we have simply asked for a privilege which ought to have been granted, and which has been denied to this hour; yet the Senator from Alabama has sat in this Chamber many a time recently and heretofore seeking to advance interests which he thought were vital to his section, and has really filibustered. We have not done so.

We have been here in accordance with our obligations. We appear now. We insist upon adjournment now. I do. I deny that we should be detained here inconveniently. I say that it is a fact that we have uniformly acquiesced in the progress of this debate and permitted it to continue, although Republican Senators and annexationists who do not want to debate a subject they are impotent to contest have absented themselves from this body. We have not called them back. Our arguments ought to be enough to adjudge the rectitude and the honesty of our course.

We may not know why the Senator from Alabama absented himself; we may not know why others absented themselves. They may not have cared to listen to the dry details of arguments in which they do not concur; but at the same time, under the Constitution, it was their business to be here if a quorum was necessary; and they have been absent, and we have permitted that absence to go undisputed.

Let none of this hypocrisy, this advertisement, this pretense, this falsehood, delude anybody. It does not delude anyone in this Chamber, and it never will. It will never pass untraversed so long as I stand here, whether the distinguished Senator from Alabama, as he stated in an article in the North American Review, admires the Malay inhabitants of the Philippine Islands or waxes enthusiastic over our proposed and intended alliance with the people of Hawaii. His desire to associate us with the aborigines of Borneo, Sumatra, or Java will never win my support. Let us understand that in the discussion of a public question we can be heard and we will be heard, and that no orders will be received from the Senator from Alabama with reference to our position.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I am one of those who voted against an adjournment and against an executive session. I did not do so for the purpose of forcing any Senator into unfair debate at a late hour of the night. I had not myself heard that any Senator desired that there should be a postponement for his convenience. I have been one of those who have absented themselves from the Senate a good deal to-day, because I have been executing an order of the Senate; but I have managed to get here, I think, at every roll call.

Mr. President, I do not believe there is a necessity for any great heat over this question. It seems to me that we who are in favor of the admission of the Hawaiian Islands, who expect it will be accomplished during this session of Congress, might as well make up our minds to wait until the debate is exhausted and to give to the other side fair debate. I am prepared to do that, although it is very inconvenient for me to do so. I am prepared to do it, because I believe it is very important that we should act upon the subject at this session, perhaps not so very important that we should act upon it at this immediate hour or within the next two or three weeks.

I said the other day that I was one of those who would not have objected to a postponement to a day fixed and certain upon which a vote could be taken at the next session, if that could have been had, although I can see that some complications might arise by a failure to act upon the subject at this session.

I do not agree with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] that the President of the United States has invaded the Hawaiian Islands. I understand that the Government of that country has not declared neutrality with reference to our affairs with Spain, and by the laws of nations, that being so, we have an unquestioned right to her hospitality if she sees fit to extend it, and no nation in the world can complain of that except Spain. Spain has a right to complain, and it might be made a subject of war on the part of Spain against the Hawaiian Islands. The Government of Hawaii took that chance when they said to us, "Land your sailors and your soldiers on our shores and coal your ships in our harbors." They did that, and a friendly government can extend that hospitality, and the same might have been extended to us by Great Britain if she had seen fit to do so, and it would not have been a cause of complaint by any government in the world except the Government of Spain.

The President has not done anything out of the ordinary. There are plenty of precedents in the history of controversies of this character where such things have been done by friendly nations, even to the extent sometimes of allowing an armed force to pass across the border line and through a portion of the country to assail another state.

I repeat, that the only Government which has a right to be heard to complain as to this matter is Spain. France has no right to say anything, and Germany has no right to say anything. They may be offended; they may think it is partiality that ought not to be exhibited; but they are not going to complain. But, suppose they do complain. Suppose France or Germany or Russia should say to the Hawaiian Government: "You must no longer extend to the United States the hospitality that you have heretofore extended, or, if you do, you must reckon with us," and, Mr. President, they would have to reckon then with us, that is, and not with the Government of Hawaii. Common decency on our part would require us to stand in front of and between these islands and any other power in the world, no matter how big it might be. The Government of Hawaii has a right under the law of nations to do what it has done.

Mr. President, I wish we could get to a vote on this question; I wish we could settle it. I wish we could settle it, because I believe it would be for the peace of this country. I do not believe anybody who has spoken against this joint resolution has intended by so doing to delay or to hinder in the slightest possible manner the conduct of this war; nor do I think because Senators do not believe in the acquisition of these islands and exercise a Senatorial right to contend against it that we have any right to say that they are doing it for the purpose of impairing the power of the Government of the United States with relation to this war; and yet, Mr. President, it might do that. It has not done it up to the present time, and I am frank enough to say that I do not believe it will at any time.

I do not believe that that question is going to be a factor in our relations in this controversy with Spain; and yet I should like to have it settled. I should like to have it settled before we come to settle some other great questions which we have got to settle. I am myself of the opinion that the American people are to be brought face to face with questions such as have never been presented to them before.

Mr. President, I am not one of those who lie awake at night or who worry about what will be the conduct of the American people. I have an abiding faith in the good sense of the great masses of my countrymen. I know that their intuitions are correct. I know when you submit to them a question involving the great interests of this nation, they will settle it properly, and they will settle it righteously, too. If it becomes necessary for the American people to change their policy and to do that which we have heretofore declined to do—if, in the interests of the American people or in the interests of humanity, such a policy becomes necessary, they will be found solving that question in the right direction.

I am one of those who do not believe that any evil will ever come to the Republic by the exercise of that great spirit of humanity which induced us to go into this war. I do not believe when you rally the American people in the interests of freedom, you will do anything to debase them. I do not believe that will be possible, though we may take in Cuba, Puerto Rico, the Hawaiian Islands, and the Philippine Islands. I do not believe you will endanger the solidity or the perpetuity of American institutions, because I believe that we are capable of settling these questions and settling them righteously and properly.

As I said the other evening—and I am going to repeat it—every time we have acquired territory we have had this same controversy, honestly made, I have no doubt. I have before me now the debate which occurred in 1811, when the Territory of New Orleans was admitted as the State of Louisiana. Mr. President, there have not been any such prognostications of evil from our friends who are opposed to this joint resolution as then came from Massachusetts, from Virginia, and from various other States when it was proposed to admit the new State of Louisiana. All the evils that are predicted now were predicted then.

It was said we would not know where to stop; it was said we should continue until we had extended our empire clear to the Pacific; and, Mr. President, thank God they were prophets when they stated that. But it was then stated as a threatened evil, as one of the things which were going to endanger the perpetuity of this Republic of States.

Mr. President, we did extend our territory in spite of Josiah Quincy, who declared, in substance, that it was the right of all States to take themselves out of the Union, and the duty of some to do so if Louisiana should be admitted. It was denied that the United States Government possessed the power either from the Constitution or without it to take in a foot of territory that did not belong to the ancient colonies. They rung the changes on the ancient limits; that you could not go beyond the ancient limits; and that the provision for the admission of States was a provision for the admission of the territory that was ours, and none other.

That is what worried Mr. Jefferson, who was a strict constructionist. He did not doubt our power to bring in the State after we had acquired the territory, but he doubted whether there was power under the Constitution to bring in any more territory at all. Yet he solved that doubt, Mr. President, in favor of bringing it in. We have erected monuments to Jefferson, and Fourth of July orators have been singing his praises ever since, and none too highly; but of all the great things he did for the country and for humanity, he never did anything comparable with that of the acquisition of Louisiana. It was the beginning of the expansion that has put twenty-eight Senators on this floor; it was that which secured to us the advent of the States on the great Pacific Sea; it was that which changed us from a third-rate power to a great nation.

Mr. President, when Texas came in there was the same argument that has been heard on the other side within the last few days, of the lack of constitutional power. There was then the cry that it was without constitutional authority or constitutional right.

As I said the other evening—and I want to say it again; it is simply a plain utterance which I think any lawyer ought to agree to—it is the prerogative of nationality, of sovereignty, to have the right to add to its territory. There is not a nation in the world that does not assert it. It could have been taken from us only by positive constitutional prohibition; and if that had been suggested, do you believe the great men of that day would have agreed that we were to be bound by the province of Spain or France on the west and by the province of Great Britain on the north, and that under no circumstances were we to expand our territory?

Oh, no, Mr. President, they would not have put that into the Constitution, and they did not put it in. He who hunts the Constitution over will find no authority for the admission of new territory, for the admission of a new State, outside of that which existed at the time. You get that power in the power of sovereignty; you get that power as you get many other powers which a great nation must exert; you get it because this is a nation and because such a power is essential to its preservation and to its prosperity. Every great power that belongs to every other nation belongs to us.

Do you believe that our fathers, who expected some day we would be great, but perhaps not in a hundred years so great as now, wanted to hedge us in? Josiah Quincy objected to the exercise of that power because it created a disparity between the States. He said the power would be transferred from one section to the other. Others objected for the same reason.

Mr. President, I promised at one time that I would not debate the Hawaiian question, and I shall not. I debated that question in 1894 quite to my satisfaction. These are not new questions to me. I have considered for forty years the question of what is the power of the Government of the United States with reference to these islands and to acquire what may be called foreign lands.

I have been a student of these questions. I came into active life—as a voter, I mean—when these great questions were before the American people and when there were great men in public life—when there were men like Marcy, of New York, of whom I have often spoken here, because he was a citizen of the State of which I was then a citizen, and a member of the political party with which I commenced my political life. He was then contending for the admission of these islands. You have not had a greater constitutional lawyer in the Democratic party since he died. You have not had a purer man. You have not had a man who was more democratic in his sentiments than Mr. Marcy.

I was following his flag. I was a Democrat of the Marcy stripe, and I have been following that flag ever since. I have been believing that it was a mission which we had to take in these islands, because they are needful to us and because of the great development that I believe is to come to us when we have 200,000,000 people on this continent; more than that, when we shall have a population equal to that of China, maintained here, as I believe it can be, in comfort, in happiness, in liberty, and when our trade to the Pacific Sea and across it will be the great trade of the world and a great boon to this great population when it shall be overflowing and filling the land with just such people as we have to-day, only, I trust, a little better.

Mr. President, we want those islands. We want them because they are the stopping way across the sea. Senators may talk about Alaska. They may tell us that you have a better coaling station. It is not true. Why do not your ships go there? They go the other way because the God who made the winds and the waves decreed that the ships shall go in the line of water as it rushes and the wind as it blows. That is why they go to Honolulu. Seven out of eight of the great lines that go across the water go there. Every sailing ship that goes out of San Francisco goes there, and it goes there because the wind and the tide decree that it shall.

Mr. President, those islands are necessary to our safety, they are necessary to our commerce, and we can give to those people the blessings of a free government and not injure ourselves. On the other hand, there lies on our border the richest island of its size, save one, in the world, an island cursed for four hundred years by a government such as few countries have ever had. There ought to be a population there of 20,000,000. Java, no bigger and but little richer, has 20,000,000 under the kindly administration of Holland. On that island, with a government such as we shall give them or a government such as they shall establish and we shall assist them in maintaining, there will be in a few years the most industrious population of the world, where labor will be the best rewarded because of the richness of the soil. It can be made a source of great benefit to us and we can be the agency of great good to them.

Will we let any other power have it? All say not. We have gone to war not to acquire it, but to give those people a government such as they are entitled to and to avoid the annoyance and the damage and the dangers to us that a contest of that kind kept up for years brings on. I do not know what the government will be. I repeat, as I said before, I will leave it to the American people to do justice and right when the time comes, and I do not care what party is in power, whether it be the one which is now in power or another one. The American people will see to it that justice is done the people there and that justice is done to us here.

Mr. President, we will be met in December with another question farther from our doors, more difficult infinitely than these others. The question we are debating is of no consequence perhaps compared with what you will meet then. Will you take from Spain the 2,000 islands that are now Spain's and return them to Spain? I have been studying the history of those islands. There is not much to be learned about them. I found some difficulty in getting at the facts, but I will venture to say that within two hundred years the sun has not shone in any other portion of the world on such a government as was found in those islands—on such wickedness, such oppression, such imbecility and fraud as has been exhibited by the Spanish Government of those islands for two hundred years. Having gone to war to free Cuba with 1,500,000 people, are we going to return to the tender mercies of Spain 8,000,000 men as good in every respect as the people who inhabit the Island of Cuba, and in my judgment a great many of whom are infinitely better?

Mr. President, that is one phase of the question. I will dismiss that by saying that the party which will propose to return those islands will go out of power in the American nation and will remain out for a generation. The American people will never submit to it and no Administration will propose it. No Senator will stand here and advocate it, either, when the time comes. What shall we do with them? Shall we trade them off? Shall we become a peddler, and shall we say to some great power, "Doubting our ability to maintain a good government for these people, doubting their ability to maintain a government for themselves, will you take the islands off our hands and try your hand at it and see how you will get along, and give us something in return?" That would be a spectacle for the gods. It never will happen. No man will disgrace us by proposing it.

If some newspaper writer has suggested it, no statesman will; and if he did, the American people would declare we have not sacrificed our men in Manila for the purpose of returning the islands to Spain or trading them off to anybody else. Where the American soldier dies and is buried and the American flag is put up, I say there it will stay, and we will grapple with the great problem whether we are capable of managing colonies or not and try it; and if we fail, it will be the first time that the Anglo-Saxon race has failed when these great problems have been presented. It will be the first time that the American people have failed when great questions were presented to them to solve them properly and righteously and in the interest of their own people and the world.

Mr. President, let us meet it. Let us say to the world, let us say to everybody, "We are going to do the right thing when the right time comes." If these people are fit for local government, and can stand alone according to the principles that we have proclaimed, it will be our duty to see that they do. If they can not, it will be our duty to see that they have such a system and such education as will put them in line where ultimately they can enjoy the blessings of a free flag.

Mr. President, you hear mutterings of Germany, of Japan, of Russia, and of France. They tell us that Germany has a squadron there, and they do not know what it means. I saw the other day that Prince Henry said to Dewey something that indicated that he might want to have a hand in the protection of German interests in Manila, and Admiral Dewey, who understood the laws of war, knew we were there in control, and that nobody else had a right except with our consent to land marines, said: "Prince, I hope you will not get your ships between my guns and the enemy;" and he will not.

Let us give the world to understand that we did not seek this war; that we did not go into it for conquest; that we went into it for the purpose of enlarging the area of human freedom, and that we can enlarge it at home and abroad; that if our duty required us to do it in Cuba, it requires us to do it in the Philippine Islands, and that we will settle this question for ourselves. We will say to Spain when she gets out, "Everything you or your people have got here shall be kindly cared for." We will say to Germany, "Your people shall have our protection, but you keep your hands off. We will not tolerate your interference, because we are capable of taking care of your people as well as you are yourselves."

I would say to the world, when this war is over, "We will settle with Spain. We want no interference. We want no concert of powers;" and if I was President, I would not allow any concert of powers to address me on the subject of peace. I would say to them, "The American nation is big enough to conduct this war to a successful issue. She is generous enough and good enough when it is through to make an honorable and proper peace with the enemy that she has subdued." Our honor and reputation among the nations of the world are at stake.

With the greatest population, save one, of any country that may be called harmonious or homogeneous—in fact, I think I may say the only homogeneous population of 75,000,000—with a wealth that no other nation possesses, with a history for fairness and good treatment of friend and foe equal to that of any other nation in the world, we can say to the world, "Let us solve this problem unaided and unassisted, and we will do it in accordance with right and in accordance with justice, keeping in mind at all times not only the interest of the American people, but every one of the people whom we invite or bring under the influence of our flag."

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I merely desire to detain the Senate a moment or two. Some little time ago my distinguished friend the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] seemed to feel that by some remarks I had charged him with filibustering. I happened to be seated where the honorable Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] now is, and rose to pass down the aisle, and the Senator remarked, "You can not play that game;" and I supposed, coming into view of him, that he addressed the remark to me, of course not intending it for the RECORD. I replied that I thought the game was being played upon the other side of the aisle. I meant no injustice to the Senator from Arkansas. To use a frank, perhaps a somewhat brutal, expression, the incomings and the outgoings of the Senator from Arkansas are none of my business. He is responsible to his God, to his country, and to his constituents for his actions and is in no wise responsible to me; and in a spirit of casual little pleasantry, as I passed down the aisle, I said I thought the game was being played on the other side.

I find that I am entirely mistaken; that I made the motion to adjourn, and that it was not made by the honorable Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN]; that I suggested the absence of a quorum, and that the suggestion was not made by the Senator from Nebraska; that I demanded a division, and that the demand did not come from the honorable Senator from Nebraska. There has been some nightmare about this business. I have been the gentleman who has been filibustering and making all these motions. The record, so far as any filibustering is concerned, is made. It is none of my business. The honorable Senator from Nebraska has the right under the rules of the Senate to make as many motions as he wishes, and I have the right to remain here and to respond to the roll call or I have the right to go away. He has the right to do as he pleases, and I have the right to do as I please, amenable always to the rules and regulations of the Senate.

I approach always with the utmost diffidence the honorable Senator from Nebraska. When occasionally it becomes necessary on this side to ask the Senator, with his magnificent physique, to lift his voice in order that we may understand him, he always responds with characteristic kindness, with some facetiousness or some play at repartee. We make the request merely because we desire to have the benefit of the vast information that the honorable Senator from Nebraska has.

Mr. President, I have been much interested in this matter. I am earnestly for the annexation of Hawaii; my people are for the annexation of Hawaii, and I am willing to stay here until that result can be accomplished; but I want to say to the Senator from Nebraska, with all humility, with all kindness, with all diffidence, that there is a greater question here now than the annexation of Hawaii, and that is whether the expressed majority of the people throughout the whole country, whether the great majority in the House of Representatives, whether an ascertained majority in the Senate of the United States, shall rule. It is a question, Mr. President, once more in this country, of majority rule.

Mr. ALLEN. I was not aware that I had incurred the enmity of the Senator—

Mr. WILSON. I beg to say to the Senator that he can under no circumstances of any kind or any character, either here or elsewhere, incur my enmity. I have enmity to no living man. I love the honorable Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I was not aware that anything had taken place by which I could incur the enmity of the Senator from Washington aside from my inability, which is a defect of nature, when I first begin talking, to be heard any distance. It is a source of annoyance to me that I can not always talk when I first start off with that fullness that I can after a few moments' exercise of my vocal chords. But it is a defect for which I am not responsible, and for which I hope I may not be again catechized by the Senator from Washington here or elsewhere. If I could remedy it, I would do so very readily and very cheerfully.

Passing by the very pleasant remarks of the Senator from Washington, I want to reply to the more serious remarks of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. I take the remarks of the Senator from Alabama more seriously than I do those of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Nebraska whether he prefers to go on to-night or in the morning?

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to have the remark of the Senator from Massachusetts repeated to me. I ask the Reporter to read it.

Mr. HOAR. I merely asked the Senator whether he preferred to go on to-night or in the morning. I did not know at what length he proposed to speak.

Mr. ALLEN. I would just as lief go on in the morning, notwithstanding it is Sunday, as to go on to-night, although I desire—

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator does not prefer to go on to-night, I will make a motion to adjourn. I wish to do whatever he desires.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not undertake to destroy an explanation that seems necessary for me in view of what the Senator from Alabama has said.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly not. I did not know at what length the Senator proposed to address the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. In the first place, the Senator from Alabama seems to think it is a crime for any person to disagree to any proposition he may make. There is no Senator in this Chamber for whom I have higher consideration than I have for the Senator from Alabama, but I do not propose to have the Senator from Alabama classify me, nor do I propose to have him draw deductions for me. The Senator from Alabama seems to think that every man who does not agree with him—and I do not know whether I agree with him yet or not until I have heard the arguments pro and con on this question—must, by force of that fact, be dishonest in his opinion.

Yet, Mr. President, look at one or two of the deductions of the Senator from Alabama. He lays down the preposterous proposition that no student of law having two years' experience in a law school ought to lay down, and that is that our sick soldiers can not enjoy the hospitality of the Hawaiian Government without its being a violation of international law. If that is a test or a sample of the international law of the Senator from Alabama, I do not and will not follow him. It is not the law. It is not to be found in any book.

Every government is at liberty and under an obligation to care for castaway seamen. Every government, even the enemies themselves, are required to care for unfortunate wounded or sick soldiers. Every government upon the face of the earth recognizes and acts upon that proposition. Yet because some of us, myself among the number—for the Senator's remarks were aimed at me—are not ready to vote to-night, we are to be characterized as filibusters, whatever that may mean.

Mr. President, I have seen the Senator from Alabama himself filibuster, and I will call his attention to the time when he did it. He did it in 1893, during the silver debate. One of the foremost Senators in that discussion, whenever there was filibustering on hand, was the Senator from Alabama.

I care nothing about being called a filibuster. I would just as lief be a filibuster as a swashbuckler or anything else. I have a right to enjoy my opinion as an American citizen and as a Senator of the United States without crooking my knee whenever the Senator from Alabama disagrees with me. I have my convictions; they are strong and determinate. Am I to submit to the dictation of the Senator from Alabama or be characterized by him as a filibuster and an enemy of the country and opposed to the war, and all such political rot as that, for that is what it is?

The Senator draws the conclusion himself that every man who does not see this question as he does is opposed to the war, is obstructing the war, to use his language. Mr. President, I should like to know what sacrifice the Senator from Alabama has made or will make during this struggle greater than the sacrifice you and I will make to carry on the war successfully that authorizes him to speak thus. There are many men in the United States who stand as close to our Army as the Senator from Alabama. He can not stand closer than many other thousands of men.

What is there about the relation that authorizes the Senator to say to those of us who may disagree with him that we are obstructing the war, and carry out that impression in the country? Does the successful prosecution of this war depend upon the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands? Not at all. There is no more connection between the successful prosecution of the war and the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands than there would be between the passage of a bill to incorporate a railroad and the prosecution of the war. There is no synthetic relation whatever.

Yet because I desired the Senate to adjourn at half past 4 o'clock on Saturday afternoon until 11 o'clock Monday, for which I myself voted with the Senator from Alabama, that those of us who have not given this question, by force of circumstances, as close attention as some others might have an opportunity to investigate it, the Senator from Alabama, with the imagination of a girl at school, characterizes us as obstructionists, as opposed to the prosecution of the war and the President's policy.

Mr. President, is it necessary that you or I shall accept everything the President of the United States does or may do to enable us to escape the consequences of being accused of obstructing the war? Is it fair for any man to take advantage of an inflamed condition of the public mind to threaten his associates in this Chamber with punishment at the hands of his constituency if he does not accept a particular view of a particular question?

I want to say, without announcing my position on this question one way or the other (which I shall not announce until I have given it closer investigation), that I am perfectly willing to take the consequences of my action here. If my judgment should be that I ought to vote against annexation and the judgment of the people of Nebraska should be to the contrary, I can accept their judgment. I would rather walk out of the Senate and stay out of it than to violate what I believe to be right.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, June 27, 1898, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

MONDAY, June 27, 1898.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on motion of Mr. BAKER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

PAYMASTER'S DEPARTMENT, UNITED STATES ARMY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Paymaster-General of the Army recommending a number of promotions in that branch of the service; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing requesting an urgent deficiency appropriation for the work of his Bureau amounting to $30,000; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ORDNANCE STORES AND SUPPLIES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War submitting an additional estimate of appropriation for "ordnance, ordnance stores, and supplies" required for the use of the War Department for the first six months of the fiscal year 1899, $50,900; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

INDUSTRIAL HOME SCHOOL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia submitting an estimate of appropriation for sewerage for new building at the Industrial Home School, amounting to $1,610.50; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MAUMEE BAY LIGHT STATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Light-House Board requesting the authority of Congress to pay the East Side Construction Company of Toledo, Ohio, on account of their contract for the pile foundation for two beacons at Maumee Bay light station, Ohio; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. PLATT of New York presented a petition of the Republican Club of New York City, praying for the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the congregations of the Presbyterian, Methodist, Universalist, and German Evangelical churches, all of Webster, in the State of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in all Government buildings; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the congregations of the Presbyterian, Methodist, Universalist, and German Evangelical churches, all of Webster, in the State of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation to raise the age of protection for girls to 18 years in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the congregations of the Presbyterian, Methodist, Universalist, and German Evangelical churches, all of Webster, in the State of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the interstate and mail circulation of newspaper descriptions of prize fights; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the congregations of the Presbyterian, Methodist, Universalist, and German Evangelical churches, all of Webster, in the State of New York, praying for the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of the congregations of the Presbyterian, Methodist, Universalist, and German Evangelical churches, all of Webster, in the State of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the reproduction of prize fights by the kinetoscope or other kindred devices; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the congregations of the Presbyterian, Methodist, Universalist, and German Evangelical churches, all of Webster, in the State of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the interstate transmission of lottery messages and other gambling matter by telegraph; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the congregations of the Presbyterian, Methodist, Universalist, and German Evangelical churches, all of Webster, in the State of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation to substitute voluntary arbitration for railway strikes; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the congregations of the Presbyterian, Methodist, Universalist, and German Evangelical churches, all of Webster, in the State of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation to protect State anti-cigarette laws by providing that cigarettes imported in original packages on entering any State shall become subject to its laws; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4766) granting to the Muscle Shoals Power Company right to erect and construct canal and power stations at Muscle Shoals, Alabama, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5527) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Oregon and Washington Bridge Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Columbia River, between the State of Oregon and the State of Washington, and to establish it as a post road," reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10477) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the county of St. Louis, in the State of Minnesota, to build or authorize the building of a foot and wagon bridge across the St. Louis River between Minnesota and Wisconsin, at a point near Fond du Lac, in said State of Minnesota," approved June 11, 1896, reported it without amendment.

Mr. PASCO submitted a report to accompany the bill (S. 4690) for the relief of certain homestead settlers in Florida heretofore reported by him.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. KYLE introduced a bill (S. 4826) granting a pension to Emma E. Mowrey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 4827) relating to the flag of the United States on merchant vessels; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 178) recognizing the gallantry of Frank H. Newcomb, commanding the revenue cutter Hudson; of his officers and men; also retiring Capt. Daniel B. Hodgson, of the Revenue-Cutter Service, for efficient and meritorious services in command of the cutter Hugh McCulloch at Manila; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PRINTING OF CONFERENCE REPORT ON BANKRUPTCY BILL.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 1,000 copies of Senate Document No. 294, being the report of the conference committee on the bankruptcy bill, said documents to be delivered to the Senate document room.

PAYMENTS BY THE CHEROKEE NATION.

Mr. BATE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior transmit to the Senate copies of the correspondence, evidence, and reports relative to the payment of $400,000 by the Cherokee Nation on account of the Cherokee freedmen and the disposition of $125,000 thereof on account of services and claims in connection therewith.

HOURLY MEETING.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], laid over from Saturday. The Secretary will read the resolution. The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That on and after to-morrow the hour of the daily meeting of the Senate be 11 o'clock a. m. until otherwise ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is quite an important resolution, and as it is now five minutes past 11 o'clock and but one member, it may be two members, of the Committee on Foreign Relations have been able to get to the Capitol up to this time—

Mr. CLARK. Three.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Yes, there are three. There are more than I supposed. However, there are not more than a dozen Senators present, I believe. I suggest that there is no quorum present. There should be a quorum present before a matter of this sort is disposed of.

Mr. DAVIS. Let the roll be called.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum is suggested by the Senator from Arkansas. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Davis,	Lindsay,	Shoup,
Baker,	Fairbanks,	McBride,	Stewart,
Bate,	Frye,	Nelson,	Sullivan,
Berry,	Gallinger,	Pasco,	Teller,
Burrows,	Hansbrough,	Perkins,	Turley,
Cannon,	Harris,	Platt, Conn.	Wetmore,
Clark,	Hawley,	Platt, N. Y.	White.
Clay,	Hoar,	Pritchard,
Cockrell,	Jones, Ark.	Rosch,
Cullom,	Kyle,	Sewell,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Thirty-seven Senators have answered to their names.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I hope the absentees will be called.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The absentees will be called.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators.

Mr. WARREN, Mr. MORGAN, and Mr. MORRILL entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is not present.

Mr. LINDSAY. It seems that a very large number of the Senators who voted to have an early session this morning have failed to answer to their names. I move that the Senators whose names have been called and who failed to answer be requested to appear at once.

Mr. ALLISON. The phraseology of the motion is, I think, unusual.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Sergeant-at-Arms is so directed. A list of absent Senators has been furnished to the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. HEITFELD, Mr. DEBOE, Mr. ELKINS, Mr. PETTUS, Mr. MILLS, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. GEAR entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE-PRESIDENT (at 11 o'clock and 15 minutes a. m.). Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. HOAR. I move that all further proceedings under the call of the Senate be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. PASCO. What is the resolution?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. DAVIS on the 25th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That on and after to-morrow the hour of the daily meeting of the Senate be 11 o'clock a. m. until otherwise ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 23d instant approved and signed the act (S. 3209) making Sabine Pass, in the State of Texas, a subport of entry and delivery.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on the 24th instant approved and signed the act (S. 1726) concerning attorneys and marshals of the United States.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had on the 25th instant approved and signed the following act and joint resolution:

An act (S. 914) to compel street-railway companies in the District of Columbia to remove abandoned tracks, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 108) to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to refund and return to the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway Company $15,335.76 in accordance with the decision of the Secretary of the Interior, dated March 3, 1898.

ANNEXATION OF HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 259.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 259) to provide for annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States? The Chair hears no objection, and the joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MORGAN. Let me inquire if there is any amendment pending to the joint resolution?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No amendment is pending, but two amendments have been sent to the desk.

Mr. MORGAN. Amendments suggested?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Amendments intended to be proposed to the joint resolution, one by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] and the other by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR]. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, we now have before the Senate a joint resolution to provide for annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States. If this resolution should receive a majority of the votes of this Senate, having already passed the House of Representatives, with the approval of the President of the United States, then we will possess and own a group of islands situated in midocean, more than 2,000 miles away from our coast, and populated by 109,000 people. It will then become our duty to provide a suitable and proper government for the population of those islands. We at once assume this responsibility when we accept and take charge of them, and we should carefully weigh the consequences liable to follow our action in this new departure.

Let us see what we are to get, both in territory and population. Let us see whether or not either the territory or population is desirable. While we should be anxious and solicitous to plant the blessings of liberty and free government among all nations and in all lands, let us remember that the first duty we owe is to preserve and take care of our own Government, which is without a parallel in the history of the world. Heretofore we have avoided any complications liable to involve us in trouble with foreign powers. We have endeavored to live in peace with the world and have been content to carry on friendly commerce with all nations. We have acted toward them as we would have them act toward us. This course has enabled us not only to become great and powerful, but happy, prosperous, and peaceable, and has given us a country that challenges the admiration of the world.

But, Mr. President, I wish to go back to my first question—what are we to obtain, both in population and territory, by annexation—and then to predict what this new departure will lead to.

These islands, as I have said in my remarks heretofore, are out in midocean, more than 2,000 miles away from our coast. The nearest point on our coast to them is, if I remember correctly, 2,080 miles from Honolulu. The islands are twelve in number, with a total area of 6,667 square miles, and are located between latitudes 18° 50' 20" and 50° north, and longitude 154° 50' and 161° 40' west. The population of these islands, according to the last census, consisted of the following elements:

Hawaiians (pure and mixed)	20,504
Japanese	35,407
Chinese	21,616
Portuguese	15,291
Americans	3,080
British	2,250
Germans	1,432

Making a total population of..... 100,000

I desire to attach and read as a part of my argument an important letter, which fully analyzes a large part of this population. It is as follows:

HAWAII AND AMERICAN LABOR.

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR.

Washington, D. C., June 11, 1898.

DEAR SIR: Inasmuch as the House of Representatives has now under consideration a bill for the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands to the United States, and since there are a number of features involving principles affecting the working people of our country in the proposition to annex these islands, I beg to address you, and through you the honorable the House of Representatives, as briefly as possible, summarizing a few of the objections which prompted the delegates to the convention of the American Federation of Labor, held at Nashville, Tenn., December 15-31, 1897, to protest against the annexation of Hawaii to the United States.

Of a population estimated at about 100,000, Hawaii contains about 50,000 contract slave laborers, made up as follows:

About 80 per cent Chinese and Japanese.
About 20 per cent Portuguese from Azore Islands, and South Sea Islanders.

Some of the features of the contracts under which these 50,000 laborers work in Hawaii may be briefly stated here.

1. The terms of the contract usually run for seven years.

2. That the laborers have no right to change their employers or leave their employment.

3. That the contract to labor is specifically enforceable by the laws of Hawaii.

4. That any time a laborer may serve in prison for desertion from labor is added to the term of the life of the contract to labor.

The laborers are corralled in gangs of from twelve to sixteen, each gang having an overseer on horseback, armed with a whip with which diligence to labor is enforced.

The overwhelming number of contract slave laborers in Hawaii is employed in the sugar industry, and the master employers have always insisted that the sugar industry can not be successfully conducted without this species of slave labor in those islands.

Though this point is contested, yet if Hawaii should become annexed to the United States, the status of the laborers may not be changed; and if the Sandwich Islands as a part of the United States are permitted to continue a species of labor repugnant to the free institutions of our country, there is no safeguard against the extension of the same species of contract slave labor to the sugar industry in Louisiana and the cotton fields of the Southern States.

It required more than twenty years of constant organization, agitation, and education to legislatively close the gates of our country to the Chinese. The wisdom of that legislation has been demonstrated, until there are few, if any, who now advocate its repeal.

The annexation of Hawaii would, with one stroke of the pen, obliterate that beneficent legislation and open wide our gates, which would threaten an inundation of Mongolians to overwhelm the free laborers of our country.

Though the number in Hawaii is small in comparison to the people of the United States, yet the dangers and the possibilities are such as to make the workers apprehensive.

In the war in which the people of our country are engaged the workers are gladly volunteering their lives and their all upon the altar of the honor and the interests of our country; but we submit that in the effort to make Cuba free and independent we should not hazard the loss of our own liberty.

The foregoing is submitted in the name and by the authority of the American Federation of Labor.

Very respectfully,

SAMUEL GOMPERS,
President.

HON. THOMAS B. REED,

Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Less than 3 per cent of the entire population of these islands consists of Americans, and it will be seen by an examination of these figures that fifteen-sixteenths of the entire population is composed of Chinese, Japanese, and Portuguese. What do we as a nation want with 40,000 Hawaiians, 35,000 Japanese, and 20,000 Chinese?

Do you suppose these foreigners, unacquainted with our form of government, will make good American citizens? They are wholly unacquainted with our form of government and our institutions. They have been born and reared under a monarchical government and possess not a single qualification essential to American citizenship.

During the present session of Congress we have wisely passed stringent immigration laws, making every possible effort to prevent undesirable immigrants from becoming citizens of this country. We have zealously guarded our Pacific coast, to see to it that the Chinese should not come to America. We have been diligent and untiring in our efforts to prevent foreigners from coming to this country, excepting such as we are led to believe will make industrious and useful citizens, and only such as will assimilate with our people and accustom themselves to our laws and institutions. We have not pursued this course because of any unfriendly feeling or interest toward other nations or races. We are anxious to sow the seeds of civilization and representative government everywhere. We recognize the universal brotherhood of man, but we feel and know that the permanency of our institutions, the stability and usefulness of our Government depends upon the intelligence, virtue, and wisdom of the people.

The republics of the past which have been mighty among the powers of the earth have crumbled into hopeless decay, and the shifting sands of time have left desolate places where once were wealth and civilization. The history of the world will teach us that we enjoy the only representative republican Government ever devised for man. We have had republics in name, but not in spirit. Unlike all other governments, we are guided and directed by intelligent and educated conditions, and those who make, construe, and execute our laws are but the exponents of popular will. The lawmakers who frame our statutes are creatures of the people. In the ranks of the masses will be found the tireless teachers who mold public opinion and who fix and shape the destiny of this great Republic.

Our public press, reaching into every hamlet; our colleges and system of public schools, open to every child; our churches, planting the seeds of Christianity everywhere; our people, blessed with the freedom of speech and freedom of action; our system of railways, stretching across our mountains and valleys; our telegraph communications with all the civilized world—these are the instruments and agencies which have given to us the only real representative republican Government the world has ever seen. The superior intelligence and patriotism of the masses have sustained this Government against foreign and domestic wars and against unjust and oppressive laws. Under our system of government all power is lodged with the people. If this Government is ever destroyed, there must be a change in our citizenship, the population must become ignorant and debased. And should the time ever come when public sentiment in our country is dominated by an ignorant, corrupt, and debauched population, then, and not till then, will our Government perish.

Mr. President, I regard the pending resolution to annex the Hawaiian Islands to the United States as the most dangerous legislation ever contemplated by Congress. I may be mistaken, but do not believe that I am. I do not question the patriotism of those who entertain a different view, but to my mind there are dangers ahead of us which may involve us in ruin. When we, practically without opposition, declared war against Spain in order to bring relief to the starving Cubans, and give to them the God-given right to form and put in operation a government of their own, we passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island [meaning the Island of Cuba] except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

Mr. President, not a single Senator voted against this resolution, and, if I mistake not, the distinguished senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] was the author of that resolution. That Senator, respected and honored by his fellow-Senators and held in high esteem by the entire country, is an ardent annexationist.

On April 20, 1898, the following joint resolution became a law by the approval of the President, having previously passed both Houses of Congress:

[Public resolution—No. 21.]

Joint resolution for the recognition of the independence of the people of Cuba, demanding that the Government of Spain relinquish its authority and government in the Island of Cuba, and to withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters, and directing the President of the United States to use the land and naval forces of the United States to carry these resolutions into effect.

Whereas the abhorrent conditions which have existed for more than three years in the Island of Cuba, so near our own borders, have shocked the moral sense of the people of the United States, have been a disgrace to Christian civilization, culminating, as they have, in the destruction of a United States battle ship, with 265 of its officers and crew, while on a friendly visit in the harbor of Havana, and can not longer be endured, as has been set forth by the President of the United States in his message to Congress of April 11, 1898, upon which the action of Congress was invited: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, First. That the people of the Island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

Second. That it is the duty of the United States to demand, and the Government of the United States does hereby demand, that the Government of Spain at once relinquish its authority and government in the Island of Cuba and withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters.

Third. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed and empowered to use the entire land and naval forces of the United States, and to call into the actual service of the United States the militia of the several States, to such extent as may be necessary to carry these resolutions into effect.

Fourth. That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

We all remember the vivid description of the horrible sufferings as depicted on the floor of the Senate by the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON], the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONKEY]. When we passed that joint resolution, which was universally regarded as an act of war, we placed our justification for declaring war on high grounds. We said to the civilized world that this was not to be a war of conquest. We went to war, not for greed or gain, or to acquire any additional territory, but to save the Cuban population from starvation and extermination, and to give to them the blessings of self-government. When that unselfish and patriotic purpose was accomplished the war was to end. The civilized world approved and applauded our course, and the war for this purpose was justifiable in the sight of God and man; but had it been known that the ulterior purpose was to seize, possess, and retain Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands, to annex Hawaii, and finally Cuba, and make them a part of this country, then who would have voted for this war of conquest?

During that exciting debate, Mr. President, I was a careful listener, and being a young member of the Senate I felt a great interest in the proceedings which were to affect the destiny of this country. I well remember the remarkable speech made by the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], a speech which caught the ear of the entire country, and which is largely responsible for the war now existing between Spain and the United States. I gave to his utterances the most careful attention, and was greatly and favorably impressed when he used the following language in speaking of Cuba. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the language he used during that debate. The distinguished Senator said:

I am not in favor of annexation, not because I would apprehend any particular trouble from it, but because it is not a wise policy to take in any people of foreign tongue and training and without strong guiding American elements.

Mark you, Mr. President, our friend on the other side declared he would not annex Cuba or any other people of "foreign tongue and training and without strong guiding American elements."

If the Senator from Vermont, who is largely responsible for the war now existing in this country, were to stand by what he said, he would stand upon the floor of the Senate and vote against annexation. He was opposed to admitting any race of people into this country of foreign tongue and without strong guiding American element.

How does the distinguished Senator now stand on the annexation of Hawaii?

Is it not true, Mr. President, that when we gather in with one sweep these Chinese, Japanese, Portuguese, and Hawaiians we make a part of our population a people of "foreign tongue and training and without any strong guiding American element?"

I shall never forget the strong, vivid, and forcible speech delivered on the same occasion by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON]. Always able, logical, and eloquent, he never fails to impress himself upon the country. If I remember correctly, I caught the following words from that masterly address:

Others say, let us by resolution or official proclamation recognize the independence of Cuba! It is too late for such recognition ever to be of great avail. Others say, annexation to the United States! God forbid! I would oppose annexation with my last breath. The people of Cuba are not our people; they can not assimilate with us, and beyond all that I am utterly and unalterably opposed to any departure from the declared policy of the fathers, which would start this Republic for the first time upon a career of conquest and dominion, utterly at variance with the avowed purposes and manifest destiny of our republican government.

Will not the distinguished Senator, with his usual eloquence and logic, warn his brother Senators on the other side of this Chamber of the danger which now threatens our beloved country? Will he not join those of us who oppose annexation and if possible save this Republic from the impending danger, and point out why the Hawaiian population are not our people and why they will not assimilate with us? Will he not come to the rescue of this country and portray with his usual logic the danger of this new departure from the declared policy of the fathers? Knowing him as I do, I believe he will.

Mr. President, you will find no other country situated as the United States. We already have sufficient territory to support and maintain more than seven times our present population. It has ever been against the policy of our Government to acquire foreign territory from which we are separated by seas and oceans, which would necessarily require a strong navy and large standing army to defend and protect. It can not be questioned that such foreign territory, situated in the ocean, thousands of miles away from us, will not only be expensive, but will be a constant source of irritation and friction with foreign powers; and should insurrection arise in this newly acquired territory, in order to maintain law and quell such insurrection, a large and heavy expense would necessarily follow. Besides, such acquisitions would necessarily frequently involve us in expensive wars with foreign countries, which on account of the solidity of our country we have been able heretofore to avoid. We have not yet arrived at that point where it is necessary for us to acquire foreign territory.

We now possess an area of more than 3,000,000 square miles, nearly fifteen times as large as the area of France, while France supports a population more than one-half as large as ours. The entire states composing the German Empire contain an area of 208,700 square miles and support a population of 50,000,000 of people, while we only have a population of 70,000,000 and a territory fourteen times as large as Germany. Great Britain, properly speaking, leaving out her colonies, has an area of 121,000 square miles and supports a population of 38,000,000 of people, her population being more than one-half as large as ours, while our area is twenty-five times as large as Great Britain. Colorado and Idaho combined are larger than France.

The Territory of Arizona is almost as large as the entire territory of Great Britain. The area of Texas is twice as large as the entire area of Great Britain, and larger than the area of France or the German Empire. It is true that since our Government was organized we have acquired a large area of territory, but it is not located in the seas or in the oceans, thousands of miles away from our coasts. It will not do to cite the Louisiana purchase by Jefferson, or the annexation of Texas, or the acquisition of the Californias by Polk, or of Florida by Monroe. These are not parallel cases to the question now pending before the Senate. If these islands were contiguous to us, and by nature formed a part of our great country, then there might be some plausibility in such arguments and comparisons.

The acquisition of this territory was right and proper; nature intended them to be a part of our Government. Such acquisitions did not add in any way to the expense of maintaining our Government, either by enlarging our Navy or increasing our standing Army. An examination of our history will teach us that we have wisely in the past confined the extension of domain thus far to practically contiguous territory. This course has been sanctioned by our ablest public men, and has given to us great strength and solidity; and, in my opinion, it is the part of wisdom, economy, and statesmanship to continue this policy, when it is apparent that our present territory will support our increased population in all probability for centuries to come. The future welfare of our population and institutions should not be sacrificed or brought in question by acquisitions liable and likely to involve this country in serious complications with foreign powers.

To attempt to use the present war for the purpose of conquest is in direct violation of the declaration we made when we declared war against Spain; and to use this war for the purpose of acquiring such territory would bring upon us the contempt of the civilized world. We declared that we did not want a foot of Cuban soil; that when we pacified the people of that island and gave them the right of self-government, the war should cease: Cuba is within 80 miles of our coast, and there is much more reason and logic in annexing Cuba to this country than can be produced to show that either Puerto Rico, Hawaii, or the Philippine Islands, or any other Spanish possessions, should be made a part of our country.

Mr. President, I asserted before in this argument that when the present war with Spain began we declared to the civilized world that it was not to be a war of conquest. The freedom and independence of Cuba was the clearly expressed purpose of the war. This war has been in progress for more than two months, and it seems to me that we have forgotten Cuba and her suffering reconcentrados. We have issued four hundred millions of interest-bearing bonds to pay the expenses of this war; we have taxed the people one hundred and fifty millions more, ostensibly for the purpose of driving the Spanish army from the island of Cuba. At first the public was taught to believe that Cuban freedom and independence, and Cuban self-government, and to relieve Cuban suffering, were the objects of our supreme solicitude when we declared war against Spain. We have apparently abandoned our original purpose, and are seeking to acquire by conquest Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands, to annex Hawaii, and the next step will be to seize Cuba.

And mark my prediction, the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands is but the first step to accomplish the grand scheme of conquest. We are dispatching an army to take possession of the Philippines, which must necessarily be multiplied many times before our purpose is accomplished. We have forgotten the domestic affairs of this great nation, and are seeking to burden this Government with 10,000,000 of orientals on the other side of the world. The Senators upon the other side of this question may deny that we are contemplating this scheme, but the entire action of the Administration conclusively demonstrates that the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands is only a part of the plan to be fully executed.

Who can doubt that when this plan is put in operation, and this territory acquired, these eastern seas are then to become a gigantic arena of strife with other nations? When we acquire them we must keep them fortified at such enormous cost as to stagger the imagination. When Dewey struck the blow that sunk the Spanish fleet at the harbor of Manila, we all applauded his heroism; but if he had been ordered to sail across the ocean, leaving the population of the Philippine Islands to govern themselves, and joined Sampson and Schley in crushing the Spanish authority in Cuba, such action would have been fully in accord with the purposes of the war as expressed in our declaration by solemn act of Congress.

Senators may deny it, but the future, I fear, will demonstrate that I am right. When this scheme of conquest now entered upon is fully completed, if the majority of this Senate is successful in carrying through their plans, then Cuba, with an area of 41,655 square miles, population 1,000,000; Puerto Rico, with an area of 3,870 square miles, population 806,708; Philippine Islands, with an area of 114,326 square miles, population 7,000,000; Sulu, with an area of 950 square miles, population 75,000; Carolines and Palaoes, with an area of 580 square miles, population 36,000; Ladrones, with an area of 420 square miles, population 16,173, will all be acquired by reason of this war of conquest, and thus a new population, many of them barbarians, totally ignorant of American institutions and American Government, will be annexed to this country, and will be such a burden upon us as may eventually ruin and destroy American institutions. These are all Spanish possessions, islands located far from us, and doubtless will be acquired under the present policy as mapped out by the party now in power.

When I contemplate such a scheme I wonder what is to be the future of this country. We will not only own and possess this vast extent of territory, but we will be especially burdened with this ignorant, un-American population; and who can calculate the complications likely to arise by reason of such acquisition?

It is especially essential that we understand something of the geography of these islands and their relation to this country in order to properly appreciate the magnitude of the scheme that now seems to be under headway.

If I remember correctly, the distance from San Francisco to the Hawaiian Islands is about 2,080 miles, and the distance from the Hawaiian Islands to Hongkong is 4,961 miles. The nearest point on the coast of the Philippines to Hongkong is about 500 miles. In reality the Philippine Islands are on the other side of the ocean, within a few hundred miles of China. These islands contain a population equal to one-eighth the population of the United States. It is said that there are as many as 900 different tongues spoken there. The chief inhabitants are the Vicals, Tagals, Visayas, Zambulos, Pagasinanes, Moors, Negrites, and Chinese. Most of these islands, embracing 1,200 in number, are given over to savage barbarism.

The passage from Hongkong to the Philippines is the worst in the China seas—described as sailing sidewise through cross currents or very deep seas and into the hatching place and haunt of the terrible typhoon. These islands lie in the Pacific and are claimed by Spain. We have already seized them, and are to hoist the American flag there and never take it down. The people there are plunged into superstition, and the priests absolutely predominate everything. The population are not only ignorant, but lead idle, dissolute lives, and are described as revengeful and inveterate liars. They are described as treacherous and unforgiving enemies, inconstant friends, and subject to fits of uncontrollable rage. Gambling, cockfighting, and intoxication are their national vices.

Is it possible we are now taking the first step and are using the present war as a means to bring about a colonial policy, which is to end when all of these Spanish possessions, many of them inhabited by a lot of savages, shall become citizens of this country, and when this country shall assume the full responsibility of their government? It is true that the resolution now pending only provides for the annexation of Hawaii, but we have already seized the Philippine Islands, we are making preparations to take charge of Puerto Rico, and the signs of the times clearly point to the fact that other acquisitions are to immediately follow.

I presume that when they do follow the usual argument will be made upon the floor of this Senate—that we need these vast possessions to enable us to establish coaling stations on the Pacific Ocean. They are situated in a corner of the earth in which we have no interest, and should have none. They are right in the very heart of the ticklish Eastern question, and their retention by this Government may lead to endless international complications. The first step is to annex Hawaii, and then to embark upon a colonial policy. We are not prepared for such a policy. Nature has not intended us for such a policy, and such a policy is against the genius of our Government. If we take possession of these islands we must govern their population, either by republican government or absolutely depart from the principles which we have ever cherished.

It takes centuries for a nation to make a success in the colonial business, and even then when one succeeds, as England has done, many have failed. Colonies are a source of weakness and danger rather than of strength. The history of the world shows this. I do not believe it a wise policy to annex the Hawaiian Islands. While the population there is small, and within itself could not probably disturb our institutions, it is the beginning of a scheme which, if followed out, will involve us in endless trouble and probable ruin. It means a large and increased navy, a stronger and firmer centralized government, and an expensive standing army. We are burdened with taxation to-day—with pensions amounting to one hundred and fifty millions per year, which have accrued on account of war, and should we be involved in future expensive wars with foreign powers, then we may expect the burden of taxation to become so enormous as to be almost unbearable.

We should not depart from the teachings of the eminent statesmen of the past, whose teachings have made this the greatest country in the world.

Who can forget the forcible words of the Father of his Country, who in his Farewell Address used this language:

The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign relations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop. Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient Government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury or external annoyances; when we may take such an attitude as will give us the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by our justice, shall counsel. Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation?

Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humor, or caprice?

While Jefferson advocated the acquisition of Cuba, he distinctly said that Cuba could be defended by us without a navy, and this develops the principle which ought to limit our views. Nothing, he said, should ever be accepted which would require a navy to defend it.

Secretary Frelinghuysen said June 20, 1883:

The policy of this Government, as declared on many occasions in the past, has tended toward the avoidance of possessions disconnected from the main continent.

He also said:

The conviction of a fixed policy, dating back to the origin of our constitutional Government, was considered to make it expedient to attempt territorial aggrandizement which would require maintenance by naval forces in excess of any yet provided for our national uses, has led this Government to decline territorial acquisitions; even as simple coaling stations such territorial acquisitions would involve a responsibility beyond their utility. The United States has never deemed it needful to their national life to maintain impregnable fortresses along the world's highways of commerce.

Mr. Sherman in his Recollections uses the following forcible language, which I commend to those who now are anxious to acquire foreign territory. He said:

I hope that our people will be content with internal growth and avoid the complications of foreign acquisitions. Our family of States is already large enough to create embarrassment in the Senate, and the Republic should not hold dependent provinces or possessions. Every new acquisition will create embarrassments. If my life is prolonged, I will do all I can to add to the strength and prosperity of the United States, but never to extend its limits or to add new dangers by the acquisition of foreign territory.

It has been published since Mr. Sherman retired from the high position of Secretary of State that he has declared his opposition to the annexation of Hawaii.

General Garfield was a man of eminent ability, and who can forget the forcible language used by him on this subject?

Mr. President, it is a very remarkable fact to me that here is a departure, and one of very great importance, and that during this debate not one word has been said upon the other side in favor of the annexation of these islands. It seems that the friends of this measure are willing to attach island after island to the United States, having an ignorant population, without giving a single reason for it. No wonder that those who are opposed to it should come to the conclusion that the Government is in danger. I thought to myself no longer than last night, Was it possible that in the United States Senate we could stand here and propose to attach a foreign population of 100,000, and then desire to attach a population of 8,000,000 people, unacquainted with our institutions, and make them a part of this country and not a word be said upon the other side in favor of this new departure?

I predict, Mr. President, that the time will come when the American people will rise up as one man and condemn this un-American policy. I say, if we have arrived at that point in the history of our country where we are willing to take Puerto Rico, where we are willing to take Cuba, where we are willing to take the Philippine Islands, where we are to take a population of 10,000,000 who are unacquainted with republican institutions and republican government, and the majority will not give one reason why it ought to be done, then we ought to tremble for American institutions.

I do not hesitate to say, Mr. President, that when this war began it was said that its primary purpose was to free Cuba. My friend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] stood upon the floor of this Senate and criticised those of us who are opposed to annexation. He declared that those of us who are opposed to annexation are really obstructing the war. I thought this war was begun for the purpose of giving liberty to the people of Cuba, and I gave it my loyal support. I thought this war was begun to relieve the suffering and starving Cubans. I say to the Senator that I had no idea that this war was begun to acquire and annex the Sandwich Islands. I had no idea that we began this war to take charge of the Philippine Islands. I do not believe that the people of the United States apprehended that that was our purpose when we began the war.

I say that there ought to be debate; I say that the people of the United States ought to know what we are undertaking. We are beginning a departure here which is liable at some time in the future to involve this country in ruin. Mr. President, I feel to-day that when I express my sentiments against this resolution I represent the best interests of the thoughtful people of this great country.

You take in 109,000 people from the Sandwich Islands, you take in 9,000,000 people from the Philippine Islands, men without education, men who know nothing of republican institutions, and I will say to you that when you adopt such a policy as that, and go back and read the history of Rome and go back and read and study the rise and fall of that great government, you will see it was the barbarians and their ignorance and the want of culture and refinement that came to take charge of the government which destroyed Rome. The same might be said of Carthage; and the same can be said of other ancient republics.

Mr. President, I said in my remarks that General Garfield was a man of eminent ability; that he was a man who had the respect and confidence and esteem of the American people. He did not agree with me politically, but I can always respect and honor courage and honest patriotism and statesmanship in those who take a different political course from that which I support. I read with a great deal of pleasure his words which I will now quote. He said:

I wish to state distinctly on the general question of the annexation of outlying islands or territory, except in the north—and I make exceptions there—that I trust we have seen the last of annexation, and in this remark I include the whole group of West India Islands, and the whole of the Mexican territory contiguous to the United States, inhabited as it is by a portion of the Latin races, strangely mixed, and degenerated by their mixture, with the native races—a population and a territory that naturally enfeeble man, and a population and territory I earnestly hope may never be made an integral part of the population and territory of the United States. We occupy a portion of the great northern zone which girdles the world, and which has been the theater of the greatest achievements of civilization, especially in the history of the Anglo-Saxon races, but should we extend our possessions into the tropical Hawaiian belt we would weaken the power of our people and our Government.

Mr. President, I am not one who believes in dilatory motions. I am not trying to argue this question for the purpose of consuming time. I am glad to say that in a short experience of ten years in public life I have always believed that business principles should be applied to legislation. I do believe, though, that this question ought to be thoroughly and fairly debated upon both sides. The American people ought to know the danger that is really ahead of us in the undertaking we have now before us.

The argument made in favor of the annexation of these islands thus far is to enable us to capture the Philippine Islands. The answer to that argument is that we have no business to capture the Philippine Islands. This war was not begun for that purpose.

The next argument advanced in favor of the annexation is that we must have Pearl Harbor as a coaling station. I have heard of Pearl Harbor until I am tired of it. It has been "Pearl Harbor" ever since the annexation of the Sandwich Islands was talked about. I have never heard of a single official of that Government, be he a monarch or be he President of the Republic, or oligarchy, that was in favor of the repeal of that treaty or that was not willing, if we did not already have it, to give us a permanent right on that island—not a single one.

Do the friends of annexation really and in truth desire the Hawaiian Islands simply for the purpose of giving the United States Government a permanent coaling station there? Does any intelligent and thoughtful man for a moment believe this is the prime purpose of those who are endeavoring to annex these islands to the United States? No; they are not after a coaling station. They are not seeking a coaling station. It is empire—nothing more and nothing less.

For many years the relations existing between the people of the United States and the inhabitants of the Hawaiian Islands have been friendly and cordial. In 1840 a treaty of friendly commerce and navigation and for the extradition of criminals was entered into between the United States and the Hawaiian Government, which treaty I print as a part of my remarks. I could read it, but I will not do so, because I am here simply for the purpose of giving in an honest, fair, and legitimate way the reasons I entertain for casting my vote against this measure and representing, as I believe I do, the best interests of the people of my State.

I shall print also a protocol of the conference between the Acting Secretary of State of the United States and the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands, held at Washington on the 9th day of September, 1876. In 1884, on account of certain concessions made by this Government to the Government of the Hawaiian Islands, the United States was granted the exclusive right to establish a coaling station on Pearl River. The second article of that agreement provided as follows:

Article II.—

That is all I am going to read, because that is all which has anything to do directly with the question now pending before the Senate—

His Majesty the King of the Hawaiians grants to the Government of the United States the exclusive right to enter the harbor of Pearl River, on the Island of Oahu, and to establish and maintain there a coaling and repair station for the use of vessels belonging to the United States, and to that end the United States may improve the entrance to said harbor and do all other things needful to the purpose aforesaid.

That the entire agreement between the two Governments may be thoroughly understood, I will print the same and not read it as part of my remarks. I do this because I notice in the newspapers that I was charged on Saturday evening with attempting to assist in filibustering. I hardly know what the word means. We do not know anything about such a word in Georgia. We have never practiced it, and I have not seen it practiced here. We are simply trying to get fair treatment and to be heard, and we are anxious that the other side should be heard if there is any argument to be advanced in favor of this proposition, so that we may answer it.

I had hoped the time would never come in this great Government of ours that the United States Senate would attempt to inaugurate a foreign policy like this without both sides giving full reasons for such a new departure; and I exceedingly regret that legislation of the most important nature, legislation deeply affecting the future interests of this country, is to be passed by this Senate without a single argument produced by the other side to go to the country in favor of it.

That the entire agreement between the two Governments may be thoroughly understood, I print the same as a part of my remarks. This agreement was executed in the city of Washington on the 6th day of December, A. D. 1884. It has been argued by the friends of annexation that this treaty could be repealed at any time, and that when the Hawaiian Government shall notify us that the treaty is at an end, our right to use this coaling station ceases.

I have yet to hear an argument produced by any annexationist stating that the Hawaiian Government, either as a monarchy, an oligarchy, or a republic (and if it has ever been a republic, I do not know it), has ever contemplated the repeal of this treaty. It is certainly more to the interest of the people of that Government to have friendly commercial relations with the United States than it is for us. This treaty has been in operation since 1884, and we have had friendly commercial relations with these people for nearly half a century. We have never heard a word from any public officials representing that Government that would in any way indicate that there would be any effort to end this treaty; and besides, we have never heard a suggestion or intimation from any of those who favor annexation that if we have not a permanent right to a coaling station on those islands, the Hawaiian Government is not ready by negotiation to grant this permanent right to us.

The argument that we are liable to lose this coaling station and that it is essential to take charge of the entire islands simply to retain a coaling station there is without reason or logic to back it. It is not certain, by any means, that we have not a permanent right to this coaling station; and, to say the least of it, there has never been any effort on the part of that Government, and no desire, so far as we are informed, to cut off our rights to the coaling station for the use of vessels in the harbor of Pearl River. It has been argued that if we fail to take these islands when they are tendered us, the Hawaiian Government will tender them to some other country. If there is any force in such an argument as this, I have been unable to see it. Heretofore we have forbidden other countries taking possession of these islands. We have applied the Monroe doctrine to them in the past, and there is no reason why we should not apply it to them in the future.

If England, France, or Germany, or any foreign power, should attempt to take these islands, all we would have to do would simply be to step in and apply the Monroe doctrine, which is a part of the history of our country, and in doing so we would have abundance of precedents and law to sustain us in pursuing this policy. I desire to read a part of the message of President Monroe which we have enforced almost since our Government was organized and, when applied to foreign countries, absolutely prevents any trouble on that line. The part of the message I read is as follows, and we all are familiar with this message. That doctrine is clearly understood. I do not propose to take up the time of the Senate to read more than a few lines of that message, which are as follows:

The citizens of the United States cherish sentiments the most friendly in favor of the liberty and happiness of their fellow-men on that side of the Atlantic. In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparation for our defense. With the movements in this hemisphere we are of necessity more immediately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of the allied powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective Governments; and to the defense of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure, and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole nation is devoted.

We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.

By this we have always stood, and shall continue to stand, if we desire carefully to guard the interests of our Government; and when we stand by it no trouble can arise on the ground that other countries will be called upon to take charge of and govern this people. Let the Hawaiian Government alone. Continue our friendly commercial relations with them, and let them put in operation a government of their own choosing. Aid them in every possible way to advance in civilization, and no one can doubt that the friendly relations which have existed between the two countries in the past will continue in the future, and our commercial interests will be far better advanced and protected by such friendly relations than by acquisition of their territory and population, against the consent and contrary to the will of a large majority of her people.

I am fearful we do not fully appreciate and correctly estimate the value of our institutions. The world has never seen another government like ours. It was predicted when this Republic was founded by our fathers that we were incapable of self-government; that it would die on account of internal dissensions, and that popular government would perish from the face of the earth. These predictions have thus far proven false. Let us continue to act with prudence, wisdom, and statesmanship, that the civilized world may imitate our example, and that the blessings of liberty and free government may be established among all nations. The virtue and intelligence of our people is a sure bulwark of safety for the Republic.

The miasmas which arise from material corruption poison and pollute the air which we breathe and destroy all the life with which they come in contact. The poison of political corruption is no less subtle and destructive, and its influence upon nations and communities is no more hurtful and devastating.

I repeat, Mr. President, while history records many republics in name that have lived, prospered, and finally perished from the face of the earth, yet history fails to record another government like ours. In its theory, in its organization, in its administration, it is wholly exceptional. Rome became mistress of the world; her surpassing elegance, her invincible soldiery—all these have been the theme and story of historians and poets; but Rome was never a free representative government. Lust of empire was the ruling passion of this ancient republic. If we trace her history, watch her rise and fall, note her numerous and expensive foreign wars, record her greed and thirst for empire, we then have found the cause of her ruin.

Such acquisitions debauched her population, corrupted her Government, and at last the Goths and the vandals swarmed upon her, degrading her citizenship, and Rome was left widowed in her ruins. Carthage reared a great Government by spoliation, and called it a republic. It was a creation of ambition and conquest. Both conqueror and conquered were blotted from the lists of the nations of the earth. Rome, Carthage, and Greece have faded from the zenith of distinction and power. Unholy lust of power, not satisfied with peace and justice, always engaged in foreign wars, brought to them all alike ruin and decay. Will we not study their history and profit by the lesson which their destruction teaches us? Will we not remember that Rome was overrun by races of low vitality and that cheap labor exterminated the husbandmen of Italy? And after these husbandmen had been made insolvent by the competition of races of low vitality, they flooded swarming to the capital, deserting their farms.

Let us teach our people to pursue peaceful occupations, to love justice, and to maintain an army only for our absolute security. Let us teach them that we have a country which abounds in all things, and let us not implant in their bosoms ambitious dreams of conquest. Let us teach them to triumph by the wisdom of their counsels, the superiority of their knowledge; and let us teach them that we have a territory sufficient to maintain and take care of them and their children for generations to come. We need no additional territory. We have succeeded as a Republic for more than one hundred years. Our growth and development has been marvelous and unprecedented. We to-day possess a population of more than 75,000,000 people and can easily take care of and support more than 500,000,000. We have a climate in which we can produce an abundance of crops and fruits of every possible variety. Our minerals are inexhaustible. Our railway, telegraphic, and telephone facilities are unequaled, and give us a commercial standing superior to all nations.

The system of government established and put in operation by our fathers has been the most remarkable product in the history of the world. Under this system our steam power to-day is almost equal to that of all the world; our internal trade equals two-fifths of the world's, and our agricultural products equal one-fourth of that of the world. Our manufactures equal 85 per cent of the manufactures of the entire world, and our railroad mileage is greater than all the systems of the world combined. Our bank capital equals 32 per cent of that of the world. When we see what rapid progress we have made, and that we have outstripped all other nations in a period of a little more than one hundred years, should we not be proud of this Government given us by our fathers, and should we not be careful not to depart from the principles which have enabled us to make such wonderful progress?

We are now in our infancy. Our possibilities can not be enumerated. Our territory, our climate, and our system of government promise to us opportunities never enjoyed by any other nation. Let us not destroy it by adulterating our population and becoming complicated with foreign powers. As we stand to-day our civilization is unsurpassed. Let us multiply our churches, improve our school facilities, plant and nourish new homes in all the waste fields and deserted places, and let us in every conceivable way bless our own land and people with every facility necessary to make us a happy, contented, and liberty-loving nation.

Now is the time for the American Congress to turn its attention to American interests and to our domestic institutions—to endeavor to give to our people a better system of currency; a system of taxation that will make the burdens fall upon all alike; a system of commerce that will enable our products to be shipped to every civilized nation with the least possible cost and expense. Let us be contented with our home affairs, and let us remember that we have grown to be a nation of 75,000,000 people in a century. Let us bear in mind that we have all of the resources essential for the happiness and welfare of our people. If we avoid entangling alliances and foreign wars, and live a happy, industrious, peaceable, and contented life, then the historian of the future will never record the ruin and decay of this Republic.

Mr. ROACH obtained the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator from North Dakota be kind enough to yield to me to submit a conference report, which I think will take but a short time?

Mr. ROACH. Certainly.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I send up the papers in connection with the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and also a conference report, which is a report of disagreement.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6897) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

W. B. ALLISON,
S. M. CULLOM,
F. M. COCKRELL,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

MAHLON PITNEY,
ALEX. M. DOCKERY,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, the matters in difference now on the District of Columbia appropriation bill are only two, one relating to the municipal library in the District and the other relating to the charities in the District. The matter of the municipal library can easily be disposed of, I think, so that the only question now is as respects the disposition of the appropriations for the charities of the District.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Before the Senator from Iowa leaves that point, I should be glad to ask him what sort of a settlement he thinks is in sight on the matter of the library?

Mr. ALLISON. I think one entirely satisfactory to the Senator's view.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think the Senate was very unanimous in its expression on that subject the other day, and I hope the conferees will not yield.

Mr. ALLISON. It is not the expectation of the conferees to yield to the legislation that was put on the bill in the House.

The situation in regard to the charities is this: The House of Representatives in the original text of the bill proposed to appropriate a specific sum to be distributed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, practically in their discretion. It is substantially the provision which they inserted in the bill last year and which was disagreed to and finally relinquished by them. The Senate Committee on Appropriations and the Senate, in lieu of the provision originally inserted in the bill, proposed to appropriate for the charities of the District of Columbia to the same amount and in the same phraseology employed last year, which is now the current law.

Two years ago there was a joint select committee provided for, whose duty it should be to make a thorough and full examination into the charities of the District of Columbia and to recommend such legislation as they thought wise and proper for the future disposition of the charities. It was expected at that time that their report would appear during the last session or certainly during the present session, and that the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate would report such legislation as they thought wise upon the subject. The joint committee were unable to report until after the appropriation bill had passed the House, and they made a report suggesting legislation, some of it wise, perhaps all of it so; I do not know.

The Committee on Appropriations were not charged with and were not responsible for such legislation, having no power to place legislation of this character upon the appropriation bill. In this situation the Committee on Appropriations recommended to the Senate that the appropriations for the charities in the District should be made as heretofore, and that when the legislation recommended by the joint select committee should receive the assent of the two Houses and become a part of the law, it would be time to change the method of appropriation.

When the bill came into the Senate an amendment was offered containing a part of this legislation. It was ruled out upon the point of order that legislation of this character could not be placed upon the bill. Then the appropriations were made as I have stated, appropriating specifically to each of these charities and giving them the amount contained in the appropriation for the current year. In the conference the conferees on the part of the House made two suggestions. First, they were willing to stand upon the appropriation as made, although the House conferees were not agreed as respecting it. Then they proposed that we should place in the bill in conference a part of the legislation recommended by the joint select committee. This we regarded as absolutely inadmissible, because certainly if the Senate itself would not consider legislation upon an appropriation bill, the conferees of the Senate could under no conditions assent to legislation such as proposed respecting these charities and recommended by the joint committee. These two elements constitute the difference between the two Houses.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will ask the Senator whether the proposition of the House is simply for an aggregate amount, without specifying particular charities?

Mr. ALLISON. It is for an aggregate amount, without specifying particular charities. The House also proposed an inhibition which declared in terms that certain of the charities now receiving aid in the form of appropriations should be excluded. Senators are familiar with what was proposed. By the inhibition contained in the legislation they excluded certain charities wholly from the benefits of the appropriation.

This is the contention between the two Houses. I should be glad if in some way the Senate would express its view now in regard to the disposition that the future conferees, if there are any, shall make in reference to these charities, whether or not it is still the judgment of the Senate, in view of the fact that the joint committee has not yet reported such bills and had them acted upon by the Senate and the House, that we should appropriate as we did last year, specifically for those charities. I do not hesitate to state that in my individual judgment that is the wise course to pursue; but as this is rather a sharp contention between the two Houses, if there is any way whereby we can secure the sense of the Senate upon the subject, I shall be glad to have it.

Mr. WILSON. Do I understand that the appropriations are for certain hospitals in the city?

Mr. ALLISON. Practically all for hospitals and—

Mr. WILSON. Then I for one would say that I know of no appropriation made by Congress which is absolutely so beneficial as the appropriation we make for the hospitals of this city, or which does so much good in relieving the suffering of those who are not able to pay for such treatment. It ought to be continued and enlarged, if possible, and for one I should not be willing to change the practice that has prevailed heretofore.

Mr. ALLISON. The conferees on the part of the Senate were willing to take up the items seriatim and, if there were particular ones that the House conferees could not agree to, to debate with them the question of our receding from those special items; but their preference was to treat the question as a whole.

I move that the Senate still further insist upon its amendment numbered 13, and still further disagree to the House amendment to that amendment, and still further insist upon its amendments numbered 143 to 166, inclusive. I repeat, as I said before, that the matter of the library is only formal, but that on the question of charities I desire to have a substantive vote. If Senators think it is wiser and better for us to relinquish our plan of specific appropriation to existing charities and to agree to the general plan suggested by the House, they will so vote.

Mr. WILSON. Suppose we vote the amount in lump; would there not be quite a scramble in its distribution?

Mr. ALLISON. I am very much afraid there would be. If we recede from our specific amendments, the result will be to exclude by the legislation proposed by the House a certain number of these charitable institutions and, I think, worthy charities in the District.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I merely desire to say a word. The joint committee of the two Houses, to which the Senator from Iowa has alluded, were appointed under a provision in an appropriation bill looking to a thorough investigation of all the charities in the District of Columbia. They have really worked as hard as any committee I know of, and in their efforts to arrive at conclusions they have found it necessary even to publish three volumes of their work, so as to lay the entire subject-matter of the investigation of each distinct charity before Congress. This work was much more onerous and laborious than was anticipated when the committee were appointed, and the result was we were not able to arrive at a conclusion or to make recommendations on the subject to be presented to Congress until late in the present session, when, in the absence of the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. McMILLAN], I filed in the Senate a report of the committee. That was after the bill had passed the House and, I think, after it had been reported to the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. It was after it was reported.

Mr. FAULKNER. Yes; after it was reported. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] asks whether those reports have been published. I will state that they have been published. They go into the subject very fully and make recommendations. Whether the recommendations are wise or unwise is for Congress to determine.

That being the situation, all the information now being before Congress, so that at the next session of Congress the two bodies can take up the whole subject and by a bill provide for carrying out the recommendation of the committee, which will be a guide to the Appropriations Committee when they formulate the District of Columbia appropriation bill, I think it would be much wiser to concur in the motion submitted by the Senator from Iowa.

Then, no matter what may be the difference as to the judgment of Senators on the main question, Congress can carefully, deliberately, earnestly, and intelligently consider this whole subject upon a bill that will be submitted by the Committees on the District of Columbia of the two Houses and pass it at the next session in time to give direction to the Appropriations Committee as to these appropriations. Otherwise, if we agree to their provision, some of the most valuable charities in the District, under the inhibition suggested by the Committee on Appropriations of the House, will at once and without any notice be cut off, which I think would be very detrimental to the interest of the public in the District.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I wish to say only a word. As has been stated by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, there are just two items in the District appropriation bill which are now under contention. One is the municipal library item and the other the proposition to appropriate specifically for the District charities. Congress for several years has been appropriating specifically so much for one charity, so much for the other, and so on, all through the list. Now, the other branch of Congress, so far as the charities are concerned, has been contending that the appropriations for all those charities ought to be in a lump sum. We have disagreed with them on that question, and they come in with another scheme, which is entirely new legislation.

As the Senator from West Virginia has stated, the investigation of the subject of the charities in this District has been going on for some time and a long, and I have no doubt a valuable, report has been made, but the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate do not feel that we can afford to dispose of all that work by hasty legislation on an appropriation bill providing for a board to take charge of the charities, and so forth.

So it seems to me the Senate has but one thing to do wisely, and that is to agree to the motion of the chairman of the committee and try another conference so as to see whether the matter can not be finally disposed of in the line of what we did last year and possibly the year before.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate request a further conference with the House of Representatives upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference, and Mr. ALLISON, Mr. CULLOM, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

Mr. ALLISON. I am much obliged to the Senator from North Dakota for yielding to me.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. H. L. OVERSTREET, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 129) to amend an act for the correction of the military record of Wilhelm Spiegelburg, approved July 21, 1892;

A bill (S. 242) for the relief of Moses Pendergrass, of Missouri;

A bill (S. 873) to remove the charge of desertion against Edwin Higgins;

A bill (S. 1807) granting an increase of pension to Abraham T. Casey;

A bill (S. 1334) granting a pension to William J. Murray;

A bill (S. 1361) granting a pension to John N. Landon;

A bill (S. 1363) granting an increase of pension to Alvah A. Eaton;

A bill (S. 1737) to correct the military record of Patrick Hanly;

A bill (S. 2036) to increase the pension of Mary C. Cooke;

A bill (S. 2063) to authorize the White and Black River Valley Railway Company to build a bridge across the Black River in Arkansas;

A bill (S. 2117) granting an increase of pension to Fannie Kutz;

A bill (S. 2338) granting a pension to James C. Young;

A bill (S. 2393) granting an increase of pension to Henry Hinckley;

A bill (S. 2813) granting a pension to Barney Smith;
 A bill (S. 3110) granting a pension to Patrick Breen;
 A bill (S. 3111) granting a pension to Cornelia M. Mason;
 A bill (S. 3169) granting a pension to John R. Bevan;
 A bill (S. 3368) extending the time for the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at Yankton, S. Dak.;
 A bill (S. 3506) granting a pension to Mary E. Kline;
 A bill (S. 3596) to ratify the agreement between the Dawes Commission and the Seminole Nation of Indians;
 A bill (S. 3668) granting an increase of pension to Ephriam C. Baldwin;
 A bill (S. 4260) granting a pension to Margerett Ferriter;
 A bill (S. 4298) granting an increase of pension to Edward R. Young;
 A bill (S. 4400) granting an increase of pension to Joel Blackman;
 A bill (S. 4439) to relieve owners of mining claims who enlist in the military or naval service of the United States for duty in the war with Spain from performing assessment work during such term of service;
 A bill (S. 4456) to designate Gladstone, Mich., a support of entry;
 A bill (S. 4568) granting a pension to Jacob Miller;
 A bill (H. R. 5880) to vest in the Commissioners of the District of Columbia control of street parking in said District;
 A bill (H. R. 8581) for the protection of the people of the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; and
 A joint resolution (H. Res. 231) for improvement of San Joaquin River, in Stockton and Mormon channels, California.

ANNEXATION OF THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 259) to provide for annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. President, I do not expect to say anything new, or even interesting, in rising to discuss the question under consideration. If I were vain enough to imagine myself capable of such power and ability, I realize that it would be impossible to elicit attention, from the experience of the few days since this debate commenced and the object lesson of empty seats presented to the view in this Chamber. It seems to be the plan adopted by the majority, and is no doubt truthfully set forth in the following clipping:

[From the Washington Times, June 22, 1893.]

True to its policy of letting the obstructionists talk themselves tired, the majority in the Senate took things easily and good-naturedly yesterday. Senator WHITE treated the unfortunate in the chair to the first section of what may be a two or three days' dissertation, while most of his colleagues sought the seclusion which the cloakroom grants. Twice they were called back, on motions of Mr. JONES of Arkansas and Mr. PASCO, but as soon as they had answered to their names they disappeared again. The test vote of Monday removed all doubt about the result, and the American element in the body are uninterested for a couple of days until the traditional "wind courtesy" has been fully accorded. After that the deluge.

I do not mention this in complaint or in the nature of protest against the attitude of the majority thus assumed and maintained on a grave public question. I am influenced in the remarks I shall submit on this question by a desire to state the reasons, or some of them, controlling me in my action, and for the satisfaction I expect to derive hereafter in putting myself on record as to the vote I expect to cast on this resolution.

It is perhaps to be expected that misrepresentation, intentional and otherwise, should be indulged in in heated political contests and keenly disputed questions, and the fact that they are looked for has a tendency to mitigate the harm they might otherwise cause. But in a great, broad, national, nonpartisan question such as this is, or ought to be, it is unaccountable to me that there should be intentional misrepresentation, and yet the wonder grows that the friends and advocates of this scheme should descend to abuse of their opponents. Abuse and invective were not lacking against those in opposition whilst the treaty of annexation was under discussion.

Since this resolution was first introduced for discussion the floodgates of vituperation have been opened wide and the flow has been abundant and disgusting. I confess my surprise at this line of procedure on the part of the advocates of annexation. If, as they claim, this scheme is of such transcendent importance, and its advantages so self-evident and intelligently apparent, what is the necessity for calling names and imputing improper motives to those who oppose? Abuse is not argument, and calling names never yet convinced anybody, even though open to conviction. It is in all cases the most conclusive evidence of a weak cause, and so I conclude that because of want of faith in the convincing nature of any arguments that may be adduced in favor of this project, resort is had to abuse of those who oppose its adoption.

Why, even here in this body, where statesmanship is supposed to prevail to a large extent and which is the legitimate forum of argument and debate, the friends of this resolution have determined upon a policy of silence, so that those of us who might be impressed and open to conviction are compelled to go hungry and thirsty for information and that mental pabulum upon which to satisfy a craving natural under the circumstances. I am aware it is said there is a majority in this body favorable to this resolution, and the majority should and will prevail, as it always has in the history of the United States Senate. But I fail to understand or appreciate the hostility that has been more or less apparent here and elsewhere toward those of us who desire to give the reasons that actuate us in our opposition to the proposed action. I am actuated by a profound conviction on this subject and feel so entirely right in my view that I am desirous of putting on record not only my vote against the resolution, but along with that vote some of the reasons for so casting it, and so let it stand for my vindication, if, as I believe, my position will be proven the right one, in the future when this project as now proposed and carried out will return to plague us, to our very great annoyance, confusion, and possible jeopardy. If I am mistaken and my position is the wrong one to assume at this time, then will my record stand to prove it, and I am ready and willing to suffer all the consequences of the error of my ways.

In making this statement, of course I assume that the islands in question will remain in evidence long enough not only to be annexed, but also to test the wisdom or unwisdom of the annexation. I have been considerably interested in reading the history of these gems of the sea, and that reading has impressed me with the possibility, yes, I will even say the probability, that some day they will vanish from the view, like the famed Atlantis, city of the sea, beneath the waters that surround them in one of those convulsive upheavals of nature, occurrence of which, we are informed, is frequent in the locality where these islands are situated. Why, sir, even now whilst I am talking it is not impossible that some mighty, mysterious movement of the unknown, hidden forces of nature should startle the world by engulfing these islands in the deep waters of the ocean, so that if the people of these United States might still have that great desire which we are told now consumes them to possess these gems, they would need to use submarine divers to secure them.

Mr. President, admitting, for sake of argument, all that has been said in favor of the annexation of Hawaii to be true; granting to the friends of this measure that the United States would be materially benefited by an increase of commerce in times of peace and greater security in times of war; not denying that the acquisition of these islands would prove a greater benefit than any new territory ever yet added to the United States, still there is much that should be very carefully considered before a vote is cast in favor of this resolution. It may be that the doctrine of the early fathers forbidding the United States from entering into political alliances with foreign nations has become antiquated; it is possible that having succeeded in building up our own country we owe it to the civilization of the world to now build up other countries. Times change, and it may be that policies should change with the times.

There are tides in the affairs of nations as in the affairs of men which, taken at the flood, lead on to fortune, and this may be one of those tides at its flood. Others have discussed these matters; they have been brought forward in argument, and have been answered. The minds of all Senators are probably made up one way or the other as to the desirability of annexing Hawaii, and I will therefore take it for granted, so far as the consideration of one very important phase of the question is concerned, that the civilization of the United States would be improved by infusion of that of the Kanakas; that none of the lepers of that unhappy land would ever scatter leprosy in this country; that, rescued from their poverty, they would make us all rich, and the brightest star in the blue field of our flag would be that represented by the country of the dusky ex-cannibals.

So far as this argument is concerned, I will admit, for argument's sake, that in case we were in trouble with any European power that country would send its ships to Asia and then across the Pacific Ocean in order to attack our western coast. I will even admit that Hawaii is so large and so strong that such European power could not possibly send its ships around Hawaii, but must inevitably have them stopped as soon as they struck our coaling station in Pearl Harbor. I will admit, Mr. President, all of these things, notwithstanding the historical fact that Gibraltar is as strong a fortification as Honolulu, and not much farther distant from the United States coast; and yet we have never had trouble by reason of England's owning Gibraltar.

I will admit, Mr. President, that no foreign fleet could live in the Pacific Ocean without coaling at this island, where coal is yet to be discovered. I will admit that England could not utilize her vast coal fields in British Columbia, only a few miles from our coast cities, if we had a coaling harbor 2,000 miles across the sea. I will admit, Mr. President, that we can not use our harbor in the Aleutian Islands, although 500 miles nearer Japan, because the ships of commerce do not stop there to sell beads and trinkets to the aborigines.

I will admit, Mr. President, that war vessels must of necessity follow the line of commercial vessels, even though another line is 500 miles nearer. I will admit that we made a great mistake when we refused to annex Hawaii at the time the islands were offered to us, over forty years ago. I will admit that England made a great mistake when she refused to take these islands as a gift. I will admit that, in addition to sugar cane and cheap labor, these islands will produce, in inexhaustible quantities, every gem known to the lapidary, every mineral known to the metallurgist, and every agricultural product mankind uses for food. I will admit all of these things, Mr. President; and if there are any other advantages claimed for these islands, I will admit them. My admission will not endow these islands with those attributes which they do not possess any more than the assertions of the friends of annexation can so endow them.

At this time, and under the existing circumstances, the question of whether or not we would be benefited by annexation ought not to be considered for a moment. There are far graver issues than this involved. A century and a quarter ago, a lapse of time which is very short when considered as a period in the world's history, the doctrine of government was that rulers were divinely ordained to rule and the people had no right except that of obeying the monarch, which they were taught should be a pleasure as well as a duty. Our Declaration of Independence established an entirely new theory of government, and, during the last century and a quarter, it has shaken every throne in the civilized world. France is a Republic; Russia, which was a despotic Empire, and Germany, which was nearly as much so, are under socialistic rule; England has granted universal suffrage, and there is not now a civilized nation in which the people have not more or less a voice in the government.

This new theory, inaugurated by the United States, now adopted by every writer on political economy, was that the right to govern rested upon the consent of the governed. There were other clauses in our Declaration of Independence carrying out this fundamental doctrine, such as that all men were created equal and that they were possessed of certain inalienable rights. But the foundation rock upon which rests our entire political fabric is that the right to govern depends upon the consent of the governed. Whose consent have we as to Hawaii? We have the consent of the American President, of the provisional government, and of his American cabinet.

We have here for our consideration petitions for annexation, supposed to be signed by Hawaiians, and petitions against annexation, purporting to have Hawaiian signatures. Each side denies the authenticity of the document presented by the other. Without bringing up any mooted questions of fact, I desire to state very briefly and in a manner most favorable to the friends of annexation the circumstances which led up to the establishment of the provisional government. They could be truthfully stated in a form very much more favorable to my argument, but I intend to give them so biased in favor of annexation that the strongest friend of Hawaii's becoming a part of the United States will not feel disposed to dispute the proposition.

Two years subsequent to a revolution inaugurated for the purpose of forcing the granting of a constitution, and after this object had been accomplished and the constitution granted, leading white citizens of Honolulu, charging that the constitutional Monarch was immoral and inefficient, organized a committee of public safety. They called upon the minister of the United States, who agreed to land marines from an American vessel then in the harbor in case a provisional government was formed. The committee of public safety organized themselves into a mass meeting, formed a provisional government, and the marines were landed the same day.

A treaty was immediately sent to the President of the United States providing for the annexation of Hawaii to this country and the document transmitted by him to the Senate. A few weeks afterwards the succeeding President of the United States withdrew the treaty and sent a special commissioner to the islands, who, after examining a great many witnesses, reported against the ratification of the treaty. Another treaty was made, transmitted to the Senate, and this failed of ratification. It is now sought by indirection to do that which could not be done directly, and annex these islands by resolution. It has now been five years since the provisional government was established, and during that entire five years representative Hawaiians have fought hard against annexation.

The officials of the provisional government have never ceased their endeavors to abandon their official positions and turn the islands over to the United States. At the time of the mass meeting it is not claimed by anybody that notices were sent out throughout the islands, or that the native Hawaiians of Honolulu were notified. It is not claimed by anyone that during the five years since the overthrow of the Hawaiian monarchy there has been anything like a general election where all the people were entitled to vote for the purpose of obtaining consent to a change in their form of government.

If the great mass of Hawaiians are anxious to become American citizens, as has been claimed, why have they not been allowed to so express themselves? If the provisional government was chosen by the people or assented to, except under the force of the United States, and if the people are capable of maintaining a republican government, why are all these officeholders so anxious to retire to private life? If it is believed by the friends of annexation that the assent of the people of Hawaii can be obtained, why is the expression of that consent not provided for in this resolution? The Committee on Foreign Relations bases the constitutionality of this method of procedure upon the precedent established by the annexation of Texas by resolution. If this is the precedent, why is not the precedent followed?

In the case of Texas the people of the Republic of Texas voted for annexation, and the legislature or congress of Texas, elected by the people, without any qualification of suffrage, voted to ratify it before she became a part of the United States. Under the suffrage laws of Hawaii the voters represent but a very small proportion of the population, and yet they have never been asked, or even allowed, to express their wishes in this matter. If the people of Hawaii desire annexation to the United States, no possible harm could arise from their being allowed to say so. If they do not desire annexation to the United States, the passage of this resolution would tear from under this Government its very corner stone, because the Government would not rest upon the consent of the governed. If the people of Hawaii do not desire annexation, then immediately upon the withdrawal of war ships and military there would be a revolution.

The people of that country are not at all averse to revolutions. There have been about as many insurrections of Hawaiians as there have been of American Indians. In the history of the United States it has not been found possible to maintain all of the State governments without trouble. We have had two rebellions in the history of this country, one of Rhode Island and the other of the Southern States. If we can not hold the New England States intact, or the Southern States intact, through the period of a century without differences that have to be settled by the military, how are we going to hold a people of known revolutionary tendencies in the far distant South Sea islands? There have, unfortunately, been sectional questions arising constantly during our entire history by reason of the divergency of interests in different parts of the country.

During the last campaign, I am sorry to say, the West and the East were almost solidly arrayed against each other, and the differences between them have not yet been adjusted. The North has been divided against the South and the East has been divided against the West. Greater commercial and political difficulties would naturally arise as between the people of the continent and those of the islands. There is one strong argument in favor of annexation of which I will give its friends the benefit, as illustrating this point. Hawaii is a free-silver country, while the other two islands that are talked of, Puerto Rico and the Philippines, are bimetallic countries and very favorable to the use of silver. Two of our Territories, settled by true native Americans, who have shown their loyalty to the flag by being among the first to offer their services to the United States Government in the present war, have tried in vain for several years to be admitted as States.

The representatives in Congress from the East have prevented their admission, it is alleged, because they were in favor of the coinage of silver. The very men who thus refused Americans the full benefits of their Government now advocate the annexation of another silver country separated from the continent by over 2,000 miles. This difference in opinion as to monetary policy would not create riots in the Territories of the United States, but it might and probably would do so in a distant dependency. Hence, rather than see the Congress of the United States bring upon this country such trouble, I would forego the happiness of having the territory in favor of free silver so increased.

In the case of a revolution in Venezuela, Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, wrote to our minister there November 19, 1862:

A revolutionary government is not to be recognized until it is established by the great body of the population of the state it claims to govern.

Mr. Frelinghuysen, Secretary of State, wrote to our minister, Mr. Logan, March 17, 1884, concerning the new government established in Chile:

The Department of State will not recognize a revolutionary government, claiming to represent the people in a South American state, until it is established by a free expression of the will of that people.

In the case of Hawaii the Government established at a mass meeting, held by 100 men, of which the other 90,000 inhabitants knew nothing, was recognized half an hour afterwards. There was not then, and has not been since, even an attempt to secure a free expression of the will of the people.

It will be remembered that Yucatan, Venezuela, Hawaii, Haiti, Liberia, Samana, St. Thomas, and San Domingo have all been offered as free gifts to the United States and all refused. Haiti, which is perhaps one of the most valuable of the West Indies, and certainly of much more importance from a strategic point of view, asked to be annexed to the United States as late as 1893, and the answer to our minister there was as follows:

The policy of this Government, as declared on many occasions in the past, has tended toward avoidance of possessions disconnected from the main continent. Had the tendency of the United States been to extend territorial dominion beyond intervening seas, opportunities have not been wanting to effect such a purpose, whether on the coast of Africa, in the West Indies, or in the South Pacific. A conviction that a fixed policy, dating back to the origin of our constitutional Government, was considered to make it inexpedient to attempt a territorial aggrandizement which would require maintenance by a naval force in excess of any yet provided for our national uses has led this Government to decline territorial acquisitions. Even as simple coaling stations such territorial acquisitions would involve responsibility beyond their utility.

Mr. Bayard, Secretary of State, wrote to Mr. Pendleton, September 7, 1895:

The policy of the United States, declared and pursued for more than a century, discountenances, and in practice forbids, distant colonial acquisition. Our action in the past touching the acquisition of territory by purchase and cession, and our recorded disinclination to avail ourselves of voluntary proffers made by other powers to place territories under the sovereignty or protection of the United States, are matters of historical prominence.

President Cleveland, in his first annual message, said:

Maintaining as I do the tenets of a line of precedents from Washington's day which proscribe entangling alliances with foreign states, I do not favor a policy of acquisition of new and distant territory or the incorporation of remote interests with our own.

The Committee on Foreign Relations has placed this resolution expressly upon the ground that the case of Texas furnishes a precedent. Mr. Calhoun thus very briefly sets forth the history of the early stages of the Texas question:

No measure of policy has been more steadily or longer pursued, and that by both of the great bodies into which the Union is divided, than the annexation of Texas.

Many believed that Texas was embraced in the cession of Louisiana and was improperly, if not unconstitutionally, surrendered by the treaty of Florida in 1819. Under that impression and the general conviction of its importance to the safety and welfare of the Union, its annexation has been an object of constant pursuit ever since.

It was twice attempted to acquire it during the Administration of Mr. Adams, once in 1823, shortly after he came into power, and again in 1827. It was thrice attempted under the Administration of his successor, General Jackson; first in 1829, immediately after he came into power, again in 1835, and finally in 1835, just before Texas declared her independence. Texas herself made a proposition for annexation in 1837, at the commencement of Mr. Van Buren's Administration, which he declined. At the time of the annexation of Texas in 1845 President Polk said in his first annual message:

Texas had declared her independence, and maintained it by her arms for more than nine years. She has had an organized government in successful operation during that period. Treaties of commerce and navigation have been concluded with her by different nations, and it had become manifest to the whole world that any further attempt on the part of Mexico to conquer her or overthrow her government would be in vain.

For just twenty years Texas knocked at the doors of the United States. She was admitted by resolution, it is true, but her people voted upon the question and nearly her entire population had been American citizens, and it was a disputed proposition as to whether or not she did not belong to the United States. When Santo Domingo was offered to this country we would not even consider the question until after a vote of the people was taken, and although 15,000 votes out of a total of less than 16,000 votes were cast in favor of annexation, we refused to receive her.

The provisional government of Hawaii was not formed until the minister of the United States agreed to recognize and protect it, and could not have been maintained at any time since had it not been understood that it was under the protection of the United States. We made our own people in Texas wait nine years and maintain their own government, and we made them vote on the question; and yet it is maintained that a government recognized within half an hour after it sprang into existence and where no vote has been recorded is a parallel to the annexation of Texas.

I maintain, Mr. President, that, even if Hawaii was of an immense value to the United States, to annex it under these circumstances would be to destroy the very foundation of our Government and lose the immense influence for good that we have wielded throughout the civilized world by our fundamental principle of government, that the right to govern rests upon the consent of the governed.

Mr. President, there is another point in which this resolution is exceedingly defective. What kind of government is it proposed to establish in the island of Hawaii after annexation? That those people are incapable of self-government can scarcely be denied. Under their present constitution the elective franchise is so limited that the Republic is practically an aristocracy. Could it be so limited under the Federal Constitution? If it was not so limited, would not the ignorant and the lawless entirely subvert all good government?

Section 4 of Article IV of the United States Constitution provides:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the legislature, or of the executive when the legislature can not be convened, against domestic violence.

Section 2, Article IV, provides:

That citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

The fifteenth amendment provides:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Without going into any extended constitutional argument, it will not be denied, I think, that the Constitution absolutely prohibits any distinction being made between the States, and requires that the elective franchise shall be granted without discrimination. I do not deny that there may be constitutional limitations placed upon the right to exercise suffrage, but I most positively affirm that any law which would give the foreign element a control they have now over the native vote in Hawaii would be absolutely unconstitutional and void. In the famous Dred Scott case Judge Taney, of the United States Supreme Court, said:

This brings us to examine by what provision of the Constitution the present Federal Government, under its delegated and restricted powers, is authorized to acquire territory outside of the original limits of the United States, and what powers it may exercise therein over the person or property of a citizen of the United States while it remains a Territory and until it shall be admitted as one of the States of the Union.

There is certainly no power given by the Constitution to the Federal Government to establish or maintain colonies bordering on the United States, or at a distance, to be ruled and governed at its own pleasure, nor to enlarge its territorial limits in any way except by the admission of new States.

As there is no express regulation in the Constitution defining the power which the General Government may exercise over the person or property of a citizen in a territory acquired, the court must necessarily look to the provisions and principles of the Constitution and its distribution of powers for the rules and principles by which its decision must be governed.

Taking this rule to guide us, it may be safely assumed that citizens of the United States who immigrate to a territory belonging to the people of the United States can not be ruled as mere colonists, dependent upon the will of the General Government and to be governed by any laws it may think proper to impose.

The territory being a part of the United States, the government and the citizens both enter it under the authority of the Constitution with their respective rights defined and marked out. And the Federal Government can exercise no power over his personal property beyond what that instrument confers, nor lawfully deny any right which it has reserved.

The power to expand the territory of the United States, by the admission of new States, is plainly given. It is acquired to become a State, and not to be held as a colony, and governed by Congress with absolute authority.

This decision of the United States Supreme Court has never been overruled, and from the plain provisions of the United States Constitution, taken in connection with the construction of it as set forth, it can not be disputed that the only purpose for which the United States can acquire territory, no matter in what part of the world it may be situated, is to create States. These States, when created, must have exactly the same rights and privileges accorded to the States of New York, or New Hampshire, or Massachusetts. During the formative period, while a Territorial form of government can be maintained, the territory of Hawaii must be governed precisely as are the Territories of Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma.

Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States does not provide for any colonies; our form of government is such that even though there was no constitutional inhibition, colonies could not be successfully maintained. We tried a military form of government once; I do not think that any Senator is proud of the record we made in maintaining these governments in the Southern States immediately after the war. It was the best we could do, no doubt, and the exigencies of the occasion seemed to demand it; but we would not willingly consent to establish what is familiarly known as "carpetbag" government in the Hawaiian Islands, or any other place.

This Government is a Republic; it is a government of the people; it is a government by the people and for the people. Its very corner stone is the people, and it is a notorious fact that out of the 90,000 inhabitants of the Hawaiian Islands there is not to exceed 5 per cent of them capable of taking any part in government. A government of that kind of people and by that kind of people would be irrepressible conflict, while a government for that kind of people would of necessity have to be a very strong one. Their history from the days when they ate our missionaries down to the present time fully corroborates this position. They have been reduced in numbers by disease and war, principally war, from 200,000 inhabitants to about 80,000.

A great deal of learning has been displayed in setting forth the strategic importance of these islands to the United States. This strategic importance was recognized, even at the time when we refused to annex Hawaii, and, on account of it, we secured Pearl Harbor. This harbor is the only point of strategic importance now. We own it, and no nation that I know of is trying to take it away from us. If we should annex Hawaii, it would be just as easy to capture our harbor as it is now. The ownership of the islands would not add to the security of our possession of Pearl Harbor. We need a coaling station in the Pacific Ocean, and we need a coaling station in the Atlantic Ocean. When our merchant marine was our greatest national pride, and 75 per cent of our foreign trade was carried in American ships, we did not have a harbor in either ocean or a coaling station off from our own coast. Now that only about 10 per cent of our foreign trade is carried in American ships, it is more to the interests of the nations that carry our goods than it is ours to supply coal. But leaving aside any consideration of this kind, it is yet possible to exaggerate the importance of Hawaii as a naval station.

It is true that Honolulu is a good halfway between the United States and Japan. It is argued from this fact that our Pacific coast is in danger unless we own this halfway point, because foreign nations could coal their vessels there and attack our Pacific coast. If we left the harbor without a navy to guard it, there would be nothing to prevent these same foreign vessels from going to this same harbor, getting the coal, and making the attack on our coast. Unless we had it constantly guarded with a navy the only difference would be that if they owned the Hawaiian Islands they would use their own coal, and if we owned them they would use ours.

The prophecies of possible troubles in the future are that the European powers interested in the Eastern question and the dividing up of the Celestial Empire will in some way or other become involved with the United States and annihilate our two thousand and odd miles of Pacific coast. In order to prevent this we obtain possession of the Hawaiian Islands. In just what manner the officials of Hawaii are to learn that a hostile fleet is approaching in time to notify us to fortify our coast has not been explained. It took us four weeks to get troops started for Manila to protect our fleet over there. If hostile nations had started war ships toward the Pacific coast, they could have bombarded every city on it in that time.

Another thing that seems to have been lost sight of is that if the European nations ever did have any designs against the coast of the United States, they would not have their fleets to entirely circumnavigate the globe, as would be necessary to attack the Pacific coast, but would send them on a short and easy trip across the Atlantic to bombard our large cities, instead of wasting their time, their fuel, and their ammunition on the small and widely separated towns along the Pacific. A fleet coming from the Orient to attack the Pacific coast, when it got to Honolulu, would be about as far from any United States coast as it would be in any Spanish, French, or English port. All of the maritime nations of Europe are about as close to the United States as Honolulu is.

If we need to annex Hawaii to protect our Pacific coast, it is absolutely necessary that we annex the British Islands and the Continent of Europe in order to protect our Atlantic coast. If Hawaii is a strategic necessity, so is Gibraltar. With a foreign nation in possession of Hawaii, we are in no more danger than with a foreign nation in possession of Madagascar. At the present time it would be of more strategic importance for us to own British Columbia, because there are immense coal deposits there and we could coal our ships. If we owned the entire coast line of British Columbia and Alaska, Siberia would become of strategic importance, and with Siberia in our possession, Russia, to the south of it, would be a military necessity, and with the ownership of Russia, China would be absolutely essential. An argument for the annexation of any country on the face of the earth can be based upon strategic importance in case of future wars.

It has been demonstrated in the Senate that our Aleutian Islands are 500 miles nearer Japan than Hawaii. It has also been demonstrated that we have a better harbor there than Pearl Harbor. The answer made to this has been that there are fogs about the Aleutian Islands and that the course of commerce does not go that way. There are fogs about the British Islands, but this fact has not prevented them from being used by ships. There has never been supposed to be any necessity for naval fleets to stay in the ocean paths of commerce. If we owned Hawaii, and a hostile fleet started for an attack on the Pacific coast, and we were only guarding our harbor at Hawaii, that hostile fleet would take the short cut, come by the way of the Aleutian Islands, and bombard our coast cities while our fleet was at Honolulu waiting for the enemy.

It is contended that we need the Hawaiian Islands on account of their commercial importance, and then, in the same breath, in order to show that these islands could be assimilated into the United States, the friends of annexation prove conclusively by their figures that the United States already possesses all of that commerce worth having. They sell practically all of their products to the United States and buy nearly all of their goods from this country. This is not necessarily because they love the Stars and Stripes, but because goods exported from or imported to Europe must be transported clear across the United States and then across the Atlantic Ocean, or carried around Cape Horn. They trade with the United States because they can not advantageously trade anywhere else. We sell them all they consume now and they would not consume any more if they belonged to this country. The only difference would be that now, notwithstanding the reciprocity treaty, we collect a considerable revenue from goods imported from Hawaii, while if the islands belonged to us, we would lose that revenue.

The Constitution requires us to protect Hawaii in case we annex it, and on account of its distance, a portion of our standing Army and a part of our Navy would have to be kept there. This would entail a very large expense, and not only, under our form of Government, could we obtain no revenue from it, but we would lose what revenues we now get.

Mr. President, in order to annex these islands, we will have to reverse the policy of our Government, inaugurated at its foundation and continued uninterruptedly ever since, against the annexation of outlying territories. We will have to set aside all of the established precedents, which require the successful maintenance of a newly organized government before we can recognize it. We will have to disregard the Constitution of the United States. We will have to destroy the fundamental doctrine of our Government, that the right to govern rests upon the consent of the governed. We will have to greatly increase the drain of an already overburdened Treasury. We will have to decrease our revenue to the extent of the duties now received from Hawaii. We will have to reverse our policy of maintaining only a small standing Army, and we will inaugurate a precedent that may lead to most disastrous consequences.

In return for all this all that we will get will be the satisfaction of letting a few of the foreigners in Hawaii become wealthy through sugar refineries. We will acquire an island of lepers, an active volcano, some lava beds, and a few acres of sugar cane. Let us consider well all of the facts concerning this question before we act upon it, and not recklessly become a party to the land-grabbing scheme inaugurated by one of our ex-ministers in conjunction with a few men who are anxious to go into the business of refining sugar.

This reaching out for colonial dependencies may be very alluring to some; it has a pleasant sound and is calculated to stir the blood of an American proud of his country and her greatness; and if the acquisition of these islands was, in my judgment, going to add to the glory and greatness of my country, I would without hesitation give my support to the project. But instead of that I see in such action an element of weakness instead of strength, a chance of probable embarrassment instead of glory, and a menace to our popular government, instead of adding to our already well-earned greatness and standing among the nations of the earth.

I have heard a great deal said here about our former acquisition and expansion, and when the opponents of this annexation have declared against it on the ground of its being a new departure and a reversal of our policy they have been met by the assertion that it is not a departure from former policies, and the acquisitions of the Louisiana purchase and Texas are referred to as examples of what has been done on these lines in the past history of the country. Now, sir, to my mind the incident of the Louisiana purchase and the acquisition of Texas are not analogous and have nothing in common with the policy sought to be pursued in this case of the Hawaiian Islands. It is true there were opponents to the proposed action at that time, and they made use of some very strong arguments on their side of the controversy, but it is no argument now to assert that because subsequent events proved them in the wrong then that we who oppose this project now must of necessity and in the nature of things be wrong.

In the former case the territory in question was contiguous and part of the same country we already possessed. The absorption was natural, and manifestly the logical sequence of events and the destiny of the country directed it. Now we are reaching out into the ocean over 2,000 miles to own something the best of which we already have by common consent. In other words, the use, exclusive and special, of all that there is worth anything to us as a nation is now guaranteed to us in this property. We have had and maintained exclusive control of the only harbor, admitted on all sides to be so, for many years, and no one to dispute our rights; and yet notwithstanding we enjoy this benefit and use of this property without rent, except tacitly to see that the owner is kept in possession, we are seized with a most unaccountable craze to own the property and pay all the expenses of such ownership, when it is plainly evident we gain no new advantage by such ownership over what we now possess in having the use thereof rent free.

Such a proposition in the case of an individual would not be regarded as a good sound business transaction. England and France long ago entered into a treaty to maintain the autonomy of these islands. We assented to that arrangement, although not actually a party to the compact. Our control, practical control, of these islands has always been acknowledged by these two nations whenever the occasion gave rise to the question, and yet we are now told, as a reason for hasty action, that after all these years some nation or nations are anxious for their acquisition, and that if we do not take them at once, some other nation will snap them up and we will lose them forever. How is any nation going to take possession of these islands with England, France, and the United States pledged on their honor as nations to maintain them independent? I know it has been asserted that the present Government of Hawaii will offer itself to some one else if we refuse the overtures made to us for annexation.

Mr. President, I do not believe that assertion. The present Government is composed entirely, as I am informed, of Americans. I recall now the high praise bestowed upon the gentlemen composing the Government in that far-away country on a former memorable occasion in this body. I recall that the President of that Government was here not long ago, when we were discussing a treaty of annexation in which he was more or less interested. He was the guest of honor during his stay here, and many delightful things were said and written about him. And after hearing and reading what was said and written, no one can make me believe that he would sell out to any nation except his own.

I have heard something said about this being a Democratic policy, because forty years ago or more a very eminent and distinguished statesman, who was a Democrat, desired to acquire these islands for this country. Mr. President, I am not aware that this is, so far, a party question; I have not heard that any party has declared itself, as a party, for or against the policy. I am not opposing it because I am a Democrat or because some Republicans are in favor of it; I am not opposing it because it is said the present Administration is very anxious for the consummation of such a decidedly new thing during its incumbency. My opposition is controlled by higher, broader, and better reasons than those. I am looking at what appears to me to be for the best interests of this whole country—for the welfare, well-being, progress, and prosperity of all the people of this land and what most concerns them—and I do not believe leprosy will lead them upward or tend to make them happier or more prosperous. And yet it would seem that because forty or more years ago a distinguished Democrat sought to inaugurate the policy of annexing these islands that members of the party ought to be in line with that policy to-day.

Why, sir, the party called Democratic was in power for a long time in the former history of this country, and some of the brightest pages of our history were written during that time; but in all that time and in all the time in which we are told this project, policy, scheme, or whatever called, was agitated and made the subject of state papers of more or less weight—in all that time, down to the present hour, the policy has not been adopted or the project carried out, with respect to these islands, by any party in control of the Government. And so I say it is not a party question at this time, although it is possible some might oppose it from a party standpoint, just as some might favor it because the Administration wants it, and it is a good thing to stand by the Administration; but I am not actuated by any such motives, and I do not know of anyone who is on either side of the controversy.

I heard with some surprise and considerable pain the remarks of the honorable and distinguished Senator from Alabama yesterday in which he characterized certain proceedings in this body as obstructing the President and embarrassing his conduct of the present war with Spain. Certain of his colleagues in this Chamber came in for the frown of his displeasure and censure of his reproach. Now, Mr. President, all this is to me unaccountable. With the beautifully expressed sentiments of Americanism and patriotism I am in hearty accord. I join with him in his glowing tribute to our soldiers and sailors, expressed in language that only the Senator can use and is master of. I was also interested and entertained a few days ago by the eloquent and patriotic address of the Senator from Colorado, who always instructs as well as interests me. He gave expression to a beautiful sentiment about hoisting the American flag, never to be hauled down without a reckoning with the American people. Now, all this patriotism and glorious American spirit is fine; the expression of it is delightful to hear, just as the flowers that bloom in the spring are beautiful to the view; but, Mr. President, I respectfully suggest that both alike have nothing to do with the case.

The annexation of the Hawaiian Islands has nothing in the world to do with our present war. It is said that in time of war the laws are silent, and I think I have noticed here of late a growing opinion that in this time of war certain of us should be mute. There is, if I mistake not, developing here a disposition to regard certain Senators as unpatriotic, quite near to being traitors to their country, who pretend to question any policy, project, or scheme that other Senators may have very much at heart, and which they have stamped with their label of a war necessity.

There never was a war that did not leave a train of ills most deplorable; most of us can remember many of the evil effects of our civil war along with the good accomplished, and if some rights of the people are not lost sight of in the outcome of our present struggle, happy indeed will be the result.

We have read a good deal in some of the newspapers of the country about the anxiety, the great desire on the part of the people to bring about this project of annexation. I remember when at college we had on one occasion for debate in our debating society the question, Whether the newspaper was the exponent of public opinion or the molder thereof. I do not believe it was definitely settled at that time, for with me it is still a mooted question. Be the fact as it may, whilst there has been a great outcry on the part of some papers in favor of annexation, and coupled therewith a great deal of abuse of those opposed to the movement, I have here a symposium of the expression of quite a number of papers on the other side, which I will read for the benefit of those who may not have had the good fortune to see them. The first extract I will read is from the American Agriculturist:

The policy of colonial expansion, now so extravagantly urged in interested quarters, may not at present contemplate interference in European politics, but such interference would be less a departure from the new policy than this policy is a departure from the Monroe doctrine. The new idea sounds very grand at first, and in the flush of victory the appeal to extend our domination beyond the seas is so alluring that the consequences of such action are lost sight of.

The policy of colonial empire would at once expose us to embroilment with other nations. It would vastly magnify the power and expense of Army and Navy. It would perpetuate increased taxes. It would inaugurate an era of corruption in our foreign possessions, a debasement of the blood, that could not fail to in time affect the physical and mental stamina of our people at home. It would be un-American, unwise, unconstitutional, and in results unworthy of the effort.

On still higher ground a colonial policy is objectionable. It would degenerate the holiest war ever waged for humanity into a campaign of conquest. This would lower the United States before the world, but its moral effect upon our own people would be still worse.

[Baltimore American.]

England wants an alliance, of course. It would be strange if she did not. She wants an alliance because the continental powers are opposed to her, not because they are opposed to the United States. There are many people in this country who sympathize with England, and some others who do not. This is not an English, but an American country. The people are made up from every country under heaven. There are some millions of Germans, more millions of Irishmen, and a heavy sprinkling of Russians and other European nations. They are good citizens, many of them among the best we have. Would it not be the height of folly for the Government, with these facts staring it in the face, to attempt to negotiate an alliance with Great Britain which engaged the United States to help carry out English projects in China in opposition to the continental powers? If this country wants anything in China, the Empire is still open; and Americans can do quite as well, we imagine, as England has recently done in the East.

[Baltimore News.]

If we are to assume "imperial" responsibilities, let us endeavor first to look them in the face and find out what they are. Let us go in with our eyes open. Let us consider whether or not their assumption means a large standing army and a great navy and permanently heavy Federal taxation. Let us not ignore but calmly weigh the question whether the new policy would or would not bring us into the circle of European jealousies and antagonisms. Let us not leave entirely to the future, but endeavor to anticipate in the present, not indeed the details but the broad outlines of the problems of government which the acquisition of distant dependencies, peopled by mixed races in various stages of civilization, will assuredly present. The coming debate in the Senate furnishes a most admirable opportunity for the education of public opinion, and even for the education of Senatorial opinion, on these great and pressing subjects. It furnishes an opportunity for the Senate to revive the high traditions of its past in doing the country this great service. Let us hope that there are a few members of it who are able and willing to rise to so great an occasion.

[Baltimore News.]

It is the special function of the Senate to interpose its deliberation and its dignity between the sudden or ill-considered inception of a movement and its consummation. That body has been charged—and, we have repeatedly held, justly charged—with abuse of the character and privileges which it has established in cases in which there was no proper occasion for their exercise. The case of Hawaii is one in which the Senate as a whole and each individual member of it may feel that insistence upon its ancient traditions will be amply justified by the occasion. If there is anything which calls for the calm and deliberate weighing of all consequences, for resistance to swift impulse, for ignoring of the demands of factitious urgency and haste, it is the taking of a step which is likely to involve the whole future policy, internal and external, of the nation. Let the Senate take its time on the Hawaiian question, and let it not be decided until every objector has had every opportunity for honest, serious, and deliberate resistance.

[Baltimore Sun.]

Of course if the United States intends to start upon a policy of colonial expansion and to hold the Philippines, the annexation of Hawaii may in time become necessary to the plan of imperialism which is now so popular in certain quarters. But Congress should not annex Hawaii as a war measure, not even if the President sends a message urging annexation as a military necessity. The new policy of imperialism ought not to be entered upon after a day's debate, but should be given a most thorough investigation after the war ends and when the subject can be considered dispassionately and with some measure of statesmanship. Annexation and imperialism with a hurrah will be a national calamity.

[Boston Herald.]

If we are not to take the Philippine Islands, we do not want Hawaii. But this problem of whether we should stretch out into the Eastern Hemisphere is not one which should be settled offhand. It needs to be deliberately settled, after full reflection, by the American people. Speaker REED is greatly to be commended for the course that he has thus far taken, and we sincerely hope that he will persist in his antagonism to a scheme which has been conceived in fraud, and, if successful, would have its birth in iniquity.

[Boston Herald.]

The meeting yesterday at Faneuil Hall in protest against the policy of imperialism is action which may well be taken for the purpose of crystallizing public opinion. No such wide departure from our traditional system should be made unless it has been carefully discussed and both its merits and demerits made plainly apparent. We imagine, however, that long before definite action can be taken—for the United States can not safely make known its intentions in regard to the Philippine Islands until the war is at an end—circumstances will present themselves which will materially qualify existing public opinion. When, as will probably be the case, it is found that of the troops sent to assist Admiral Dewey more than half will have perished from tropical diseases during the present season, the advantages of American ownership of these islands and of American occupancy of them are questions which will present themselves in quite a different light from that in which they are now popularly viewed.

[Boston Herald.]

All that Hawaii can possibly do for us is to furnish us a basis of supplies, and this she has already done by furnishing us with the best harbor and landing place that she possesses. So far as a coaling station or basis of supply is concerned, we cannot get from Hawaii by annexation anything more or better than that which we have, and yet, by a sophistry of reasoning, it is held that unless we annex Hawaii we shall be deprived of advantages which to the fullest extent we now possess. Following out this line of argument, if we establish a coaling station at the Philippine Islands such a proceeding would be merely the prelude toward an alleged necessity of taking control of that entire group of islands; or if, later on, we should secure, as we might, a coaling station on the coast of Africa, the possession would be merely the entering wedge to an extension of our influence well into the center of that continent.

There is in the case of Hawaii no military necessity that can not be met by conditions as they now exist; and hence the true reason for annexation has to be found in entirely different grounds. It is as clear as daylight that if the sugar interest did not exist there, and those who control it did not contribute large sums of money to influence public opinion in this country through the newspapers and Congressional action at Washington, there would be no more present call for the annexation of Hawaii than for the annexation of Iceland or the Azores.

[Boston Transcript.]

There is less basis than for a long time past for working on popular fear that Hawaii will be grabbed by some other power if we do not first do the grab act ourselves. Great Britain is certainly not going to put herself in that position and neither is Japan. Our relations with those countries were never before so friendly, and with the entente cordiale thus established we need not fear a demonstration by other powers in that quarter. In fact, not for a long time has the Hawaiian situation been so comfortable and it is a waste of sophistry to contend that just now is the hour of peril for our naval prestige. This working up of excitement is simply a part of the so-called imperial scheme which already regards Hawaii, not as our extreme possible outpost, but only as a "halfway station" in our progress to the ends of the earth.

[Buffalo Courier.]

President McKinley, who at the beginning of his Administration was so lukewarm toward annexation that his inaugural address contained a declaration against colonial aggrandizement, has in the brief period of fifteen months become an enthusiastic convert not only to this scheme but apparently to the whole policy of colonial expansion so loudly approved by the jingo element. It is evident that the President is using all the legitimate influence of his Administration to induce the Senate to pass the Hawaiian resolution, it having been long ago demonstrated that the more orderly method of annexation by treaty could not command the necessary two-thirds vote.

[Buffalo Express.]

Under annexation this Anglo-Saxon rule could not be maintained against a hostile native opposition, except by doing violence to the principles of the United States Constitution and of the Declaration of Independence after the manner now too much practiced in the negro section of the South.

The simple truth is that our Constitution is not suited to the governing of such a population as inhabits Hawaii. Shall we abandon the annexation project or the principles of our Constitution?

[Cedar Rapids (Iowa) Republican.]

There are many Americans who are not so certain that we want even Hawaii. There are going to be more of them. There is bound to come a reaction on this jingoism and annexationism. We have simply allowed our greed to get the better of our judgment. Wait and see how the matters turn out.

We are aware that it is unpopular at the present time to counsel caution. The popular heart is inflamed on this subject. Our military and naval men, who are for the time being the biggest men in the United States, are all for annexation. That is their business—to conquer and to patrol; but the war will be over some time, and then will come the sober second thought of the nation.

[Chicago Chronicle.]

Some Senators who are inclined to favor annexation are said to be doubtful as to the policy of consummating it so long as we are at war with Spain. The act might be regarded as indicating that we were bent on territorial aggrandizement and that our real purpose in making war on Spain was conquest. Spain's European friends might choose to view it in that light and make it a pretext for reconsidering their determination to maintain an attitude of neutrality.

[Chicago Chronicle.]

If we decide to annex the Philippines we shall ipso facto become a member of the associated banditti who are now parceling out China, growing at one another, and constantly on the alert for treachery. If we seize the Canaries we shall acquire European "interests" and European responsibilities. Our diplomatic representatives will be obliged to have a finger in every pie and a voice in the regulation of every dispute from the tariffs of the Suez Canal to the idiosyncrasies of the unspeakable Turk. We shall cut loose from James Monroe and follow the precepts of Napoleon Bonaparte and Frederick the Great. We shall be in hot water twenty-four hours of the day. Can we afford to do it? Will it be a good thing to turn this country into a second France, ruled to all intents and purposes by a military oligarchy—a country where honest industry is sneeringly termed "bourgeois" and the profession of arms alone is honorable?

[Cleveland Leader.]

All prudent and thoughtful Americans must deprecate the hasty assertions of enthusiasts that the Philippine Islands will be held permanently as a part of the territory of the United States. It is a rash and entirely needless attempt to prejudice a very weighty question, the ultimate decision of which is uncertain.

To assume that once the power of Spain shall be thoroughly demolished in the Philippines and the large native population brought under the control of the United States the whole matter of the future of the islands will be settled, is to talk arrant nonsense.

Annexation will not be so easy. Already many of the most important organs of public opinion in the country have declared against any such extension of the duties and cares of this Republic. Eminent public men have announced their strenuous opposition to the permanent occupation of any detached territory inhabited by a large alien population incapable, for generations, of being brought up to the full exercise of the powers of American citizenship. The nearer the final decision comes the more emphatic the resistance of conservative men is likely to be.

[Dubuque (Iowa) Herald.]

It does appear that our Government would in this way have enough to deal with without rushing into voluntary annexation of Hawaii. It is purely a movement of the jingoes, and if they have captured McKinley to push their purposes they have been lucky. All the talk about annexation, as a war measure, of Hawaii as a naval and coaling station and as a present help is all pretense. No man can show where the possession of Hawaii would be of any possible benefit in the present war. The Spaniards do not want it. Instead of helping us it takes one of our best battleships to watch its interests, that should be fighting with Sampson or Dewey. It is now a coaling station, and has been for years. The Charleston, on its way to Manila, has stopped there for a supply. The islands could do no more for us than they are now doing. Whether we annex Hawaii or not, it is pretty certain that Dole has annexed McKinley.

[Indianapolis News.]

We do not see that the possession of the Philippines makes the annexation of Hawaii necessary. We already have a coaling station in Hawaii, and we can get any concessions we want in the way of territory from the present Hawaiian Government. We can lease whatever land we may need, as the powers of Europe are leasing land in the far East, which we can use for our own purposes without assuming the least responsibility for the government of the islands. Yet it must be conceded that Dewey's victory has weakened the strength of the opposition to the annexation policy. We hope that some arrangement can be made which will give us what we really need, but which will save us from annexation, but we confess that there is now little ground for expectation that this hope can be realized.

[New York Daily News.]

A large number of the American people are opposed to the acquisition of colonial dependencies, such as Hawaii, the Philippines, and Puerto Rico would undoubtedly be, because they believe that our national energies and resources can be best employed in developing our present extensive territory and perfecting our existing democratic institutions.

This section of the public holds fast to the doctrine taught by the fathers of the Republic that the North American continent is quite large enough to give ample employment to all the talent the nation can produce, and they do not want to see any of it wasted in a chase for colonial empire, such as England, France, and Germany are engaged in. They fear the neglect of domestic questions that lie at the root of the welfare of the masses and the evolution of a class of military rulers through the necessity for the maintenance of numerous legions to maintain authority among the alien island races.

[New York Times.]

Against the annexation of Hawaii as a war measure, suggested and justified by the exigencies of war, very little would or could be said. For the national defense or the speedier defeat of the enemy we could afford to override tradition and take up problems to be solved in the future.

But the annexation of these islands is not a war necessity; that is an impudent pretense. The suggestion is not an outcome of the war. It originated long ago with a set of plotters and schemers. A vulgar money job lies at the bottom of the transaction. That makes the effort to sneak the thing through as a measure of patriotism peculiarly nauseating. It is the motive of the original annexationists even more than the annexation itself that offends and disgusts.

[New York Times.]

The House has now been talking for three whole days about this wretched business, and from the elaborate and rather too ingenious speech of Mr. HITT to the harangue from the Nevada Representative, not the suggestion of a new reason for annexation has been made. Nor has there been any refutation of the charge that the business from beginning to end is a job. The pretense of war necessity and of the danger of not getting the facilities we require in the islands is a mock action device. It is the practice on a large scale in national legislation of methods which when indulged in in business are by the statutes of most States made a State prison offense.

[New York World.]

Our Republic sprang from the people's abhorrence of despotism. It is a government of laws, not of men—and especially not of "a man on horseback." Can we inject into our system of self-government and equal rights the old despotic and military idea without doing violence to our principles? Can we accustom our people to such a rule over a part of our possessions containing 7,000,000 human beings without danger to ourselves? Have not the invasions of plutocracy, the growing power of monopoly, and the development of the boss system into a rule that in effect vitiates in many instances the very essence of democracy given us problems enough at home that we need to seek them on the other side of the globe?

There are many other phases of this "pipe dream" of colonial empire which will, we believe, cause the American people to hold true to their rational and traditional policy, but the danger to this country involved in these wild schemes should prove a sufficient deterrent to their adoption.

[Omaha Bee.]

We can not bring ourselves to think that President McKinley, who has thus far shown a wise sagacity and statesmanship, commanding almost universal commendation, is ready to yield to a clamor for which there is no valid reason or justification and lend his great influence to a proposal to drift the nation out of a path in which for more than a hundred years it has enjoyed security and realized a growth of power and a degree of prosperity without parallel in the history of nations.

[Philadelphia Ledger.]

It is believed by the majority of Americans that the annexation of the Hawaiian oligarchy, masquerading as a republic resting on the "consent of the governed," by treaty, or by resolution of Congress, would not only be a plain departure from our long-proclaimed "Monroe doctrine," but would impose American institutions and American law upon a community the majority of whose inhabitants have expressed no desire for the change. It is the basic American doctrine that governments shall derive their powers from the consent of the governed. So long as consent to the annexation scheme is withheld by a majority of the Hawaiian people our title to the islands will be assailable in the high court of morals though all Federal constitutional forms be observed in appropriating the country. To fling aside constitutional methods in annexing Hawaii, to seize the country as a part of the plan of campaign against Spain, as an act of war, would place us in a still more regrettable relation to the islands. The President has extensive powers as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy in war times, but the reported desire to "seize" Hawaii savors too much of usurpation of power and of the misuse of Executive functions.

[Philadelphia Ledger.]

The real question is, whether we are to continue a law-abiding and law-obeying people, patient of the restraints put upon us by those who framed our plan of government, or are to brush aside the restrictions and limitations of the Constitution and of the law whenever they interfere with the whim of the hour. It can not be possible that President McKinley proposes to carry out the design imputed to him, for, sworn to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, he will not be guilty of so plain and flagrant a violation of the supreme law. He must have been grievously misrepresented.

[Philadelphia Record.]

Hawaii will make its entry into the Union as the result of a Cæsarean operation—by an avoidance of natural, popular, and constitutional methods. The treaty of annexation was never approved by the Hawaiian people; it could never have been ratified by the American Senate. The right of the Hawaiians to decide their own destiny and the right of the people of the United States to the safeguard of their own Constitution have both been disregarded.

[Pittsburg Dispatch.]

It is little wonder the debate of this question is attracting nearly as much attention as the news from the squadrons off Cuba. It is more important to the American people than any battle that has been fought in the war, for, if carried through, it will be an actual renunciation of the principles upon which the war was begun and the beginning of a national policy foreign to our history, our institutions, and the popular instinct. It will mark the beginning of the end of popular government—of "government of the people, by the people, and for the people," which Lincoln declared should "not perish from the earth."

[Pittsburg Dispatch.]

The loyal citizens who have responded to their country's call were moved by the desire to free Cuba and avenge the crew of the Maine. They never intended to give their services to the cause of colonizing the Pacific Ocean. The loyal people who remain at home are prepared to cheerfully take up the burden of taxation to support the conflict for the removal of Spanish cruelty, treachery, and barbarity from the Western Hemisphere, but none of them desires to make sacrifices for the purpose of embarking the country upon a strange and mischievous policy of land grabbing.

[Pittsburg Post.]

Annexation would make the lobbying unnecessary, as the Hawaiian sugar would then come in free for all time. It is the product of virtual slave labor, to be sure, and would remain so under annexation, coming in competition with the sugar raised by free labor in the United States.

But this is a trifling objection compared with the potent one. It will be the commencement of a colonial system that may entail unnumbered evils on our country. If Hawaii, why not the Philippines, the Ladrone Islands, Cuba, and Puerto Rico? It marks a well-defined departure on a new and perilous chapter of American policy. President McKinley will be directly responsible. He has carried it through a reluctant Congress and against the best judgment of a vast majority of the intelligent people of the United States.

[Richmond Dispatch.]

Aside from the miserable jobbery that has been and is still in the Hawaiian annexation scheme, Mr. FAULKNER has given the strongest of reasons why the Democrats should fight annexation to the bitter end. It is the first step that counts and costs. The expansionists know full well that the annexation of Hawaii, no matter under what subterfuge, would prove a most potent agency in stimulating the movement for the permanent retention of the Philippines and the annexation of Cuba. They know full well that it could be made a potent influence in preparing the public mind for a departure from our time-honored policy.

We do not undertake to say that the time will not come when it will be necessary to annex Hawaii. Nor do we undertake to say what should be our future relations to the Philippines. But we do maintain that in dealing with these matters wisdom and patriotism and due regard for the integrity of our institutions and our pledges, past and present, to the world demand that we make haste slowly.

[Richmond Times.]

From the beginning of agitation toward that end the Times has steadily opposed the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands. To annex them is to depart entirely from that theory of government under which we have lived for more than a hundred years and prospered as no people prospered before. The Times frankly admits its fear of what will happen if we abandon our old-time notion that the United States are big enough for us and enter upon a career of world aggrandizement.

[St. Louis Post.]

President McKinley thinks the Hawaiian Islands are necessary to the United States.

They are no doubt essential to the success of some jobs and schemes which have been maturing for several years past, but it is not so clear that the national good will be in any degree promoted by the possession of distant islands which will require a large navy for their defense.

If, as a consequence of the Spanish war, we are drawn into the current of "world politics," we may need a big navy, and in that event the Hawaiian Islands will be convenient as a station and base. But we should not put the cart before the horse.

[St. Louis Republic.]

While the Monroe doctrine is an unwritten law, it is nevertheless an important factor in our national life. Next to the Constitution itself, it has done more in shaping international affairs than any other, and has been the guiding star of the Western Hemisphere. From the days of Washington and Jefferson to the present time there has been no apparent desire to step beyond its limitations, except since the battle of Manila, and the people of the United States will think long before they exchange the right to guard the Western Hemisphere for the right of partnership in the colonizing schemes of European monarchies.

[Savannah News.]

The most patriotic and far-seeing of our citizens regarded it as fortunate that we had nothing to do with the question of disrupting the Chinese Empire, which was being considered by Germany, Russia, France, and Great Britain. But what a change has taken place in a few short weeks! Now plenty of reasons are offered why we should become the permanent possessors of the Philippines and should also have a voice in whatever changes the powers of Europe propose to make in the Chinese Empire. Not only that, but it is urged that we should take permanent possession of Puerto Rico and so shape our policy that Cuba would eventually become a part of our territory. In short, the underlying thought is that we should become the possessor of great colonies in widely separate parts of the world, and should cast aside as obsolete the policy inaugurated by the fathers of the Republic, which avoids interfering in questions which compel the powers of Europe to maintain big armies and powerful navies.

[Springfield Republican.]

Richard Olney not long ago uttered a protest in an address at Harvard College against the "international isolation" of the United States. But read his address and you will find no approval, even by implication, of the suggestion that the United States should conquer and permanently occupy the Philippine Islands, inhabited by Malays and Chinese, 6,500 miles away. * * * The President or the political party that smashes the Monroe doctrine will live to rae the day, and will live very little longer. And the smashing of the Monroe doctrine is what the conquest and permanent occupation of the Philippine Islands will mean.

[Springfield Republican.]

The wage-earning classes have a peculiar interest in averting the calamitous policy into which the heedless and adventurous would drag the country. For it is from that class that the armies would be recruited to police the distant colonies and waste themselves away in idleness and dissipation and disease under tropical suns. And as the Federal tax system stands and is likely to stand for years to come, that class would bear the chief burden of expense. The positions of honor and emolument in the Army and the civil government of the colonies would go to the aristocracy of wealth and "pull," as we have seen commissions in the Volunteer Army recently go.

The wage earners accordingly can not make themselves heard too early and insistently in this crisis. Their concern is the more immediate and their interests, as of all the plain people, are the more threatened by this clamor of the influential and powerful to be led away from the problems which press up from the laboring classes for solution.

[Wilmington (Del.) Every Evening.]

If we are to be supreme on one, can we stop without attaining supremacy on all?

And yet, it is sophistry like this that is put forward by the people's representatives as an excuse for a policy which, if carried to its legitimate conclusion, will result in this country taking possession not only of Hawaii, but of the Philippines, Puerto Rico, and Cuba, and possibly the Canary Islands. The cost of this "grand extension of empire" would be incalculable. But who can show any benefit that would accrue to the United States?

It is time for the people to consult together for the purpose of devising some means of bringing these Congressmen who are opening such a Pandora's box of territorial complications to a realization of their unwise, unrepresentative, and unpatriotic course.

Mr. President, I have read the extracts from these papers for the purpose of showing that there is a divided sentiment in this country among the people on this question, if, as I said, newspapers represent popular sentiment.

I hope that those of my colleagues who may have been wearied with what I have attempted to say in opposition to this measure will pardon the length of time I have taken to express my opposition. I am sure that not one of them will conceive for a moment the idea that I have been attempting to delay a vote upon this proposition. I have simply desired, as I said in the beginning, to state some of the reasons which actuate me in my opposition to the pending measure.

Mr. CAFFERY obtained the floor.

RICHMOND P. HOBSON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAY in the chair) laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Congress of the United States:

On the morning of the 3d of June, 1898, Assistant Naval Constructor Richmond P. Hobson, United States Navy, with a volunteer crew of seven men, in charge of the partially dismantled collier Merrimac, entered the fortified harbor of Santiago, Cuba, for the purpose of sinking the collier in the narrowest portion of the channel, and thus interposing a serious obstacle to the egress of the Spanish fleet which had recently entered that harbor. This enterprise, demanding coolness, judgment, and bravery amounting to heroism, was carried into successful execution in the face of a persistent fire from the hostile fleet as well as from the fortifications on shore.

Rear-Admiral Sampson, commander in chief of our naval force in Cuban waters, in an official report dated "Off Santiago de Cuba, June 3, 1898," and addressed to the Secretary of the Navy, referring to Mr. Hobson's gallant exploit, says:

"As stated in a recent telegram, before coming here I decided to make the harbor entrance secure against the possibility of egress of the Spanish ships by obstructing the narrow part of the entrance by sinking a collier at that point. Upon calling upon Mr. Hobson for his professional opinion as to a sure method of sinking the ship, he manifested a most lively interest in the problem. After several days' consideration he presented a solution which he considered would insure the immediate sinking of the ship when she had reached the desired point in the channel. * * * The plan contemplated a crew of only seven men and Mr. Hobson, who begged that it might be intrusted to him.

"As soon as I reached Santiago and had the collier to work upon, the details were commenced and diligently prosecuted, hoping to complete them in one day, as the moon and tide served best the first night after our arrival. Notwithstanding every effort, the hour of 4 o'clock in the morning arrived and the preparations were scarcely completed. After a careful inspection of the final preparations I was forced to relinquish the plan for that morning, as dawn was breaking. Mr. Hobson begged to try it at all hazards.

"This morning proved more propitious, as a prompt start could be made. Nothing could have been more gallantly executed. * * * A careful inspection of the harbor from this ship showed that the Merrimac had been sunk in the channel.

"I can not myself too earnestly express my appreciation of the conduct of Mr. Hobson and his gallant crew. I venture to say that a more brave and daring thing has not been done since Cushing blew up the Albatross."

The members of the crew who were with Mr. Hobson on this memorable occasion have already been rewarded for their services by advancement which, under the provisions of law and regulations, the Secretary of the Navy was authorized to make; and the nomination to the Senate of Naval Cadet Powell, who, in a steam launch, followed the Merrimac on her perilous trip for the purpose of rescuing her force after the sinking of that vessel, to be advanced in rank to the grade of ensign, has been prepared and will be submitted.

Cushing, with whose gallant act in blowing up the ram Albatross during the civil war Admiral Sampson compares Mr. Hobson's sinking of the Merrimac, received the thanks of Congress upon recommendation of the President, by name, and was in consequence, under the provisions of section 1508 of the Revised Statutes, advanced one grade, such advancement embracing fifty-six numbers. The section cited applies, however, to line officers only, and Mr. Hobson, being a member of the staff of the Navy, could not under its provisions be so advanced.

In considering the question of suitably rewarding Assistant Naval Constructor Hobson for his valiant conduct on the occasion referred to, I have deemed it proper to address this message to you with the recommendation that he receive the thanks of Congress, and, further, that he be transferred to the lines of the Navy and promoted to such position therein as the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may determine. Mr. Hobson's transfer from the Construction Corps to the line is fully warranted, he having received the necessary technical training as a graduate of the Naval Academy, where he stood No. 1 in his class; and such action is recommended, partly in deference to what is understood to be his own desire, although, he being now a prisoner in the hands of the enemy, no direct communication on the subject has been received from him, and partly for the reason that the abilities displayed by him at Santiago are of such a character as to indicate especial fitness for the duties of the line.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 27, 1898.

Mr. MORGAN. I request that the message may be printed, and that for the present it may lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the request will be granted. The Chair hears none.

LIEUTENANT NEWCOMB AND CAPTAIN HODGSDON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

On the 11th of May, 1898, there occurred a conflict in the Bay of Cardenas, Cuba, in which the naval torpedo boat Winslow was disabled, her commander wounded, and one of her officers and a part of her crew killed by the enemy's fire.

In the face of a most galling fire from the enemy's guns the revenue cutter Hudson, commanded by First Lieut. Frank H. Newcomb, United States Revenue-Cutter Service, rescued the disabled Winslow, her wounded commander, and remaining crew. The commander of the Hudson kept his vessel in the very hottest fire of the action, although in constant danger of going ashore on account of the shallow water, until he finally got a line made fast to the Winslow and towed that vessel out of range of the enemy's guns, a deed of special gallantry.

I recommend that, in recognition of the signal act of heroism of First Lieut. Frank H. Newcomb, United States Revenue-Cutter Service, above set forth, the thanks of Congress be extended to him and to his officers and men of the Hudson; and that a gold medal of honor be presented to Lieut. Newcomb, a silver medal of honor to each of his officers, and a bronze medal of honor to each member of his crew who served with him at Cardenas.

It will be remembered that Congress by appropriate action recognized the several commanders of ships of war for their services in the battle of Manila May 1, 1898.

The commander of the revenue cutter Hugh McCulloch, present and in active cooperation with the fleet under Commodore Dewey on that occasion (by Executive order under the provisions of section 2737, Revised Statutes), is the only commander of a national ship to whom promotion or advancement was not and could not be given, because he already held the highest rank known to the Revenue-Cutter Service.

I now recommend that, in recognition of the efficient and meritorious services of Capt. Daniel B. Hodgson, United States Revenue-Cutter Service, who commanded the Hugh McCulloch at the battle of Manila (that officer being now in the sixty-third year of his age, and having served continuously on active duty for thirty-seven years), be placed upon the permanent waiting orders or retired list of the Revenue-Cutter Service, on the full duty pay of his grade.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 27, 1898.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 12 and 143 to 167, inclusive, to the bill (H. R. 6897) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 3144) for the relief of Finetta Nalle; and

A bill (S. 4756) for the relief of Michael McNulty.

ANNEXATION OF THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 259) to provide for annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll will be called to ascertain if a quorum is present.

The Secretary called the roll; and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen,	Cullom,	Helfield,	Pettus,
Allison,	Davis,	Jones, Ark.	Platt, Conn.
Bacon,	Deboe,	Jones, Nev.	Platt, N. Y.
Baker,	Elkins,	Kyle,	Pritchard,
Bate,	Fairbanks,	Lodge,	Shoup,
Berry,	Foraker,	McBride,	Stewart,
Burrows,	Frye,	Mallory,	Teller,
Butler,	Gallinger,	Mills,	Turley,
Caffery,	Gear,	Money,	Warren,
Cannon,	Hanna,	Morgan,	Westmore,
Carter,	Hansbrough,	Morrill,	Wilson.
Clark,	Harris,	Nelson,
Clay,	Hawley,	Perkins,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are fifty Senators present. A quorum is present. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, in the midst of war between the United States and the Kingdom of Spain the project of annexing the Hawaiian Islands to and incorporating them within the body politic of the United States is seized on as a war measure. Twice before in the history of our country has the project of the annexation of those islands to the United States been brought to the attention of the country, and twice the project has met with defeat.

Mr. President, this project involves, in my opinion, a new and a dangerous departure from what has heretofore been the settled policy of the United States. The policy now proposed is to incorporate into our Union as bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh transmarine possessions at a long distance from our borders, inhabited by a population heterogeneous, alien, and unassimilable. We are called on now, during a time when the public mind is necessarily occupied with the exciting theme of war, to deliberate upon this measure fraught, in my opinion, with dire consequences to the people of the United States.

Mr. President, the project of annexation is by and through a joint resolution. The project of a treaty between the United States and the Hawaiian Republic, so called, has been discarded, no doubt, on account of a want of the necessary votes in this Chamber to ratify that treaty.

This project takes a most peculiar form, in my opinion. The preamble to the joint resolution sets out that there has been and is a willingness upon the part of the Hawaiian Republic to be annexed to and incorporated into the United States, and we resolve in the joint resolution that that proposition be accepted, and the consequence is drawn or attempted to be drawn that the proposition amounts to an executed contract and the cession is in point of fact made when the resolution is adopted.

Mr. President, this resolution involves the salient points of the treaty which failed of ratification in this body. The first provision of any moment is that the existing laws of the United States relative to the public lands shall not apply to such lands in the Hawaiian Islands, and that the Congress may make special laws relative to the management of such lands, with a proviso that all proceeds from the sale of those lands, if the islands are incorporated, shall be applied for the benefit of the Hawaiian Islands for educational and other public purposes, except only such of them as may be needed for military purposes.

There are provisions, then, for the exercise of the civil jurisdiction of those islands as it is now established until the United States shall make other laws relative to their municipal control and government.

The public debt of the islands is assumed by the United States, with the proviso that that public debt shall not exceed the sum of $4,000,000.

Mr. FAULKNER. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. FAULKNER. I understand the limitation of $4,000,000 applies both to the postal accumulation as well as to the public debt of Hawaii. I should like the Senator from Louisiana to state to the Senate whether there has been any official information laid before Congress as to the amount that is now due from that postal service to the people of Hawaii; what at this time is in fact the public debt of those islands; and, further, whether, notwithstanding that limitation of $4,000,000, if we incorporate those islands into this nation as a part of our territory, we do not become responsible, no matter what amount may actually be due?

Mr. CAFFERY. In other words, I understand the Senator to inquire whether the $4,000,000 assumption of the debt of the Hawaiian Islands is not limited solely to the bonds, and does not include the debt due to the depositors of the postal savings bank?

Mr. FAULKNER. Yes.

Mr. CAFFERY. I will read that clause and state the conclusions that I draw from it:

The public debt of the Republic of Hawaii, lawfully existing at the date of the passage of this joint resolution, including the amounts due to depositors in the Hawaiian Postal Savings Bank, is hereby assumed by the Government of the United States; but the liability of the United States in this regard shall in no case exceed $4,000,000.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator did not catch the point of my questions. The questions I submitted were: First, whether there is any official information in the possession of the Senate as to what are the liabilities to-day of the Hawaiian Government as to its postal service and as to its bonded liabilities; and, secondly, if the two exceed $4,000,000 and we incorporate those islands into our territory, whether or not we do not assume any liability that exists to the creditors of those islands at the time of the incorporation, notwithstanding the limitation provided for in this joint resolution?

Mr. CAFFERY. I am not aware that any official communication is in the possession of this body from Hawaii relative to the bonded indebtedness of Hawaii or the indebtedness of the postal savings bank to its depositors.

I will say to the Senator, in answer to his inquiry, that in my opinion, if the joint liability arising from the bonds and from the deposits in the savings bank exceed $4,000,000, according to the plain and, I think, a strict contract construction of the clause of the joint resolution I have read, no legal liability will be on the United States in excess of $4,000,000 if the joint liability should exceed that sum.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It ought to be, if it is not.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator certainly does not claim that one government can annex another—

Mr. FAULKNER. And incorporate it.

Mr. SPOONER. Without becoming liable for its indebtedness?

Mr. CAFFERY. I do not, but—

Mr. SPOONER. It takes it with all of its indebtedness.

Mr. CAFFERY. I do not. Our incorporation of the islands could not cut off the debts of individual debtors there to any amount; but the contract liability of the United States would be limited to the $4,000,000 named.

Mr. SPOONER. If the government of the country annexed ceases to exist by virtue of annexation, does the Senator claim that the annexing government does not become liable for the debt, whatever that debt may be?

Mr. CAFFERY. I do not think we would be legally bound.

Mr. FAULKNER. The point of my question was whether, under international law, no matter what was the liability or what was the limitation in this joint resolution, this nation would be responsible to the full amount of that liability, having incorporated that territory, and that government having surrendered its sovereignty? I should like any Senator to answer that question.

Mr. CAFFERY. I will say to the Senator that I do not know whether the amount due to the depositors in this savings bank is a Government obligation upon the part of Hawaii or is an individual obligation upon the part of that savings bank. I do not know anything as to that.

Mr. FAULKNER. Nor do I.

Mr. CAFFERY. But I did presume in my reply that that was purely a personal credit, and that the debt springing from deposits in the Hawaiian Postal Savings Bank was a debt due by the bank to the depositors, with which the Government of Hawaii had nothing whatever to do.

Mr. FAULKNER. I should like to ask any Senator on the floor whether he has any official information as to what is the liability of the Government of Hawaii as it exists now as to these liabilities?

Mr. MORGAN. What would the Senator from West Virginia regard as official information?

Mr. SPOONER. Accurate information.

Mr. FAULKNER. I supposed that when there was a negotiation between this Government and the Government of Hawaii that matter was presented to this Government in an official form as to its liability on these two accounts; but it has never been laid before the Senate or the House of Representatives, so far as I have heard.

Mr. MORGAN. Information, I have no doubt, is in the possession of the State Department. If the Senator from West Virginia will simply ask for a statement from the minister from Hawaii, that information could be very easily obtained, if it is not already in the State Department. In that way we can get accurately at the situation there.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will ask the Senator, who is one of the most distinguished members of the Committee on Foreign Relations, whether, in the examination of this joint resolution and the determination of that committee to recommend it for the adoption of the Senate, they did not investigate into this question and ascertain what were the liabilities of the Republic of Hawaii which we were assuming to incorporate into this nation?

Mr. MORGAN. I can not say that the committee as a body investigated into all these items, but I can say that members of the committee have investigated it. I am entirely satisfied that $4,000,000 will more than cover the postal liabilities and all other liabilities of the Hawaiian Government, including, if you please, the claim set up by Japan. The items can be very easily produced showing the exact situation of the whole subject, and there is no difficulty in that at all.

Four million dollars will cover all of the indebtedness, and more than all of the indebtedness, that Hawaii possibly can have to her own people or to foreign countries; and the property to be conveyed is public property, not that encumbered with the provision that it shall be applied to schools, but public property which belongs to the Government of Hawaii, including buildings and wharves, which are leased for a large sum of money, and can always be leased for a large sum of money, and other public property, amounting to between eight and nine million dollars, which would be a clear gain.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator will permit me, I will ask what valuation per acre does he put upon those public lands so as to reach the sum of $8,000,000 in the aggregate?

Mr. MORGAN. Not the public lands. They were not included in my estimate. The public lands have nothing to do with the question. They are set apart for purposes of education and the improvement of the people of Hawaii. I am speaking about the public property which belongs to the Government of Hawaii, disassociated from the ownership of the public domain.

Mr. FAULKNER. Public buildings and things of that sort?

Mr. MORGAN. A great number of items. I can show them to the Senator if he would like to see them.

Mr. FAULKNER. I think that is the difficulty and the disadvantage under which we are laboring. There has been no written report from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and we have heard no remarks from the Senators who have investigated this matter. We ought to have a full statement before the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. There has been an elaborate report, but it did not touch upon that topic, because it was understood, of course, that the Government, in taking care of its own interest in this annexation matter, had provided for a limitation of $4,000,000, which would cover every possible contingency, and it will do so.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, I did not apprehend the bearing of the question of the Senator from West Virginia when he first propounded it, but, after the colloquy we have had, I now see its full scope. It may be, or may not be, that the bonds of the Hawaiian Republic and the debt of the postal savings bank exceed $4,000,000. My answer was predicated upon an assumption that the bonded indebtedness did not exceed that amount and that the debt of the Hawaiian postal savings bank was a debt of a private institution, for which the Government of Hawaii was not responsible.

But, Mr. President, this very incident right now in this discussion shows the blind and eager haste by which we are attempting to annex these islands. We do not even know the amount of liability that we are contracting. If this debt exceeds $4,000,000 and the debt of the Hawaiian postal savings bank to its depositors is a governmental debt, and it exceeds $4,000,000, then annexation, having accomplished the submergence of that Republic into the United States, its complete obliteration as an independent sovereignty, where would the creditors, the holders of the bonds, and the depositors in this bank get their money? Could we, in the face of an implied moral obligation, shelter ourselves under the technicality that we fixed the limit of our liabilities at $4,000,000? That, in my opinion, sir, would be as gross a violation of a moral obligation as the overthrow of that Republic by the military arm of the United States was a violation of another moral obligation.

Again, reading this resolution further, there is a prohibition of any further immigration of Chinese.

Mr. FAULKNER. But none of Japanese, is there?

Mr. CAFFERY. No; not of Japanese, but only of Chinese. That, in brief, is a summary of the points of the joint resolution.

Mr. President, a question arises upon the face of this document, a question of the gravest character, a question that heretofore occupied the attention of the Congress of the United States for a longer period than the debate upon this proposition has occupied—I refer to the admission of Texas under a joint resolution. We are told that this constitutional question that has arisen and that we are now debating is a mere quibble.

We are told that any delay in discussing this question, any debate upon this matter, imperils the lives of our soldiers in Manila. Sir, does this war of humanity that we are waging against Spain depend for its solution upon a violation of the Constitution of the United States in regard to Hawaii? Does the flag of humanity that we have raised, this white flag of humanity that now floats side by side with the star-spangled banner, require a blot upon our Constitution in order that its beneficent folds may shelter our soldiers and bid them Godspeed to a humane victory?

I say, Mr. President, that no graver question has ever arisen before the Congress of the United States than that involved in the admission of Hawaii under the joint resolution now pending.

But there is another question of far more transcendent moment, and that is the policy involved in the matter of annexing these trans-marine possessions. There is another matter involved, in my mind, of no small moment, as to whether or not, under the conditions of the establishment of the Republic of Hawaii in 1893, the United States Government can, with good faith and with a clear conscience, take possession of the territory and enfold it under the flag and incorporate it into the Union.

Mr. President, in approaching the discussion of this question, I can do no better than quote the patriotic and statesmanlike language of the distinguished and venerable and venerated Senator from the State of Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. I send to the Secretary's desk and ask to have read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 20, 1893, the extract marked on page 6889.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

At my time of life, having no higher ambition than to be right, I greatly regret to find that on the question of the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands I can not quite agree with some of my associates here with whose opinions I have rarely differed, and while knowing how impossible it is to change the views of any Senator, I hope they will pardon my desire to present in open session of the Senate my reasons for opposition to a measure heretofore always rejected by the United States, and, as it appears to me, never so much deserving of rejection as now. I am not unwilling the record should show, if the consistency of any person or party on this question has been broken, that it will not include any record of mine. Let me add that I am, as ever, in favor of holding executive sessions of the Senate with closed doors, but not in favor of a secret session of the Senate for the admission of a State into the Union. That is too important to be wholly concealed from the people.

Mr. CAFFERY. I commend the sentiments expressed by the Senator from Vermont to the careful consideration of those Senators whose eager haste to annex these distant isles of the sea to the United States has made them forget not only the constitutional barrier, but the powerful arguments that have been adduced in regard to the danger of these foreign acquisitions. At the time of life of that venerated Senator he raises a note of alarm. His ambition, Mr. President, is to be right. Notwithstanding these isles may be tempting; may be as fascinating as the fabled isle of Sappho; may have every allurements to capture the imagination, that distinguished and able Senator sounds a note of warning in this Chamber, to beware, lest this kind of acquisition endanger our own institutions and by their acquisition we incorporate into our midst a dangerous element.

Mr. President, I shall devote myself to a brief consideration of what I consider to be the constitutional points involved in these resolutions. The Constitution provides that the President of the United States—shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

That is the second section of the second article of the Constitution. The third section of Article IV reads as follows:

New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

Mr. President, it would seem from an analysis of the Constitution and a consideration of the powers vested in the different branches of the Government that the executive power, by and with the conjunction of the Senate, is the power charged exclusively with the acquisition of foreign territory. It would seem further that the Constitution in the matter of authority given to Congress to admit new States must be construed with reference to the facts and circumstances surrounding the country at the time of the formation and adoption of the Constitution. After providing for the admission of new States by Congress, there is an inhibition against the formation of new States out of a conjunction of two or more States or to be carved out of the territory of one State.

Mr. PETTUS. Without the consent of Congress.

Mr. CAFFERY. Without the consent of both—of the legislatures of the States and of Congress.

Mr. President, what is necessary to be done in order that the United States may acquire territory? It is necessary to enter into a contract with the state whose territory, in whole or in part, the United States seeks to acquire. In order to form that contract there must necessarily be the state agencies to negotiate that contract.

What other branch of the Government has the necessary agencies to enter into contracts than the executive branch of the Government? What department of the Government is it that has exclusive control and jurisdiction over our external affairs? What department is it that can send and receive ministers and appoint these necessary and usual agencies whereby treaties are negotiated? Did anybody ever before suppose that the legislative department of the Government, which enacts laws to be the rule of conduct, could make the contracts which the laws authorize to be made? The idea of power to make contracts lodging in the legislative branch of the Government is utterly foreign to a due conception of legislative function. The legislative branch of the Government lays down rules; it dictates the course of action; it prescribes the conduct of the citizen. It never did, it never can make a contract.

It has not the necessary agents. How can a contract involving the cession of foreign territory be negotiated between the Congress of the United States and one of the foreign states of Europe? Where are its agents? It can not appoint ministers. It is bereft of the power, of the machinery to contract. Such contracts are of a high and extraordinary character. It has never been contended and it can not be successfully contended that the Congress of the United States can usurp the Executive function of dealing diplomatically with foreign nations, and unless there is in the Constitution of the United States some express power or some power flowing as a necessary consequence from an express power, to enter into contracts for the acquisition of territory or to adjust or settle any foreign relation or business, the proponents of the joint resolution stand without the slightest constitutional ground to warrant their contention.

We are cited to the case of Texas. We are told to look at that enormous domain which has come under the jurisdiction of the United States by virtue of a joint resolution, and then say the argument against admission of foreign territory has any weight. I confess that if any foreign country were annexed to the United States—say, Russia or England or Ireland or Germany—by the Congress of the United States, and it was an accomplished fact, the judicial power of the United States could not inquire as to the validity, the constitutional legality of any such acquisition; and just precisely because there is no tribunal before which this question can be brought, being of a political character, for that very reason the consciences of Senators ought to be quick and alive to the necessity of observing the constitutional limitations in this regard over legislative power.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator doubt, if we should pass the joint resolution acquiring the Hawaiian Islands, that it would be final? Does he know of any power in this Government or of any officer in the Government who would question it after the act was passed? Would it not conclude both the judicial and the executive departments of the Government and be final if we passed the act?

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Nevada allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Is it not a question whether Senators under their oaths can do it; and not a question whether if we do it somebody can raise a question?

Mr. STEWART. There are two separate questions. If it is conceded that when it is done it is an accomplished fact and can not be questioned, of course we need not go any further in arguing the constitutional question. Then it becomes a question of discretion, a question of judgment. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me a moment?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly. I am always glad to hear the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. I read from the opinion of Chief Justice Taney, 19 Howard, Dred Scott vs. Sandford. The portion of the decision I shall read has never been questioned. It does not relate to the status of Dred Scott. It relates to the power of acquiring territory, and Judge Taney was as competent to pass on that question as any judge probably who has been on the bench. Speaking of the power of Congress to acquire territory, he says:

And, indeed, the power exercised by Congress to acquire territory and establish a government there according to its own unlimited discretion was viewed with great jealousy by the leading statesmen of the day. And in the Federalist (No. 38), written by Mr. Madison, he speaks of the acquisition of the Northwestern Territory by the Confederate States, by the cession from Virginia, and the establishment of a government there, as an exercise of power not warranted by the Articles of Confederation and dangerous to the liberties of the people. And he urges the adoption of the Constitution as a security and safeguard against such an exercise of power.

We do not mean, however, to question the power of Congress in this respect. The power to expand the territory of the United States by the admission of new States is plainly given; and in the construction of this power by all the Departments of the Government it has been held to authorize the acquisition of territory not fit for admission at the time, but to be admitted as soon as its population and situation would entitle it to admission. It is acquired to become a State, and not to be held as a colony and governed by Congress with absolute authority; and as the propriety of admitting a new State is committed to the sound discretion of Congress, the power to acquire territory for that purpose, to be held by the United States until it is in a suitable condition to become a State upon an equal footing with the other States, must rest upon the same discretion.

That is unquestioned; and in the case of Rhode Island against Massachusetts, in regard to the boundaries, these questions were discussed in a collateral way. A few sentences from that decision may be interesting. I read from 12 Peters, page 737:

A sovereign decides by his own will, which is the supreme law within his own boundary (6 Peters, 714; 9 Peters, 748); a court, or judge, decides according to the law prescribed by the sovereign power, and that law is the rule for judgment.

It is an absolute rule in a sovereign State. Then in the same case, page 752, the courts say:

Contests for rights of sovereignty and jurisdiction between States over any particular territory are not, in my judgment, the subjects of judicial cognizance and control, to be recovered and enforced in an ordinary suit, and are, therefore, not within the grant of judicial power contained in the Constitution.

In this case the court finally decided that the controversy between States as to boundaries was within the Constitution, because the power was expressly given; but the question of the right of the United States to territory acquired could not be made a judicial question. That is a question to be decided by treaty or by war and is not a judicial question. So if we pass this joint resolution it will put an end to all controversy so far as the law is concerned.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator place the power of Congress to acquire this territory upon the Dred Scott decision?

Mr. STEWART. No; I merely read from that portion of it. It did not have any reference to Dred Scott. I cited that to prove what I said.

Mr. SPOONER. The court says:

The power to expand the territory of the United States by the admission of new States is plainly given.

There is no doubt about that.

And in the construction of this power by all the departments of the Government it has been held to authorize the acquisition of territory not fit for admission at the time, but to be admitted as soon as its population and situation would entitle it to admission. It is acquired to become a State and not to be held as a colony and governed by Congress with absolute authority; and as the propriety of admitting a new State is committed to the sound discretion of Congress, the power to acquire territory for that purpose—

That is, the lesser power is exercised with a view to the ultimate exercise of the greater.

Mr. STEWART. Oh, very well.

Mr. SPOONER. Wait a minute—to be held by the United States until it is in a suitable condition to become a State upon an equal footing with the other States, must rest upon the same discretion.

What I want to ask is this: Is it the Senator's view that under the power to admit a Territory into the Union as a State Congress acquires this territory with a view to statehood?

Mr. STEWART. If it ever becomes in a condition fit for statehood. That, according to the decision, must rest in the sound discretion of Congress. It may take a century or two. It may come around some time. The decision holds that Congress must also exercise a sound discretion when it will cease to treat it as a colony or Territory. That is a question we may not live to see disposed of.

Mr. SPOONER. That may be. I probably will not live a great many years; I hope the Senator will live a great many; but my question was whether he justifies, from the standpoint of the Constitution, the acquisition of this territory upon the theory that it is acquired, not being fit now for statehood, but ultimately to become fit for statehood and to be admitted into the Union as a State?

Mr. STEWART. I do not think the question how soon it will be fit for statehood—

Mr. SPOONER. I did not ask that. The Senator evades my question.

Mr. STEWART. The political power to acquire territory undoubtedly exists independent of that provision in the Constitution which provides for the admission of States. I think it stands on still higher ground.

Mr. SPOONER. Then the Senator does not rest at all upon this decision?

Mr. STEWART. Not exclusively upon it.

Mr. SPOONER. Does he at all?

Mr. STEWART. It leans my way.

Mr. SPOONER. How much?

Mr. STEWART. We have a right to acquire it.

Mr. SPOONER. For statehood?

Mr. STEWART. When it becomes fit for that purpose; when you get ready. So that does not make much difference. It leans my way sufficiently.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin, who is a very good lawyer—

Mr. SPOONER. Thank you.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest that it is not necessary for the court in this case to decide any question of that kind. I think the Senator himself would not stand up in the American Senate and say that the power to take territory depends upon what disposition we are to make of it. The power must precede any intention to do anything with it.

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator speak a little louder? We can not hear.

Mr. TELLER. I am speaking loud enough.

Mr. CAFFERY. There is so much noise we can not hear.

Mr. TELLER. The question of the power of our Government to take territory was thoroughly discussed in the early history of this country. Mr. Jefferson doubted whether there was that power. His trouble was not that he did not have the power to take it by treaty, but he doubted whether there was power at all to add to the territory by the acquisition of anything outside of what they called the ancient limits. That was the position taken by a great many. Mr. Jefferson said he believed that was the correct one. Yet, notwithstanding he so believed, he took in the Louisiana purchase. Then he said, after he had taken it, that he thought the proper thing to do was to provide by constitutional amendment to cover a lack of power to take it in. That can be found explicitly in his writings and also in his messages. There is not any question as to what the controversy was. It was not whether it came by treaty or by some other method, but whether we could take it at all.

It was strongly contended, as I said the other night, in 1811, when Louisiana was being admitted, that there was no power to take it at all. On the other hand, it was contended by a number of members of Congress that that was just as I claimed it was the other night, a power of sovereignty not denied to the General Government, and that the territory could be taken without relying upon that provision of the Constitution about the admission of States, which they said with great force referred simply to the territory included in the 800,000 square miles we then had. I regard that as one of the things settled.

Mr. Lincoln in his first message raised that question, and said after sixty years the question of power to get foreign lands was not open to discussion. Evidently, then, when he was making that statement, he was considering whether we should not buy African lands for the deportation of Africans. He said that was within the power of the Government of the United States.

I do not care to debate the question, but merely wished to make this suggestion.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to make a suggestion.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me for a moment?

Mr. STEWART. I want to make another suggestion.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish to say a word, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. STEWART. Very well.

Mr. SPOONER. I put the question which I did to the Senator from Nevada because he cited as justifying this acquisition the Dred Scott decision. I do say to the Senator from Colorado, although I do not think he ought to intervene in this business at all—

Mr. TELLER. Perhaps not.

Mr. SPOONER. This was not to be a debate. It was the declaration at the beginning that this was to be merely a symposium of negative views and nothing else, and so I think the Senator ought to keep out.

Mr. STEWART. Do not keep me out of it too long.

Mr. SPOONER. I do say to the Senator from Colorado, without any hesitation, as a lawyer, that if the right to take this territory is based upon the power to admit a new State, which the court was dealing with in the Dred Scott decision, it follows inevitably that it is a territory which must some time, in the contemplation of Congress, be intended for statehood.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to state my views? They are very clear, and I think I can make the Senator understand them. I am not one of those who believe that territory can be acquired by treaty alone. I think there must be legislation.

Mr. CULLOM. Afterwards?

Mr. STEWART. Before it is consummated—before you acquire territory. It is a sovereign power to claim jurisdiction over territory. That is a sovereign political power. It takes the entire political power of the Government, which does not exist in the President and the Senate. That is only for certain limited purposes; not for this purpose, surely.

The President may inaugurate negotiations; may make a treaty, which gets the consent of the other party and the consent of the Executive and Senate, but it does not get the consent of the political power of this Government to make it a part of our territory. It may impose a moral obligation, and it undoubtedly does create an obligation on the part of this Government to carry it out, but it requires legislation to acquire territory.

Take Jefferson's first purchase. He made the purchase, but it was not to become a part of the territory of the United States until Congress passed laws for its government, for the appointment of officers. The treaty by which we bought Alaska provided that we should pay $7,000,000 for it. It had to be carried out by legislation through Congress. If it stood on the treaty, we would not have had any courts there to-day.

Mr. WHITE. How did the title pass from Russia in the case of Alaska—by our legislation or by the contract in the treaty?

Mr. STEWART. By our legislation we acquired jurisdiction over it.

Mr. WHITE. How did the title leave Russia?

Mr. STEWART. She might sell it to us a hundred times, but the title does not pass until it is accepted, and there is no power in this Government that has a right to accept the deed except the political power to extend its jurisdiction. The title does not pass by mere deed. It must be delivered and accepted. There can be no delivery except to the power capable of taking possession. The President could not take possession and establish his courts. It required legislation.

In this case we have had all the preliminary negotiation. All the President could do he has done. They have done on the other side all they can do. The Senate has not acted. Now it is in shape to be consummated, and it is immaterial how the negotiations are inaugurated or how the condition of things has been brought about whereby it is proper for Congress to take final action. It is immaterial how the negotiations have been brought about. It is an act of sovereignty to extend jurisdiction over it, to accept the property. We can not accept it by any part of this Government except the legislative department.

Mr. WHITE. With the permission of the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Nevada, I desire to ask the Senator from Nevada whether he considers that the clause in the constitution of Hawaii providing how they can alienate the country or get rid of their own political existence is of any moment?

Mr. STEWART. It is of no moment whatever.

Mr. WHITE. That is what I supposed.

Mr. STEWART. It is of no moment. If we claim jurisdiction over it, we claim jurisdiction of the country. Congress declares that it is our territory, and provides for courts for taking possession of the territory, and then it becomes a political question; and if Hawaii is going to resist it, she has to resist it by war. There is no other way. No court can decide it. We accept it by passing the law. Of course Congress would not pass a law taking any territory unless preliminary negotiations had taken place, unless it was a prudent and decent thing to do, and with the consent of the territory.

If that was required, it would certainly be known to Congress. Congress can ascertain that in any way it pleases, but it is idle to say that the territory can be acquired by any department of this Government except the political power lodged in the two Houses of Congress and the President. Territory never has been acquired until that was accomplished. Property never has been delivered. You have got to deliver the cession of the property. If it is real estate, you must have somebody to accept the deed and take possession of the property. Congress does it, and it has been delayed until that time. It never has been assumed that it was an accomplished fact when the treaty was ratified.

After a treaty is made the political department can repudiate the whole transaction and refuse to exercise jurisdiction and declare it is not a part of the country at all. Congress might pass a law after a treaty was made and abandon the whole enterprise. It requires an act of Congress. Why, if an act of Congress consummates the act, and nobody can question it, is it not constitutional? Nobody can question it after it is done. It is evidently a part of the sovereign power, and has been so construed for the last hundred years, and it is too late now to go back. The consummation in this way is the natural and straight way to do it.

Mr. CAFFERY. When the Senator from Nevada interrupted me with his question I had answered substantially before he questioned me. I had admitted, in the course of my remarks, that if territory was acquired by the United States by joint resolution that the question being of a political character could not be inquired into by the judicial department; but that does not answer the question propounded by the Senator from Wisconsin. The question is whether the acquisition by joint resolution is within the limits of our Constitution.

The argument of the Senator from Nevada reminds me of the answer given by a celebrated member of the House to a question to him as to whether or not a certain act that he wanted to have done was constitutional. What was the reply of that gentleman? "Why," he said, "what is the Constitution between friends?" What is the Constitution between the friends of this measure? What is the Constitution to the friends of this measure who seek to incorporate this island into the United States by joint resolution?

Mr. STEWART. What is the Constitution between friends? It is very important. What is the Constitution between this measure and the people of the United States? They are all friends. The Constitution is silent on the subject of acquiring territory by the sovereign power. It has been decided for a hundred years, and we have continued to do it. The Constitution is not in our way.

Mr. CAFFERY. The Constitution does warrant by the strongest kind of implication the acquisition of territory by treaty. What, sir, is the usual business of treaties? What are treaties between foreign nations mostly made for? What has been from time immemorial, from the very foundation of civil government, the method of acquiring foreign territory? By treaty, by convention, by contract, and that department of Government which has the authority to make and ratify treaties by an irresistible implication has the authority to do what treaties usually do among nations; that is, to acquire territory.

The Constitution is not silent. The Constitution speaks language so plain, so clear, in this regard that anybody can understand it. Not one single inch of territory of a character that you may call foreign has ever been acquired by the United States by joint resolution.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will ask the Senator, for information, whether he knows of a case in the history of any government in which foreign territory has ever been acquired by legislative enactment?

Mr. CAFFERY. I have never in my life known of such a case.

Mr. FAULKNER. Is not the distinction clearly this, not only in this but in all governments: The acquisition of foreign territory is an executive act and has always been an executive act in every nation in the world. It has never been a legislative act. Our Constitution steps in and puts a limitation upon the exercise of that universal executive power found residing in all governments by requiring the Senate to concur by a two-thirds vote with the Executive in the formation of treaties that acquire territory.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator let me ask him a question?

Mr. FAULKNER. There is the fundamental distinction showing that it is an executive and not a legislative power.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator cite an instance?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. STEWART. I just wish the Senator to cite an instance.

Mr. CAFFERY. Is the Senator from Nevada addressing me or the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. STEWART. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia to state an instance where territory has been acquired by executive power, and where the legislative power has not also been invoked. Of course in monarchies the executive embodies the entire political power of the state; but where the political power is lodged elsewhere than in the executive the executive can not consummate these political results. Where the Constitution is silent the political power should be exercised, and by custom and by the decision of the courts it is exercised by Congress. There is where the political power rests. The executive power does not exist here as it does in Russia or Germany, or in most of the monarchies where the executive can make laws.

Mr. FAULKNER. Where does it rest in England? England is a limited monarchy. The political power rests in the Parliament of England. No nation you can name, either absolute or limited in its functions, has ever been known to acquire territory by legislative act. The simple reason is that it is not a legislative function or power.

It is purely an executive power. The framers of our Government, realizing the fact that we were placing even greater limitations upon executive authority than any other form of government which ever had been organized, limited the powers of the Executive in that respect by requiring two-thirds of the Senate to concur with the Executive.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator has not read the history of the acquisition of India. That was originally acquired through a corporation organized under the laws of Parliament. It was done by the legislature constantly for a hundred years before it was finally consummated. It had executive approval, but it was not acquired by executive act without corresponding legislation. These things go along pari passu. We have acquired territory by executive acts and by legislative acts. The Executive inaugurates it, but it has required legislative action all along. So it is with England. It is only in an absolute monarchy that the sovereign power to acquire territory and extend jurisdiction and establish courts is with the executive. That can only be done by an absolute monarchy, not by a limited government like ours.

Mr. FAULKNER. With the courtesy of the Senator from Louisiana, I will say that the Senator from Nevada can not give an instance in which any territory has been incorporated in any other government, I care not what its form was, where it has not been done through the treaty-making power, and that means through the exercise of executive authority. There is not an instance to the contrary that the Senator can give to the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. Oh, yes; India was acquired mainly by acts of Parliament, taking in additional parts without any reference to the rights of the natives.

Mr. FAULKNER. And that was done by Parliament? One piece after another was taken in?

Mr. STEWART. Yes. In our country the Executive has inaugurated the proceedings and they have been consummated by the political power, by Congress.

Mr. SPOONER. The Executive has inaugurated it, but Congress could not add it, under the Constitution.

Mr. STEWART. No; it is not provided for in the Constitution.

Mr. SPOONER. The Parliament is omnipotent. Does the Senator claim that Congress is omnipotent?

Mr. STEWART. Within the powers conferred by the Constitution and those necessarily implied.

Mr. SPOONER. What powers of the Constitution does the Senator rely on as authorizing the acquisition by Congress of the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. STEWART. I refer to the power which has been exercised as a part of the Constitution.

Mr. SPOONER. What power?

Mr. STEWART. The power to acquire territory.

Mr. SPOONER. But what power, exercised by the Executive or exercised by Congress?

Mr. STEWART. No; exercised by Congress.

Mr. SPOONER. Under what clause of the Constitution?

Mr. STEWART. There is no clause in the Constitution. It is a sovereign power outside of the Constitution.

Mr. SPOONER. In what case?

Mr. STEWART. Take Alaska.

Mr. SPOONER. That was done by treaty.

Mr. STEWART. No.

Mr. SPOONER. Was it not?

Mr. STEWART. The contract was made by treaty and accepted by Congress.

Mr. CAFFERY. It was done by treaty.

Mr. SPOONER. Could it have been done without treaty?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, if Russia had consented.

Mr. SPOONER. Then, does the Senator wish to be understood as saying that Congress could have entered into a contract with Russia for the purchase of Alaska without the intervention of the Executive of the Government?

Mr. STEWART. I do.

Mr. SPOONER. I give it up.

Mr. STEWART. You may give it up. I undertake to say that if Russia had not resisted we could have taken it in by an act of Congress, and the only remedy would be a resort to arms if the jurisdiction had been extended by act of Congress.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator understands, I assume, that where the President by a treaty ratified by the Senate enters into a contract to acquire certain territory for a certain amount of money—

Mr. STEWART. Congress passes an act to take the territory upon such terms and conditions as Congress may prescribe, and then this Government has nobody to deal with but the foreign country, and they can only prevent it by war.

Mr. ALLEN. How does the Senator say that England acquired India?

Mr. STEWART. It was organized into a company in the first place.

Mr. ALLEN. Under a parliamentary act?

Mr. STEWART. Under a parliamentary act, which was modified from time to time. Greater privileges were granted to the company; and when it acquired certain rights, the military would enforce them, and Parliament sanctioned it. So it followed on for a hundred years, step by step, the executive operating in the country through the military, and Parliament making appropriations and sanctioning the proceeding right along.

Mr. ALLEN. Parliament, in the first place, authorized by proper act the formation of the East India Company?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, giving it special privileges.

Mr. ALLEN. Giving it special political privileges?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. And that corporation instituted a government and carried it on for a hundred years or more under parliamentary authority?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. That acquisition, then, was one of conquest authorized by the legislative authority?

Mr. STEWART. And sanctioned by the executive.

Mr. ALLEN. And parliament under that form of government had authority to create the corporation?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. Does not the Senator see any distinction between that case and a case where there is no constitutional power to create such an organization?

Mr. STEWART. No; I do not. There is no lack of power to pass an act. Suppose we should pass an act to-morrow extending our boundaries 300 miles down into Mexico, our courts would have to follow it. The only remedy Mexico would have would be war.

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not understand that to be the law. Suppose the executive department does not recognize that as the limit of the country?

Mr. STEWART. The executive department has got to obey the law. The executive department is bound by that act.

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator from Nevada permit me to interrupt him? I wish to know how he proposes to extend those limits down 300 miles into Mexico. The Senator says, "Suppose we extend them." I want to know by what rule.

Mr. STEWART. We do not propose to do it. I do not think Congress would commit such an outrage as that.

Mr. CAFFERY. Exactly; but in the supposititious case of the extension of territory 300 miles into Mexico, how would you do it?

Mr. STEWART. It might be done by act of Congress, and if the President would sign it, he and Congress would be bound by it. Mexico would not be bound by it, but the judicial and executive departments of the Government would be bound by it if Congress said that the boundary line should be in another place.

Mr. CAFFERY. It would be purely a peaceful act?

Mr. STEWART. It would be purely a peaceful act if Mexico did not object. If Mexico did object, it would be a case for war.

Mr. TELLER. Suppose Mexico agreed to it, what then?

Mr. STEWART. If Mexico agreed to it, that would be the end of it.

Mr. TELLER. Of course, that would be the end of it.

Mr. ALLEN. But suppose the Mexican Congress or the Mexican executive agreed to it, and that neither the Congress nor the executive had the authority to agree to it.

Mr. STEWART. It would not matter whether they had any authority or not. If we took the territory inside of our boundary, Mexico would have no redress but war.

Mr. ALLEN. But, to carry out the Senator's simile further, suppose Congress should declare that it was a necessity to annex England and the President should approve it, would that annex England to the United States?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, if England did not object.

Mr. ALLEN. But suppose the people of England did object.

Mr. STEWART. Then we would have to fight for it.

Mr. ALLEN. And if the English Parliament would consent, would that bind the people of England, though the Parliament lacked authority to consent?

Mr. STEWART. If the people of England were not satisfied, they might fight, too.

Mr. ALLEN. Then we can annex the world.

Mr. STEWART. We can annex anything. But we do not suppose that Congress is going to do those things. The fact that sovereign power exists implies that it might be abused. It is not abused in this case, because we know that the people of the Sandwich Islands want to be annexed to this country.

Mr. ALLEN. Where do you find the power to annex?

Mr. STEWART. It is sovereign power. It is not written in the Constitution.

Mr. ALLEN. If it is not written in the Constitution or is not implied to carry out some written power, then it does not exist.

Mr. STEWART. We are doing things every day that are not written in the Constitution. We could not carry on the Government for a week if we had to look to the letter of the Constitution for everything we do.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator find any exception to this constitutional rule?

Mr. STEWART. What rule?

Mr. ALLEN. Can the Senator find any exception to this rule?

Mr. STEWART. What rule?

Mr. ALLEN. Either that the power must be expressly conferred by the Constitution or it must be necessarily implied to carry out some power.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PENROSE in the chair). Senators will please address the Chair. Complaint is made by the Reporters that the Senators can not be heard.

Mr. STEWART. It is a settled constitutional doctrine in this country that the power to acquire territory exists. It has been exercised for a hundred years, and it is settled. Some things get settled by practice, by precedent. It has been settled beyond controversy, and no court will ever deny it. Take the decisions of the Supreme Court and they recognize it as settled. There is no question about the constitutional power, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the Senator from Nevada permit me?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. The power to annex territory exists, I understand the Senator to say?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir.

Mr. MALLORY. Has not the method of exercising that power been defined?

Mr. STEWART. No.

Mr. MALLORY. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided it. If the Senator will permit me, I will just cite an authority, the case of the Mormon Church vs. The United States. With that case the Senator is undoubtedly familiar. It is found in 136 United States Reports.

The power to acquire territory—

Says the court—

other than the territory northwest of the Ohio River (which belonged to the United States at the adoption of the Constitution) is derived from the treaty-making power and the power to declare and carry on war.

There the Supreme Court of the United States laid down distinctly how the sovereign power of annexation was to be exercised, namely, either through the treaty-making power or else through the war-making power.

Mr. STEWART. Well, it amounts to the same thing. The war-making power is the sovereign power. But that is rather a loose expression by the Supreme Court.

Mr. MALLORY. The Supreme Court has distinctly stated how that sovereign power shall be exercised, either under the one or the other head.

Mr. STEWART. The Supreme Court was talking without any case before them. It was obiter dicta. They happened to correct themselves by saying that it may be done by the war-making power. They might have said that in talking along, not having the question of that power distinctly before them. It was a side matter; it was not a case decided.

Mr. MALLORY. If the Senator will read the decision, he will see that it was very pertinent to the case before the court.

Mr. STEWART. It would require the war-making power. The treaty-making power would not do. I undertake to say that it is the political power confided to the Government in the Legislature, and there is not any other power to annex territory.

Mr. TELLER. The courts have frequently said that they would not interfere with the political power; that they had not any right to do so.

Mr. STEWART. Over and over again the courts have said that they had not any right to interfere with the political power. It is settled whenever Congress acts. As to the preliminaries before there may be final action, that is quite immaterial.

Mr. MALLORY. If the Senator will permit me, the Supreme Court under the Constitution has the right to declare what the Constitution and law is; and in this case the Supreme Court, in discussing this sovereign power, which it says distinctly is a sovereign power, says it can be exercised in two ways, which it there specifies. I understand the Senator to say that he differs with the Supreme Court.

Mr. STEWART. The Supreme Court has distinctly stated in a great many cases that it has no jurisdiction to inquire into the right of the United States to territory which the law says belongs to the United States; that they can not question the action of the political power, which is sovereign in that regard. They can not do it. They have repeatedly held that there is no judicial power involved.

Mr. ALLEN. Does not the court hold this? Is not this the rule? Where the political power of this Government recognizes the entity of another political power, whether it arose by revolution, irregularly or not, the Supreme Court is bound to recognize it. But the Supreme Court has never gone to the extent of holding that it would recognize as final the mere annexation of territory.

Mr. STEWART. Oh, yes; they have nothing to do with annexation. They hold that wherever the political power directs them to go, wherever the United States claims territory by law and establishes its courts, the courts are bound by it. They can not inquire into the act of Congress extending jurisdiction over the territory.

Mr. ALLEN. That is simply a recognition of the existence of a de facto government.

Mr. STEWART. They can not inquire into that. It has been held over and over again that whenever the political power acts, that is the end of it. No other question can be raised by any department of this Government. There never has been any territory finally annexed to this country without the exercise of that power.

Mr. CAFFERY. With the permission of the Senator from Nevada, I will resume. [Laughter.] The discussion of this constitutional question shows to my mind the demoralization which arises from greed of obtaining foreign territory. The argument of the Senator from Nevada would constitute Congress an unlimited despotism. All the checks and balances so nicely adjusted between the different departments of this Government would disappear and Congress would arrogate extreme and absolute sovereignty.

The Supreme Court of the United States have held in all these cases that the matter involved in questions of this kind would be a political subject. They have never held that the acquisition of territory by an act of Congress when that territory was foreign was constitutional. In the case cited by the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] the Supreme Court have held that the only method of acquiring territory at all was by a treaty or by conquest. The Senator from Nevada, in his excursions to find authority, has cited us the case of the acquisition of India by England.

Sir, that was a pure conquest. The acquisition of India by England was the result of hostilities between the French at the start and the English claiming certain portions of the Indian territory, representing two rival companies. Those companies had been conceded a certain jurisdiction in India. The English triumphed under Clive and under Hastings. The French were driven out and the English obtained the territory. Whether it was done directly or indirectly through the East India Company, it makes no difference; the acquisition was by war.

Everybody acknowledges that territory can be acquired by conquest, but we are not talking of questions of revolution, of questions of war power, nor yet of the question of the power of the Supreme Court to investigate whether or not certain territory in the exercise of political power was acquired rightfully or wrongfully. We are discussing the question whether this proposed step is constitutional.

Mr. President, if anything was needed to awaken the minds and consciences of the American people to the extent to which the Constitution has been obliterated, it would be the question now pending and this debate. The broad pretense is set up that we are sovereign; that the acquisition of territory is the exercise of a sovereign prerogative, and therefore, by a singular failure of logic, the Congress of the United States may acquire it. The proponents of this proposition must establish that sovereignty resides in Congress before they can set aside the Constitution and acquire territory in any way not known to the Constitution.

If it is in the exercise of a sovereignty of the United States, every single department of the Government must join, the whole of the powers of the Government contained in the three coordinate branches of Government—the legislative, executive, and judicial. No one of those branches can travel outside of the Constitution and say that it can exercise sovereignty, like the contention that Congress can exercise sovereignty in this particular and that the other departments of the Government have no voice in it. Why not the executive, why not the judicial, if you please, as well as Congress, if this power can be exercised indiscriminately without any regard to the Constitution by any of the coordinate branches of the Government?

I do not give my assent to these revolutionary doctrines. I believe that they will destroy our constitution of government and that those volcanic islands had better be sunk 40 fathoms in the ocean than one jot or tittle of the Constitution be violated in their acquisition.

The Senator from Nevada has told us that we acquired Alaska by the exercise of legislative power. Not only did we not acquire Alaska by the exercise of legislative power, but the interference of the legislative arm in the acquisition was thrust aside by the Senate of the United States when they attempted to incorporate even a treaty in the resolution whereby they agreed to pay the money.

Mr. FAULKNER. I did not know that.

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. President, it did not need the Senator from Nevada to tell us that in the Alaskan treaty, providing for the payment of $7,200,000, the concurrence of the House of Representatives was necessary to make the appropriation for that purpose. But that is not exercising the power of acquisition; that is not invading the province of the treaty-making department of this Government. That is fulfilling a moral obligation which rests on the legislative branch whenever the executive branch has negotiated, concluded, and ratified a treaty. So it was in the purchase of Louisiana, when Mr. Jefferson agreed to pay the French Empire $15,000,000 for that vast territory. As a matter of course the legislative function of voting the appropriation for that sum had to be exercised.

It was beyond the power of the executive branch of the Government after negotiating the treaty to pay the money; and that is the only opportunity, the only way, in which the whole legislative department can intervene in a treaty. They can intervene to appropriate the money stipulated to be paid by the treaty; and that is all. They can not negotiate any of its terms; they have nothing whatever to do with that; and the Senator from Nevada and those who think with him would turn back the hands of civilization itself by employing the legislative arm to negotiate treaties. It would involve a total change of the Constitution of the United States; new provisions would have to be inserted in that document in order that the legislative branch should have the proper machinery whereby to negotiate treaties.

Suppose the Parliament of England should pass an act ceding Ireland to the United States and the Congress of the United States should pass an act accepting that cession. Could that be consummated without long, difficult, and exhaustive negotiation? How long has this very treaty been pending? What questions does it involve? The very question asked me by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] in regard to the extent of the obligation of the United States in the assumption of the debt of Hawaii shows the necessity of negotiation, shows that treaty making is a diplomatic function, shows that it is necessary that the department of Government charged with the control and the administration of external affairs is, and ought to be, and is stated to be in the Constitution of the United States, the sole branch of the Government having the legitimate power and necessary functions to conduct, negotiate, and ratify treaties. For the ratification the Senate intervenes and thus becomes part of the treaty-making power.

Why, sir, should we undertake to transfer to the legislative branch of the Government the treaty-making power, we would destroy the symmetry of our form of government and pave the way for a rapid despotism and imperialism. The power of Congress is great enough now. We have the power of the purse and the power of the sword; and the plea is now made that we must extend those powers to such an extent as to embrace every isle of the sea and every country on the globe upon the broad and unsupported statement that this Government has all the powers of every other nation, that this is a sovereign power, and, being a sovereign power, the Congress of the United States can usurp it over the heads of all the other departments of the Government.

That position is absolutely untenable, is absolutely unsupported, is absolutely repugnant to the genius and the spirit and letter of our Constitution. The essential idea and the fundamental concept of the Constitution of the United States is a separation of powers, and that document contains all the necessary power of a foreign character that a republic or any other government ought to have. The war power is given to Congress, the power of making treaties is given to the President and the Senate, and the judicial power to the courts. Here is an attempt to amalgamate all these powers under this specious plea of a sovereign and an inherent power somewhere, in some direction, residing, as they say, in the Congress of the United States. I take no part or lot in any such contention. There is no existence for it.

Mr. President, I know it is a little threadbare to talk about the Constitution, but right upon the threshold of this very grave step that we are about to take I hope that I may be pardoned for pointing to its language and attempting to construe that language, and to get from that language the spirit of the framers of our grand instrument of government. The maintenance of that, the perpetuity of that, is greater, more transcendent, of much more importance, than the acquisition of little isles of the sea that have disturbed the domestic councils of our country for some years.

This question, involving these grave constitutional questions, these graver questions of domestic policy, is launched upon us at a time of high excitement, when the patriotism of the land is aglow, when the military spirit burns like a consuming fire, when the illustrious deed of Dewey, the illustrious deed of Hobson, the magnificent spirit of our Army, the triumphant work of our Navy, all put the country in a state of mind not calculated to look at questions of the kind involved in this joint resolution with that dispassionate calmness, that sobriety of judgment which the occasion and the resolutions require.

Mr. President, while we are on this branch of the question, in reply to a statement of the Senator from Nevada, I will read from Wharton, second volume, chapter 6, section 131, page 21:

The question of the prerogatives of the House, when the efficiency of a treaty depends upon its action, came again into prominence in relation to the treaty of 1868 with Russia for the cession of Alaska. (See infra, section 159.) In that treaty it was provided that the territory should be transferred on the exchange of ratifications (Article IV), and that Russia should be paid an indemnity of $7,200,000. The treaty was ratified by the Senate on May 23, 1867, there being but two voices in the negative. On June 20, 1867, President Johnson issued a proclamation in which, after reciting the treaty, he declared: "Now, therefore, be it known that I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, have caused the said treaty to be made public to the end that the same and every clause and article thereof may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof."

The territory was transferred by Russia to the United States on October 18, 1867. When, however, the question of appropriation came before Congress at the ensuing session, it was at once seen that there was a marked division of opinion. The majority of the Committee of Foreign Affairs in the House of Representatives reported as follows:

"The committee reports to the House the following bill, making an appropriation to carry the treaty into effect, with a recommendation that it be enacted into a law:

"A bill to enable the President of the United States to fulfill the treaty between the United States and Russia of March 30, 1867.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives, That there be, and hereby is, appropriated $7,200,000 in coin to fulfill the stipulations contained in the sixth article of the treaty with Russia concluded at Washington on the 30th day of March, 1867."

A minority report was made, in which the worthlessness of the territory ceded was asserted, and in which the rejection of the purchase was recommended.

The majority report, while conceding that there were cases in which the assent of the House to a treaty might be properly withheld, limited such right to cases plainly inconsistent "with the fundamental principles, purposes, or interests of the Constitution." It was further asserted that "where a treaty is limited to objects consistent with the interests of the Government, its first and highest duty is to enact such measures as are necessary to carry the treaty into effect." It was urged that as the Alaska treaty had infringed no constitutional sanction, laws to carry it into execution should be passed. (As to prior negotiation, see infra, 159.)

Protracted debate ensued, beginning on June 30 and proceeding through July, the discussion relating far more to the constitutional rights of the House in such issues than as to the expediency of the purchase of Alaska. The tendency of the majority of the House was evidently to sanction the Alaska purchase, but to couple the approval of the treaty with a reservation of the right of the House to approve or disapprove in all cases in which the sanction of the House is necessary to execute a treaty. The following amendment adopting this view passed the Committee of the Whole by a vote of 96 to 49, and the House, on July 14, 1867, by a vote of 113 to 43:

"Whereas the President of the United States, on the 30th of March, 1867, entered into a treaty with the Emperor of Russia, by the terms of which it was stipulated that in consideration of the cession by the Emperor of Russia to the United States of certain territory therein described, the United States would pay to the Emperor of Russia the sum of $7,200,000 in coin; and

"Whereas it was further stipulated in said treaty that the United States shall accept of such cession, and that certain inhabitants of said territory shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights and immunities of citizens of the United States; and

"Whereas the subjects thus embraced in the stipulations of said treaty are among the subjects which by the Constitution of the United States are submitted to the power of Congress, and over which Congress has jurisdiction; and it being for such reason necessary that the consent of Congress shall be given to the said treaty before the same shall have full force and effect, having taken into consideration the said treaty, and approving of the stipulations therein, to the end that the same may be carried into effect: Therefore,

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the assent of Congress is hereby given to the stipulations of said treaty."

The Senate, on July 17, restored the bill to its original shape, in this way rejecting the distinctive position of the House that the consent of Congress as a legislative body is necessary to the payment of money and the incorporation of territory, when provided for in a treaty. This conflict of opinion between the two Houses led to the two bills being sent to a conference committee, the Senatorial members of which insisted that the House was absolutely bound to carry out the stipulations of a treaty which was duly ratified by the Senate. (See Congressional Globe for 1867, 4081, 4159, 4392.) The committee, however, finally united on the following measure:

"An act making an appropriation of money to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867.

"Whereas the President of the United States, on the 30th of March, 1867, entered into a treaty with the Emperor of Russia, by the terms of which it was stipulated that in consideration of the cession by the Emperor of Russia to the United States of certain territory therein described, the United States should pay to the Emperor of Russia the sum of $7,200,000 in coin; and

"Whereas it was further stipulated in said treaty that the United States shall accept of such cession and that certain inhabitants of said territory shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights and immunities of citizens of the United States; and

"Whereas said stipulations can not be carried into full force and effect except by legislation to which the consent of both Houses of Congress is necessary: Therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $7,200,000 in coin, to fulfill stipulations contained in the sixth article of the treaty with Russia concluded at Washington on the 30th day of March, 1867."

Mr. President, not only is the case of Alaska not a case to bear out the statement of the Senator from Nevada, but that case cuts down and curtails the power of the legislature to the mere enactment of a bill to pay the money stipulated to be paid in a treaty for the acquisition of territory. The Senate declined, after a long debate, to incorporate a provision setting forth the right of the House of Representatives to consent to the appropriation of money and the incorporation of the territory as being necessary to a consummation of the treaty. It finally wound up by the passage of a bill to pay the money. The Senate made the fight and triumphed. The contention of the House was that its consent was necessary to the treaty in order that the territory be incorporated into the United States. That contention was destroyed, and the treaty was ratified exactly as it was negotiated.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question on that point?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. If the Congress had refused to make the appropriation or to take any action whatever—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PETTUS in the chair). The Senator from Nevada neglected to comply with the parliamentary form of first addressing the Chair.

Mr. STEWART. I thought I had. I will now. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana allow me?

Mr. CAFFERY. I yield to the Senator with great pleasure.

Mr. STEWART. I have gone through the forms now, I believe. I will put this question to the Senator: Suppose Congress had refused to take any action, to make any appropriation to pay for Alaska, or to pass laws with regard to it, or to authorize the taking possession of it; would we have had Alaska?

Mr. CAFFERY. Why, Mr. President, I am astonished at the Senator from Nevada asking me such a question. Of course we would not have had possession of it; but the greater fact would have stood out that the House of Representatives of the United States had violated its constitutional oath in not sanctioning a constitutional treaty which had been ratified within the limits of the Constitution, and the Congress of the United States would have set an example to the people of the United States of a most flagrant disregard of their duty.

Mr. STEWART. That was not the question I asked; but if they had disregarded—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada must observe the rules.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana allow me?

Mr. CAFFERY. With great pleasure.

Mr. STEWART. I suggest to the Senator that he is not answering the question I asked. I asked if we would have had the Territory of Alaska if Congress had taken no action?

Mr. CAFFERY. Clearly not. And if this Congress, composed of the Senate and the House of Representatives, sits down here day after day and wastes time, without performing its ordinary acts of legislation, without passing bills appropriating the necessary amounts to carry on the Government, or without doing its constitutional duty as required, why, sir, the Republic itself would dissolve. The Senator has asked me a question, which has been propounded long ago, whether there was any power to compel the President to execute laws except that of impeachment, or to compel the Congress to enact laws except the wrath and vengeance of the constituents of Congress. It is a moral duty. There is a higher sanction attached to the performance of our duty than any power to coerce us before a court and stand in judgment for violated duty.

It is that moral sanction, Mr. President, that keeps this country alive, that keeps the Constitution quick, that controls and puts in motion and keeps in motion the vast and complicated machinery of this Republic. There is no reply to a question as to what may happen when members of the Senate and members of the House of Representatives violate their duty. It shows a decadence of public spirit; it shows a want of appreciation of our republican institutions that either fits us for anarchy or for empire.

Whenever the Supreme Court of the land decides a question in a number of decisions, in the form of stare decisis, I always bow my head with deference to those decisions. I believe that the last arbiter of interpretation of the Constitution and the laws made under it is the Supreme Court of the United States. Whenever, by a bare majority, a political question has been determined one way or the other, and there are grave constitutional doubts as to the correctness of the decision of the legislative branch, I feel myself perfectly free to dispute its validity and correctness.

In the case of the admission of Texas as a State the majority was only 2. It was conceded and is now conceded that the question of the admission of Texas as a State by a joint resolution was decided in the affirmative on account of the desire of the Democratic party, the slave-holding party at that period, to incorporate into the Union more slave territory. Under the conditions under which Texas was admitted, considering the height and intensity of feeling growing out of the slave issue, I hardly believe that the vote in Congress admitting the State is entitled to that consideration to which an isolated judgment of the Supreme Court is entitled.

I believe that the article of the Constitution providing that Congress can admit new States, although there is no qualification in the language, although there are no conditions to it, relates to the territory surrendered to the old confederation by certain States belonging to that confederation—Virginia, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and I believe New York. I believe that the Constitution, so far as that article is concerned, and I believe it would be a safe rule to adopt in all cases, must be construed with reference to the facts and circumstances surrounding the period of the formation of that instrument.

The Constitution of the United States was made for the United States. I do not believe that it is a rash assertion to say that the framers of our Constitution had not the slightest idea of ever incorporating foreign territory under the article authorizing Congress to admit new States. I believe that the States referred to were to be carved out of the territory ceded to the old Confederation by the old States. That cession was made for the identical purpose, the exclusive purpose of States being carved out of the territory to be incorporated into the Union of States.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him.

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The draftsman of that article was Gouverneur Morris, and he stated in his letters that he expected that under it we might admit territory like Canada and Louisiana and govern them as provinces. I will give the Senator the reference if he will wait a moment.

Mr. CAFFERY. I will be much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Louisiana, while he is waiting, that the State of Mississippi, perhaps not all of it, but I think so, was ceded to the Government of the United States after the adoption of the Constitution. That is my recollection. I do not think I can be mistaken. That was included in a State.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Randall's Life of Jefferson, volume 3, contains a reference to this matter, in a note on page 79, as follows:

A spark of light falls on the constitutional question in a letter from Gouverneur Morris (the draftsman of the Constitution), in a letter to Henry W. Livingston, December 4, 1803—

Then he copies from Morris's letter, as follows:

I always thought that when we should acquire Canada and Louisiana it would be proper to govern them as provinces and allow them no voice in our councils. In wording the third section of the fourth article I went as far as circumstances would permit to establish the exclusion.

Then he says:

Candor obliges me to add my belief that, had it been more pointedly expressed, a strong opposition would have been made.

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me to look at the volume? [After examining.] I can not gather from the language of Gouverneur Morris any other conclusion than that in his opinion the third article of the Constitution did not warrant the acquisition of Canada or Louisiana or any other territory than the territory we already had as States. He went as far as he could in "exclusion." He intended to exclude even territory coterminous, as Canada and Louisiana, from admission as States, being willing only to hold them as provinces.

The Northwestern Territory adjoined the old States. It had been largely settled by our people. In Tennessee, the State of Franklin had been roughly constructed by hardy pioneers. There was no danger to our institutions in admitting States to be made by Americans out of the ceded territory, a country inhabited by our own kith and kind and blood, a country coterminous, a country right at our doors, a country which we held as a Territory and could admit as a State.

But the "new States" spoken of in the Constitution, in my opinion, relate to such States as were to be carved out of territories which had already been given to us, and which we knew would be peopled by inhabitants imbued with the same spirit of liberty as the original thirteen colonies from whom they sprung. It could never have been the intention of the framers of the Constitution to give Congress power to grasp territory beyond the sea, or admit territory inhabited by people not homogeneous under the power to admit new States.

Mr. President, where is the limit to admitting States with any kind of institutions, under the extended authority contended for—to incorporate any State, situated anywhere, with institutions of any kind they may choose to adopt? Is there any limit to it?

A State is a political entity governed according to its own polity. There is no qualification or restriction in the new doctrine as to whether or not the State shall be republican in form of government. We may live to see the day when a triumphant majority, impressed with ideas of military aggression, will seek to incorporate into the United States a State under a monarchical form of government. I believe the Constitution never contemplated the acquisition of any State as a State other than the States to be carved out of the territory ceded to us under the original cessions to the old United States or States, formed out of territory to be acquired.

Our States and Territories have been expanded by conquest and by purchase until they are washed on the one side by the ocean that roars and on the other by the ocean that sleeps.

The northern frontier is the Great Lakes, the southern the Great Gulf. Are we, in our earth hunger, in this insensate greed for additional territory, to stretch the Constitution till it cracks when we have got this magnificent domain to develop, this splendid region to gladden with American institutions and to prosper with American industry? We are invited to take these islands of the sea, 2,100 miles from our frontier, inhabited by the most degraded of the Asiatic population, by an effete native race now fast disappearing, all under the doubtful authority of a joint resolution to admit "new States."

Mr. President, the gentlemen do not even comply with the precedent they cite. They abolish Hawaii's statehood by the act by which they seek to acquire Hawaii. The State of Texas came in full panopied, with every institution of a republican form; with her executive, legislative, and judicial departments modeled precisely after ours. It was a continuation of her statehood. All she had to do was to acknowledge the suzerainty of the United States, and she did it. She retained all of her statehood save what was necessary to be delegated to the United States for purposes of general government.

The precedent of Texas is cited to sustain the acquiring as territory of a volcanic-formed island in mid-ocean, peopled with a heterogeneous mass of Asiatics, Portuguese, Kanakas, and adventurers of every description. There is no parallel between the case of Texas and the case of Hawaii. There is no analogy whatever. Texas was a State. It was the closeness of that State to us, it was the character and kind of its population, it was the heroic fight which they had made for liberty, that caused us for a moment to lose sight of this article of the Constitution which, in my opinion, did not apply to any other than the territory originally ceded under the different acts from 1780 up to the formation of the Constitution or to territory acquired afterwards by treaty.

Texas could not have made a better constitution if she had been admitted as a Territory and then allowed to frame one. They were our people; and what man is there so rash as to claim the two or three thousand American citizens in the Islands of Hawaii as being such a class of people, imbued with such ideas of liberty, having such republican institutions as the State of Texas had?

Mr. President, something has been said about Mr. Jefferson's ideas. Mr. Jefferson, in the acquisition of the Louisiana Territory, thought he had transcended the Constitution. He was so strict in his construction of that instrument that he did not perceive that the natural and irresistible implication of the treaty-making power was that that power could embrace everything within the legitimate scope of treaty making. But he insisted on having territory through which the great Mississippi River flowed.

The evident need of that vast expanse of territory to the United States convinced him, as strict a constitutional constructionist as he was, that the time had come for the United States to break through the barrier of the Constitution, from violent, vital, overwhelming necessity, and take this country, without which he saw the United States could not expand to the glory and the grandness which was hers by right. But he became convinced in after years that his position was entirely correct; that under the treaty-making power he had the right to acquire Louisiana. I will read a letter from Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Nicholas, which I find in the Congressional Globe of 1844-45, page 281:

I am aware of the force of the observations you make on the power given by the Constitution to Congress to admit new States into the Union without restraining the subject to the territory then constituting the United States.

It appears that Mr. Nicholas had given a broad construction to this phrase of the Constitution, that it was without any limitation or qualification, allowing the admission of new States, but surely to be made out of territory acquired as Louisiana was—by treaty.

But when I consider that the limits of the United States are precisely fixed by the treaty of 1783—that the Constitution expressly declares itself to be made for the United States—I can not help believing the intention was not to permit Congress to admit into the Union new States which should not be formed out of the territory for which, and under whose authority alone, they were then acting. I do not believe it was meant that they might receive England, Ireland, Holland, etc., into it, which would be the case on your construction.

The construction that Mr. Jefferson placed upon this third section of the Constitution, which I have quoted, was that the creation of new States was limited to the then territory belonging to the United States. That did not at all impinge upon the idea that we might acquire foreign territory other than the territory possessed at that period and in due time carve that territory into new States.

Mr. FAULKNER. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. CAFFERY. Eighteen hundred and three. The letter was written at the date of the purchase of Louisiana. It was contemporaneous with the treaty between France and the United States. Here is Mr. Jefferson's construction of section 3 of the article of the Constitution. I do not agree with him in the proposition that we can not acquire territory and make States out of it, but I do agree with him in the contention that so far as the admission of States is concerned, mentioned in the Constitution as States, the Constitution limits the power of Congress in that regard to new States made by themselves, by automatic movement, out of the Territories belonging to us, coterminous with us, inhabited by our blood and our bone and our flesh.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Senator from Louisiana if it will be entirely convenient to him to yield to a motion for an executive session?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

THE HUBBARD COLLECTION OF ENGRAVINGS.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to call up the joint resolution (S. R. 139) authorizing the Librarian of Congress to accept the collection of engravings proposed to be donated to the Library of Congress by Mrs. Gertrude M. Hubbard.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. HOAR. It has already been read. I move what I send to the desk as an amendment to the resolution.

The SECRETARY. After the word "stated," in line 7, it is proposed to insert:

Except that instead of naming the gallery in the Library as therein proposed, the collection shall be known and styled as the Gardiner Green Hubbard Collection, it not being, in the opinion of Congress, desirable to call parts of the public buildings after the names of individual citizens, and that the bust therein named be accepted and kept in a suitable place, to be designated by the Joint Committee on the Library.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. As I remember the circumstances, a motion to recommit the joint resolution was pending when it was last under consideration. I am authorized by the mover of that motion to ask that it be treated as withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PETTUS in the chair). The motion to recommit is withdrawn.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Minnesota if he will not yield to me that I may at this time have the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill considered.

Mr. DAVIS. I withdraw the motion for an executive session, and yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6896) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the conference report is before the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The report has been read, I believe.

Mr. ALLISON. The report has been read.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I hope the Senator from Iowa will consent that the report may be rejected and that the matter may go back to the committee for further conference.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that the Senator from Arkansas and other Senators object to one particular feature of this report. I should be glad, in justice to the conferees, that there should be a brief statement made respecting it, and I should like to make a brief statement. I do not care to occupy a great deal of time in debate.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. So far as I am concerned, the chief objection I have to the conference report is the provision allowing Indian tribes to lease mineral rights. There are other objections, I understand, but this is the objection I chiefly have to the bill and on which I hope the report will be rejected. However, I do not want it understood that there are no other objections. Of course I do not consent that that is the single objection there is to the bill. I do not care to take the time of the Senate in discussion in order to show the reasons for it. I believe that the amendment as it comes from the conference committee is open to a point of order. The House having provided nothing whatever on the subject of these leases and the Senate having provided that there should be no leases whatever, the conference committee had no right to come in and report a provision for leases which had not been voted for by the House and which had been voted against by the Senate.

I do not care to argue the question. This, in a single word, is the objection I have to the conference report. It is very objectionable in many ways on this particular point. Other Senators object to the conference report on other points, but this is the particular feature on which I object to it and on account of which I hope the Senator from Iowa will agree that the report may be rejected and sent back to conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas make a point of order?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not make a point of order. I simply stated that I believe a point of order would lie against it. If the order can not be made practically by general consent, I will make the point of order as well as present the other objections I have to that provision of the conference report.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Arkansas will see how difficult it is for us to reject this report, which embraces every item in the Indian appropriation bill in dispute between the two Houses, stating that he desires to have this action taken on account of a single item in the report. If that were the only item in the bill that is to be the subject of debate, the conferees on the bill would know the judgment and sense of the Senate respecting the report. But if the Senate should reject the report without knowing the grounds upon which it is to be rejected, there would be no special guide to the conferees in any future adjustment.

As to the particular matter to which the Senator objects and to which he indicates his desire to raise a point of order as to the report, I think, in justice to the conferees, it ought to be understood by the Senate that in securing the amendment which is embodied in the conference report the conferees believed that they were acting in the spirit of the amendment made by the Senate and they were securing valuable concessions from the House in the spirit of that amendment. We were confronted with a provision in the House bill which did authorize, under certain circumstances and conditions, the leasing of mineral lands.

It is true that the House provision applied only to mineral lands owned by allottees and a certain class of allottees. The Senate inserted in the bill an amendment which provided that hereafter it should not be lawful for Indian tribes or individual Indians to lease Indian lands. To this the House conferees objected, on the ground that our amendment changed existing statutes; that under existing law a certain class of Indian lands were authorized to be leased, and that under our amendment that prohibition was taken away.

It is useless to disguise the fact that the dispute on this subject relates chiefly to lands upon what is known as the Uintah Reservation, and the objection lies to the contest that is being made respecting those lands supposed to contain minerals valuable in commerce. The conferees on the part of the House said to us that they were willing the law should stand as it is now and that they objected to our changing existing law. Thereupon we endeavored, as far as we could, to so modify existing law as to protect, as we believe, the interest of the Indians upon the Uintah Reservation.

Those who are more familiar than I, or perhaps more familiar than any member of the conference committee, criticize our report because they say it does not protect the Indians upon the Uintah Reservation as does the existing law. If that be true, then the purpose and aim of your conferees in regard to this particular matter fail to do what we desired to do as respects these Indians. Although I have consulted with Senators who are specially interested in this matter, I can not be convinced but that the provision which we have inserted in the bill is a wiser and better provision for the protection of the Indian tribes occupying the Uintah Reservation than the existing law. If the House of Representatives shall persist in saying that they prefer the existing law to any law we propose, in the end, of course, this matter will be obliged to fall.

I do not know what can be done with the House. We never know what can be done in a conference with it until we make an effort. I should be willing to go very far in dealing with this question, if it is a question to be dealt with; but we have spent a great many weeks and a great deal of time in securing a final adjustment of Indian matters in the bill, and if we shall now reject the report without knowing the exact grounds upon which it is to be rejected, it seems to me that the conferees will be left largely in the dark as respects the ground of that rejection.

So, Mr. President, I am willing to submit this question to the Senate without changing my mind, as I have not, as respects the wisdom of this provision compared with existing law in protecting and caring for the interests of these Indians. I think it is fair to the conferees that we should know practically the ground upon which the action is to be taken.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, I make the point of order against this proposed amendment, and I wish to state the facts. The provision as it came from the House was as follows:

Provided, That hereafter, whenever it shall be made to appear to the Secretary of the Interior that by reason of age or disability any allottee of Indian lands under this or former acts of Congress can not personally and with benefit to himself occupy or improve his allotment or any part thereof, the same may be leased, in the discretion of the Secretary, for the benefit of such allottee, upon such terms, regulations, and conditions as shall be prescribed by him, for a term not exceeding five years for farming or grazing purposes, or ten years for mining or business purposes.

That provision was stricken out by the Senate and the following provision was inserted:

Provided—

Mr. HOAR. May I interrupt the Senator from Arkansas one moment?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I do it in the interest of the comfort of the Senate at this hour of a very hot afternoon. I wish to know if I correctly understood the Senator from Iowa as practically—not, perhaps, in so many words—assenting that the Senate might disagree to the report and send it back into conference. If that be true, would it not be well to let that be done and let the point of order be postponed?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is exactly what I proposed in the beginning, but I understood the Senator from Iowa to take ground squarely against that proposition.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Senator from Iowa rather assented to it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I did not so understand the Senator from Iowa. The Senator from Massachusetts knows him better than I do. If the Senator from Massachusetts understood him correctly, I will withdraw the suggestion and allow that course to be taken.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Senator from Iowa, stating his individual view to the contrary, made a speech implying that he rather supposed the Senate would take that course.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I did not so understand him.

Mr. HOAR. If that were true, it would save all this time; that is all.

Mr. ALLISON. I am much obliged to the Senator from Massachusetts for suggesting an interpretation of my observation. I am quite willing, if the report is to be rejected, that it shall be rejected on the grounds stated. The Senator will see that in a long report of many pages, covering a great many items, if this is the matter of difficulty we can perhaps easily see whether it can be composed more in accord with the judgment of the Senate and whether the result of it will more nearly protect what the Senate desires to protect. But I did not want to go back with the report rejected upon one item and then have somebody else come in and propose to reject it upon another ground, and thus form an endless circle as respects this important bill three days before the close of the fiscal year. That is the point I make.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas to reserve his point of order for a moment that we may have an understanding upon the subject.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I withdraw it, Mr. President.

Mr. HOAR. Let the question be taken now on a disagreement to the report.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I did not understand the position of the Senator from Iowa as the Senator from Massachusetts did. Of course it is perfectly satisfactory to me if the report be rejected on this ground. It is the only ground of objection I have to it.

Mr. TELLER. The report ought to be rejected, and we ought to see if we can not get it in better condition than it is now. It is in no possible shape for passage as it is. There may be a chance to get it in better shape.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report. [Putting the question.] The report is apparently rejected. It is rejected.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I wish to say in this connection to the Senator from Iowa that I do not want him to misunderstand my position. I object to this report because the Senate has receded from the amendment providing for free homes on the public domain, and I shall resist the adoption of any report which does not retain that provision. I meant to have made this statement if I could have caught the eye of the Chair before action upon the conference report.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the Senator has made his statement in time. As I understand, the report is now rejected. Therefore, I move that the Senate still further insist upon its amendments to the bill which have been disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask for a further conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. ALLISON, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

BENJAMIN S. BARNES.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 339.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator state the Calendar number?

Mr. HOAR. I think the bill has been referred to the Committee on Claims, but I have the assent of the chairman of that committee and of such members as were to be found upon the floor to make the request I have made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that the first motion should be to discharge the Committee on Claims from the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I make that motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 369) for the relief of Benjamin S. Barnes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. Now I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I rise to ask the Senator from Massachusetts for a word of explanation about this bill.

Mr. HOAR. This bill was before the Committee on Claims just before the omnibus claims bill passed. The chairman of that committee investigated it with other members of the committee. They at first thought they would put it on the omnibus claims bill, but they at last concluded that, it never having passed the Senate, it would not come within their rule. It provides for paying a very small sum to a very old man.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Has the bill been favorably reported from the Committee on Claims?

Mr. HOAR. I have stated the facts about it. It was reported favorably by the House Committee on Claims and came to the Senate.

The beneficiary is an old farmer in Boxford, Mass. The United States volunteer troops occupied his farm in the war of the rebellion, cut off trees, took down some of the stone walls, used them for purposes of their structures, and otherwise injured his farm. Thereupon the War Department and he agreed to submit the amount of his damage to the county commissioners of that county—which is a highly respectable tribunal in our part of the world, having charge of all county matters—and there were added to them two army officers. The county commissioners and the army officers agreed to $1,200 as the amount of the damage. The old gentleman is a very simple-hearted old fellow, and he has been writing ever since to the Department to send him the money. On application to the Treasury officials by Mr. MOODY, my colleague in the other House, a letter was written by the Department, saying that the claim is just and that it ought to be paid, but that they have no authority to make the payment.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Who wrote the letter?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will find it stated in the report of the House committee. It was written by one of the officials of the Treasury Department.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not want to delay the bill, but I rather thought from what I heard of it that it did not come within the rule always adopted as to the payment of such claims.

Mr. HOAR. It comes within the rule always adopted.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I am satisfied if the Senator makes that statement, and I make no further objection to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GULF, CHICKASAW AND KANSAS RAILWAY.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4757) to grant the right of way through the Indian Territory to the Gulf, Chickasaw and Kansas Railway Company for the purpose of constructing a railway, and for other purposes, which was favorably reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs. The company desires to enter upon the work of construction at an early day, and I hope the bill will be passed at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DAVIS. If the bill does not lead to debate, I shall not object.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am satisfied it will not lead to debate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments. The first amendment was, on page 8, section 6, line 5, after the word "lines," to strike out "in the Territory;" in the same line, after the word "through," to strike out "the" and insert "said;" in line 12, after the word "that," to strike out "when;" and in the same line, after the word "showing," to strike out:

Any portion of said railway's located line is filed as herein provided for, said company shall commence grading said located line within six months thereafter or said location shall be void; and said location shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior in sections of 35 miles before the construction of any such section shall be begun.

And insert:

The entire line of the road in the Indian Territory shall be filed and approved before the work of construction shall commence.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. That said company shall cause maps showing the route of its located lines and through said Territory to be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and also to be filed in the office of the principal chiefs of each of the nations or tribes through whose lands said railway may be located; and after the filing of said maps no claim for a subsequent settlement and improvement upon the right of way shown by said maps shall be valid as against said company: Provided, That a map showing the entire line of the road in the Indian Territory shall be filed and approved before the work of construction shall commence.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 10, on page 10, after the word "its," to strike out "corporate property;" in the same line, after the word "railway," to strike out "and" and insert "with its;" and in line 2, after the word "franchises," to strike out the comma and insert "that may be constructed;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 10. That all mortgages executed by such company conveying any portion of its railway, with its franchises that may be constructed in said Indian Territory, shall be recorded in the Department of the Interior, and the record thereof shall be notice and evidence of their execution, and shall convey all the rights, properties, and franchises of such company as therein expressed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 23, 1898, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 27, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8428) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes, and had further insisted upon its amendments numbered 13, 14, 186, 221, 232, and 233, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; had agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. GORMAN as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 6997) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; had disagreed to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 74, had receded from its amendments numbered 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, and 128, had agreed to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. CULLOM, and Mr. COCKRELL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1035) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 153) for the relief of Verona E. Pollock, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ALLEN, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. MARTIN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3596) to ratify the agreement between the Dawes Commission and the Seminole Nation of Indians.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 4810. An act to increase the efficiency of the Subsistence Department of the Army;

S. 4809. An act to increase the efficiency of the Quartermaster's Department of the Army;

S. 4808. An act authorizing the President to appoint additional cadets at large at the United States Naval Academy;

S. 4786. An act for the relief of Cassius G. Foster;

S. 4779. An act granting an increase of pension to Hannah G. Strong;

S. 4742. An act providing for the appointment of a military secretary to the Secretary of War; and

S. 4713. An act relative to the Corps of Engineers of the Army.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 3697) for the relief of Martha E. Fleschert.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On June 21, 1898:

H. R. 8226. An act to make certain grants of land to the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 9554. An act granting certain lands to the city of Santa Barbara, Cal.

On June 22, 1898:

H. R. 6209. An act to pension William Stephenson;

H. R. 1801. An act granting an increase of pension to Catherine Clifford; and

H. R. 5006. An act to increase the pension of Edward Starr.

On June 24, 1898:

H. R. 8541. An act to define the rights of purchasers of the Belt Railway, and for other purposes.

On June 25, 1898:

H. R. 9856. An act for the relief of Anna Merkel.

On June 27, 1898:

H. R. 6148. An act to amend the charter of the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company of the District of Columbia, the Maryland and Washington Railway Company, and for other purposes.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 4808. An act authorizing the President to appoint additional cadets at large at the United States Naval Academy—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

S. 4773. An act granting an increase of pension to Hannah G. Strong—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 4786. An act for the relief of Cassius G. Foster—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

GAINESVILLE, McALESTER AND ST. LOUIS RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a Senate bill which is at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a Senate bill which will be reported to the House.

The bill (S. 3707) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act to grant to the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory" was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WISE. I object.

Mr. DALZELL. Has a similar House bill been reported?

Mr. BAILEY. A similar House bill has been reported.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman will withhold his objection until I can make a statement, I think he will not object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia objected.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman from Virginia consent to withhold his objection until I can make a statement?

Mr. WISE. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The objection is withdrawn.

Mr. BAILEY. I think if the gentleman will hear me a moment he will not object. This Senate bill is identical with a bill which was introduced by me in the House, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and unanimously reported. It amends the existing law to this extent: It allows the railroad company to begin construction upon filing a map of definite location for a shorter distance than is now required.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I have called up a bill on two different occasions, a bill which has passed the Senate and recommended by two Democrats of this House. The bill was prepared by a Democrat at the request of two Democrats. I called it up as a favor to them, but it was objected to on that side after my making this explanation, and I shall object to the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WISE. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] to say that because somebody on this side objected a day or two ago to a bill of his, he intended to object to all requests on this side. While I do not believe in the doctrine of reprisals, if it is to be applied to either side, it must be applied without discrimination to both sides, and I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. PITNEY. I trust the gentleman from Texas will withdraw that request for a moment. I have a matter of public importance which I wish to have considered. I am not responsible for the objection to the gentleman's bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Go to the gentleman upon your own side. I am entirely willing to withdraw it; but if it is to be brought to a question of reprisals, it must be upon both sides.

Mr. PITNEY. If the gentleman will allow me, it will not come to a question of reprisals unless the gentleman himself indulges in the practice. I have had nothing whatever to do with the objection to his bill.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand that perfectly, and I did not object to the gentleman's bill. I simply demanded the regular order, so as not to make any discrimination among the members. That is all.

Mr. PITNEY. I have a resolution of public importance which ought to be acted upon at once. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the objection.

EXTENSION OF ELEVENTH STREET NW.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin, chairman of the District Committee.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, on the last District day, when the House adjourned, it was dividing upon the passage of the bill (H. R. 10474) for the extension of Eleventh street NW.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10474) for the extension of Eleventh street NW.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PREVENTION OF SMOKE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5887) for the prevention of smoke in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after January 1, 1899, the emission of dense or thick black or gray smoke from any smokestack or chimney used in connection with any stationary engine, steam boiler, or furnace of any description within the District of Columbia shall be deemed, and is hereby declared, to be a public nuisance: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed as applied to chimneys of buildings used exclusively for private residences.

SEC. 2. That the owner, agent, lessee, and occupant of any building, or any person or persons having charge or control of any stationary steam boiler, engine, or furnace of any description, from the smokestack or chimney of which there shall issue or be emitted thick or dense black or gray smoke within the District of Columbia on or after the day above named shall be deemed and held guilty of creating a public nuisance and of violating the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. That any person or persons violating the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction thereof before the police court of the District of Columbia, be punished by a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $100 for each and every offense; and each and every day wherein the provisions of this act shall be violated shall constitute a separate offense.

SEC. 4. That in order to provide for the enforcement of the provisions of this act there shall be detailed from time to time by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia an inspector or inspectors of the health department of the District of Columbia, whose duty it shall be, under the supervision of the health officer of the District of Columbia, to cause to be prosecuted all persons violating the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. That no discrimination shall be made against any method or device which may be used for the prevention of smoke and which accomplishes the purpose of this act.

SEC. 6. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on the District of Columbia, were read:

Page 1, section 1, lines 3 and 4, strike out the word "from" where it appears after the word "that" and insert in lieu thereof the word "on," in line 3, and strike out after the word "after" the following, in lines 3 and 4: "January 1, 1899," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "six months from the passage of this act."

Page 1, section 2, line 1, strike out the word "and" and insert in lieu thereof the word "or."

Page 1, section 2, lines 2 and 3, strike out the following: "or any person or persons having charge or control of any stationary steam boiler, engine, or furnace."

Also strike out the comma where it appears after the word "building," in line 2.

Mr. BABCOCK. I call for a vote on the amendments.

Mr. DALZELL. I do not understand why there should be an exception made in the case of private dwellings. The nuisance is just as bad from private dwellings as from anything else, as I happen to know by experience.

Mr. BABCOCK. I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CURTIS], who will explain the bill.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, a draft of this bill was presented by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia early in the present session. Its enactment into law is not only urged by the Commissioners, but by a large number of prominent property holders and residents of the District of Columbia.

Many letters were placed on file with the committee, a number of which are incorporated in the report. The committee, not feeling entirely sure that such legislation was required in the District, caused to be sent out a large number of letters with a request for copies of ordinances in force in the larger cities of the country. From a majority of these prompt responses were received, and all except the cities of Philadelphia and Louisville had in force ordinances of practically the same character as the bill which we here present. This bill is almost an exact copy of the ordinance in force in the cities of Minneapolis, Minn., and Indianapolis, Ind. In these, as well as in all of the ordinances, copies of which were received by your committee, private buildings are excepted.

Your committee were of the opinion, as were also the Commissioners, that if private buildings were not excepted, a hardship might result to many poor people of the District, and that if the smoke nuisance could be abated as it applied to public buildings, hotels, and manufacturing establishments, all would be accomplished that could be accomplished at this time.

Mr. DALZELL. The bill, I suppose, covers hotels?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Oh, yes. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote. The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to. The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN FARMERS.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution H. Res. 136.

The Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 136) for the relief of farmers, gardeners, and truckmen selling produce of their own raising on the south side of B street, between Seventh and Thirteenth streets, in the city of Washington, D. C.

Resolved, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to lay off and mark in convenient spaces the sidewalk on the south side of B street north, between Seventh and Thirteenth streets west, in the city of Washington, and the sidewalk on the north side of said B street north, between Tenth and Twelfth streets west, which spaces, with the abutting 15 feet of the carriage ways of the street, may be used for the sale of country produce.

SEC. 2. That said Commissioners be, and they are hereby, authorized to assign said spaces to farmers, gardeners, or truckmen selling produce of their own raising: Provided, That a clear passageway, not less than 4 feet wide, for pedestrians shall be left on the said sidewalk.

SEC. 3. That no charge, license fee, or assessment of any kind, except 10 cents for single teams or 15 cents for double teams for the occupancy of a space on a market day and the evening previous thereto, shall be levied by said Commissioners upon any farmer or producer of vegetables bringing the same to market for occupying a space with or without horses and wagons or carts used in bringing such vegetables or provisions to the market.

SEC. 4. That said Commissioners are hereby authorized to appoint such watchmen as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of this act, at a salary not exceeding $45 per month, payable monthly, whose duty it shall be to collect the charges herein provided for, to keep said spaces clean and in a sanitary condition, and to watch and protect the contents of the wagons belonging to the above-mentioned farmers; and that the charges collected under the provisions of this act shall be applied for the payment of the salary of said watchmen and to defray the cost of keeping said spaces clean.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill—

Mr. MUDD. I suggest that the Clerk read the report.

Mr. DOCKERY. Very well; I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for the reading of the report of the committee, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to me for a moment until I make a report from the Committee on Rules?

Mr. BABCOCK. If the gentleman will wait for a moment until we can get through with the reading of this report.

The report (by Mr. MUDD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 136) for the relief of farmers, gardeners, and truckmen selling produce of their own raising on the south side of B street, between Seventh and Thirteenth streets, in the city of Washington, D. C., after careful consideration of the subject, report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

This bill was prepared in the office of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and introduced at their request. The Commissioners urge the early passage of this legislation, and a copy of their communication in reference to the same is made a part of this report.

OFFICE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Washington, January 26, 1898.

DEAR SIR: The Commissioners have the honor to recommend the introduction and favorable action upon the inclosed draft of a joint resolution for the relief of farmers, gardeners, and truckmen selling produce of their own raising on the south side of B street, between Seventh and Thirteenth streets, in the city of Washington, D. C.

Last spring, when an effort was made to regulate the care and control of the farmers engaged in business on the south side of B street, it was found that the Commissioners had no jurisdiction over them, and this bill is intended to give the Commissioners the same control over the south side of B street from Seventh to Thirteenth that the law gives them over the north side of B street between Tenth and Twelfth streets. The receipts from the charges provided for in the bill will be sufficient to cover all expenses for watchmen, etc.

Very respectfully,

JOHN W. ROSS,

President Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia.

Hon. J. W. BABCOCK,

Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand from a statement made to me by the chairman of the committee in private that this joint resolution does not involve any charge on the Treasury and that the proceeds of the collections made under the resolution will be devoted solely to the payment of the salaries of the watchmen authorized, and that the Treasury will not be liable beyond that amount.

Mr. BABCOCK. That is as I understand it.

Mr. DOCKERY. It seems to me that the language is a little ambiguous, somewhat hazy, and I desired the statement of the chairman of the committee to that effect.

Mr. BABCOCK. Well, Mr. Speaker, the bill clearly states—

That the charges collected under the provisions of this act shall be applied for the payment of the watchmen and to defray the cost of keeping the spaces clean.

There is no authority to use any money and no authority to pay any watchman except as they are paid out of the charges collected. It is not the intention of the committee that there shall be any moneys spent.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand that, and I wanted to know whether the chairman of the committee had embodied his ideas clearly. It is a small matter, but you have left the matter of employment within the discretion of the Commissioners, and you have given authority to make the collections and to use the money for the payment of the watchmen, but whether or not there would be any liability on the Treasury is somewhat doubtful. But I have the assurance of the chairman of the committee that no liability will be made on the Treasury otherwise than the collections, and therefore I yield to his judgment.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

TWELFTH CENSUS.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, having had under consideration resolution No. 22, report the following as a substitute, with recommendation that it do pass:

Resolved, That there shall be a select committee on the Twelfth Census, to be appointed by the Speaker, to consist of thirteen members, to which shall be referred all proposed legislation concerning the Twelfth Census of the United States and the apportionment of representation in the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to ask a question about that. Is it anticipated that this committee will go on and report a bill to the House for its consideration at this session?

Mr. HENDERSON. I can not answer that question. The Senate has passed a bill on this subject; it is here, and no committee to refer it to. The Committee on Rules thought a committee ought to be appointed, so that they can take the bill and consider it, and we will have a body of men who will be able to advise the House on that subject.

Mr. CANNON. I think the appointment is apt, and this rule ought to be adopted, but I want to say, in that connection, that in my judgment the Senate bill is a good one, and I believe—

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to hear the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. I say in my judgment the Senate bill is a good one; it is a matter of importance, and I believe there ought to be legislation at this session of Congress.

Mr. BAILEY. Whether there ought to be legislation or not at this time, it is absolutely certain a committee ought to be appointed to which the bill should be referred.

Mr. HENDERSON. This is all that this bill does.

Mr. BAILEY. And that is all that this does.

Mr. CANNON. Does the committee have leave to report at any time?

Mr. BAILEY. No. This does not define the privileges of the committee; it merely authorizes the Speaker to appoint the committee, and then, if it should become necessary, by general rule or special rule, special rule, I take it, of the Committee on Rules, if they should desire to report at any time or to have other rights of consideration.

Mr. HENDERSON. There is no provision in the rule as to the powers of the committee; it stands as does any other committee of the House.

Mr. CANNON. If it is the intention under the rule as framed to result in no legislation at this session, I see no objection to the appointment of the committee at the next session, but I have nothing more to say, and no desire to say anything more. I have said all I care to in favor of early action.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will say that I have looked it up for the last four censuses, and I find that the last three had a select committee; the one before that went to the Judiciary Committee. I introduced this rule for the appointment of a select committee, as I think it is the better practice, and the Committee on Rules has agreed to it.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

FINETTA NALLE.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate bill 3144 for the relief of Finetta Nalle.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all the right, title, interest, and estate of the United States of America in and to all of original lots numbered from 2 to 4, both inclusive, and from 15 to 24, both inclusive, in square No. 1107, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, be, and the same are hereby, quit-claimed unto Finetta Nalle, her heirs and assigns, forever: Provided, That all the taxes and assessments due the District of Columbia levied against such lots shall first have been paid.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BABCOCK. I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, this bill quitclaims to the beneficiary the land described in the bill upon condition that all the taxes and assessments due the District levied against the lot shall first have been paid. The committee finds that all the taxes and assessments levied against the lot have been paid, and the reason Congress is asked to pass this bill grows out of the following facts: Something more than thirty years ago Thomas A. Gant acquired the title to the lot described in the bill, and entered into possession of the same and erected buildings thereon; and during all the time he was in possession he paid his taxes and all assessments made against the property. He died suddenly in 1896, leaving a daughter, Finetta Nalle. Now, it appears, unfortunately, that Gant was never married, and the property escheated to the United States because the law in the District so provides. The committee find no objection to the passage of the bill and recommend unanimously that the bill be passed as a simple act of justice. I ask for a vote on the bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. It has been suggested on the floor that a trifling amendment be offered in relation to the taxes—that all the taxes due and assessed—

Mr. JENKINS. We have examined that question, and there are no taxes or assessments against the property. That provision was put in as a precautionary matter, but they are all paid.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and being read a third time, it was passed.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MICHAEL McNULTY.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the Senate bill 4756, for the relief of Michael McNulty.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all real estate lying in the District of Columbia heretofore purchased by and conveyed to Michael McNulty, of said District, prior to the passage of this act, be relieved and exempted from the operation of an act entitled "An act to restrict the ownership of real estate in the Territories to American citizens," approved March 3, 1887; and all forfeitures incurred by force of said act are, in respect of such real estate, hereby remitted.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McRAE. I hope the gentleman will give some reason for the passage of this bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman named in the bill as the beneficiary came to this country when he was 5 years of age, and after he arrived at manhood he acquired the property described in the bill. He was uncertain whether his father ever became a naturalized citizen, and shortly after he purchased this property he sold it to a maiden lady here by the name of Rowell. He was uncertain, as I say, whether his father was a naturalized citizen, and in order to make the matter certain he applied for naturalization and was naturalized, but his naturalization did not take effect until after the sale of this property to Miss Rowell.

Now, if it was a fact that his father never was naturalized, the property escheated to the United States. Of course it is unfair, under the circumstances, to take advantage of the matter, and the United States attorney has never taken advantage on the part of the United States to acquire the title, because they dislike very much to enforce forfeitures of this kind. Now, this man McNulty went into the service of the United States and served during the war as a soldier, and there is no reason why the bill should not pass and this woman be protected in her property rights. As it stands now there is a cloud on the title. She paid for the property in good faith, and there never would have any question arisen if it had not been for the fact that McNulty applied for naturalization papers, and that called the attention of the officers to the fact that he was born abroad.

Mr. McRAE. Has he obtained his final papers?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes; I will say that he has taken out his papers and became on the 4th of November, 1892, a naturalized citizen of the United States. Miss Rowell is an American lady, born in this country, and has paid her money for this land in good faith, and there is no reason why the title should not be perfected.

Mr. McRAE. I do not want to see the law relating to alien ownership of lands abused. If the beneficiary has since become a naturalized citizen I have no objection to the bill, but I do insist that aliens coming into the District of Columbia shall abide by the consequences of that law. If they purchase and expect to hold property here they ought to first become American citizens. In this case I understand the gentleman to say that the present owner and her grantor are both citizens at this time.

Mr. JENKINS. This is a very just case, and it will be exceedingly hard upon this woman if this bill does not pass.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and accordingly it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF RHODE ISLAND AVENUE.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask the present consideration of the bill (S. 4571) to extend Rhode Island avenue.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to acquire by condemnation, according to chapter 11 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, for the opening of highways, the land necessary for the extension of Rhode Island avenue from Florida avenue to Le Droit avenue.

SEC. 2. That to pay the award of such condemnation $75,000, or so much of said sum as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, one-half of the said sum to be charged to the revenues of the District of Columbia.

The amendments were read, as follows:

In line 10 strike out the word "seventy-five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty."

In line 12 strike out the word "one-half" and insert in lieu thereof the word "all."

Mr. DOCKERY. I make the point of order that this bill must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BABCOCK. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. HEPBURN in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of Senate bill No. 4571.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask that the general debate on this bill be closed at half past 1 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. DOCKERY. I object at this time. We do not know what time will be necessary.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, if I can have the attention of the House for a few moments I will make a statement in reference to this matter.

Rhode Island avenue, near where it intersects Florida avenue, is obstructed by one block and the corner of another block—block 9, near Le Droit Park. This, I understand, is the only obstruction to Rhode Island avenue across the entire city. To open this avenue requires that 81,000 square feet of ground be condemned. The committee, after giving the matter due consideration, concur in the report of the Commissioners, but cut down the amount of the appropriation suggested from $75,000 to $50,000.

Mr. Chairman, this, in a nutshell, is about all there is to this bill. The measure proposed is one which is necessary and ought to be carried out. The question is whether the House desires to do it at this time.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DOCKERY rose.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have the report read in my time.

The report (by Mr. RICHARDSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia have considered H. R. bills Nos. 10893 and 10899, being bills to extend Rhode Island avenue, and make the following report:

The committee find that the Senate has considered and passed, on June 16, 1893, a bill, being Senate bill No. 4571, for the same object and purpose, which said bill has also been considered by the committee. The committee are of opinion that Rhode Island avenue should be opened and extended as provided in said bills. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have considered these bills and have submitted to this committee a favorable report thereon in a letter of June 7, instant, to the chairman of this committee. Said letter is in the following words:

OFFICE OF COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Washington, June 7, 1893.

DEAR SIR: The Commissioners have the honor to submit the following on H. R. bills 10893 and 10899, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, to extend Rhode Island avenue, referred to them by your committee for report:

Rhode Island avenue is now open from its western end to Le Droit Park, and from Fourth street NE. to the district line. The portion covered by this bill is the only part of the entire avenue which it is necessary to acquire to open the avenue through subdivided land. As this portion is over subdivided land, held in small parcels and by different owners, it is evident that they can not afford to dedicate, since to do so would amount practically to surrendering their property without receiving equivalent return.

Under these circumstances it would appear that condemnation proceedings offer the only means of acquiring the land for the opening of the street, and as it is an exceedingly important thoroughfare, a favorable recommendation is made on the bill.

The amount of land to be taken is 81,440 square feet. The value of land—estimated from recent sales as far as can be ascertained—is about $1 per foot, making the estimated cost for the necessary land $81,440.

A plat is inclosed herewith showing by red color the part of the avenue to be acquired.

Very respectfully, yours,

JOHN B. WIGHT,

President Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia.

Hon. J. W. BABCOCK,

Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia,

House of Representatives.

The committee report Senate bill 4571 with the recommendation that it do pass with the following amendments:

In line 10 strike out the word "seventy-five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty."

In line 12 strike out the word "one-half" and insert in lieu thereof the word "all."

Thus amended, the committee recommend that the Senate bill do pass, and that the House bill mentioned lie upon the table.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I can not say that I am at all surprised at the appearance of this bill. I do not assert that it is the purpose of the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia to dissipate the vanishing surplus in the District treasury; but the bill which he is urging upon the House tends to accomplish exactly that result. I do not question in a captious spirit the wisdom and propriety of his judgment. I do not desire to be understood as assailing the District Committee in any improper way; but I am going to stand here, if I stand alone, for the integrity of the District revenues.

Mr. MUDD. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he has been able to find out just where this street is to be opened up?

Mr. DOCKERY. I had that in mind, because a gentleman who owned the land up there came to me the other day and said he wanted the street opened. I do not remember his name.

Mr. MUDD. I take it for granted it is not in the southeast portion of the city or in the northeast.

Mr. DOCKERY. I think it is up in this direction somewhere [pointing northwardly].

Mr. BABCOCK. I will say for the information of the gentleman from Maryland that in a few moments there will be a large map here, from which the gentleman himself and others may be able to locate this improvement.

Mr. MUDD. I want to locate the chairman of the committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOCKERY. The shadow of coming events cast itself across my pathway a few days ago when one or two very worthy gentlemen appeared at my hotel and urged me to support this appropriation.

Mr. COWHERD. The gentleman has said that he wants to "maintain the integrity of the District revenues." I should like to know whether his objection to the bill would be any less if half of this money was to be appropriated out of the funds of the United States Government?

Mr. DOCKERY. My objection would be strengthened if it was proposed to take the money of my people.

Mr. COWHERD. If the gentleman preferred that arrangement, I thought we might accommodate him.

Mr. DOCKERY. Still, as one of the aldermen of this city, I want to stand up for the interests of the good people of the District as I understand them.

By the way, I made a mistake in my figures the other day when I stated $800,000 as the amount to be expended in the northwest on improvements. Instead of $800,000 I should have said $990,000. Including the $230,000 to be paid under condemnation proceedings to reach Connecticut avenue bridge, including the cost of that bridge itself, including also the cost of the Massachusetts avenue bridge, and the $310,000 necessary to extend Eleventh street, we have assailed the revenues of the District and of the people of the United States to the extent, in round numbers, of $1,000,000.

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman kindly give the House an itemized statement of the $1,000,000 that has been appropriated in the way he states?

Mr. DOCKERY. I will do it.

Mr. BABCOCK. I challenge the gentleman's statement.

Mr. DOCKERY. And I am going to meet the challenge right now; and it will be for the House to say whether I am right.

Two hundred thousand dollars for the Connecticut avenue bridge—

Mr. BABCOCK. Has that been appropriated?

Mr. DOCKERY. As I said a day or two ago, you asked but $25,000 as a "starter."

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman answer my question? He said a million dollars had been appropriated.

Mr. DOCKERY. I will amend my statement, as my friend is entirely technical and is obliged to resort to that to escape the unfortunate attitude in which he finds himself at this time. Though $200,000 has not been appropriated, the District is involved in liabilities to that extent for the bridge. It is true that only $25,000 has been appropriated, and the gentleman knows why $200,000 was not asked.

Mr. BABCOCK. The District Committee never supported that bridge at all.

Mr. DOCKERY. But the gentleman did. It was a Senate amendment. I am talking about the gentleman from Wisconsin now, not his committee.

Mr. BABCOCK. How about the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations? And I believe the gentleman himself is a member of that committee.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am talking about the gentleman from Wisconsin. If he desires any controversy with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, he will find that gentleman quite able to take care of himself.

In addition to the $200,000, for the expenditure of which the District is involved for the Massachusetts avenue bridge, there is a liability of $230,000 to pay the awards under condemnation proceedings to secure the land necessary to reach the Connecticut avenue bridge. Then you brought in a bill a few days since making an indefinite appropriation of $310,000 to extend Eleventh street.

Mr. BABCOCK. But that has been entirely stricken out of the bill, at the gentleman's request.

Mr. DOCKERY. I know it was stricken out, because we wanted the chance to review the awards of the jury; but still the chances are that the gentleman's project will succeed in due time. Now he reports a bill to extend Rhode Island avenue, and his report says the Commissioners estimate it will cost $81,480. With that statement of the Commissioners, just how the gentleman is able to reach the conclusion that $50,000 will be sufficient I do not understand.

Mr. COWHERD. I should like to explain that.

Mr. BABCOCK. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD], who will explain that.

Mr. DOCKERY. It certainly needs explanation.

Mr. COWHERD. When the street is opened and condemned, it is expected that the property adjoining it will be very materially increased in value.

Mr. BABCOCK. Especially in this case.

Mr. COWHERD. Especially in this case, where the opening is badly needed; and it is said the value of the property adjoining will be almost doubled. Now, the jury that assesses the damages and benefits will place the benefits accruing to the property as an assessment against the property, and we thought that even $50,000 was a large sum, and that after the condemnation proceedings that much would not be needed.

Mr. DOCKERY. If the gentleman thought so, why did you not say so in your bill?

Mr. COWHERD. We wanted enough.

Mr. BABCOCK. The bill is amended to $50,000.

Mr. DOCKERY. You have amended it, but there is no provision here that this whole proceeding shall fail in the event that the cost exceeds $50,000. You simply have made an initial appropriation of $50,000.

Mr. COWHERD. But the gentleman knows that if the assessment against the District is less than $50,000, only so much as is assessed will be used.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is true; but I suggest to my good friend from Missouri that I think away down deep in his heart he thinks it will require the $81,440.

Mr. COWHERD. No; I do not.

Mr. DOCKERY. If it does not require that, then the Committee on the District in their judgment are at variance with the District Commissioners, because the District Commissioners, estimating the value of the land at $1 a foot, say it will cost $81,440.

Mr. COWHERD. But the gentleman is unfair in his explanation to the House. Suppose it does cost $81,000, and $50,000 were assessed back as benefits on the adjoining land, then there would be only $30,000 to pay.

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly, if the beautiful theory of my friend is correct, that would be true, but he is dealing with a theory, and I am trying to work out something in actual practice. I think, as a matter of fact, that the opening of the street will call for the entire amount. I know that juries are fairly liberal, not only here in the District, but out in the county of Davis from which I hail, and even in Kansas City. I do not complain of that. Juries are justly liberal to owners of land, and that is proper, because where land is taken for a public purpose or a purpose supposed to be public, the owner should have a liberal compensation for his property. But I suggest that the time has come—and I want the attention of the chairman of the committee—the time has come to call a halt on these appropriations. In all seriousness, if this policy is to go forward, it means simply a vanished surplus in the District treasury. Now, in addition to what you have appropriated, or at least what Congress has appropriated—

Mr. BABCOCK. Or what Congress may appropriate, you should say.

Mr. DOCKERY. I will put it this way, in order to be absolutely accurate: In addition to the liability that Congress has imposed upon the District treasury, and in part, nearly all on the District, but in part on the revenues of the people of the United States—in addition to that liability of a million of dollars, we have in the District bill added $300,000 to be expended next year from the District revenues to begin the work of completing the Lydecker tunnel.

It will require $350,000 more of the District revenues next year to complete the Lydecker tunnel at the estimated minimum cost of that work. Now, I know the pressure that is upon the District Committee, because I have felt some pressure from this quarter myself, but I suggest that the committee can very fairly let this matter go over until the next session and take it up after we have taken an account of stock of the money in the District treasury. I should like to know what the gentleman has to say on that proposition. I want to yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. I want but a moment.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have the floor. I yielded to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DOCKERY. If the gentleman makes that point, it is well taken. I wished to yield to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now I will yield to my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. DOCKERY. Oh, my friend from Wisconsin wished the honor of doing that. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Well, one gentleman wanted to, and the other does, and I am satisfied and content either way. [Laughter.]

Now, I wish to ask my friend from Wisconsin, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, two questions. First, he thinks this work ought to be done?

Mr. BABCOCK. I certainly do, if the improvement of the city is to be carried out; and if the gentleman from Illinois will look at the map now on exhibition here, he will see that it is necessary and ought to be done.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. The other day I voted with the gentleman on the matter of the extension of Eleventh street. At the beginning of the controversy I did not intend to do so, but, as in many other instances where the gentleman has given reasons from his committee, on inquiry I have found that the judgment of the committee was better than mine, and I assented. Eleventh street, in my judgment, ought to be extended, and is to be if the legislation suggested by my friend is enacted into law.

Now, I voted with the gentleman on the Connecticut avenue bridge. It was presented in evidence to me that this work ought to be carried out, and I was ready to sustain him and his committee.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, if my friend from Illinois will allow me another correction there?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman voted with his own committee, not the District Committee. That was not a bill submitted by the District Committee at all, but came from his own Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CANNON. Well, it was a District matter, a Senate amendment, as I understand.

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes; but on the District appropriation bill, which comes from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CANNON. But the gentleman has full control of District matters practically, and I say that I have followed his committee generally. I followed the gentleman's lead there, because he has charge of all District matters. I have voted many times at the instance of my friend from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CURTIS] in matters of this kind, although not always confirmed in that judgment by my friend from Missouri, who is one of the subcommittee having charge of the District bill. But in this case, as I have stated, I am not sorry that I did so.

The Massachusetts avenue bridge was authorized by the House, and I am not sure but that it is apt, or at any rate the gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Iowa, as usual, carried me with them in support of it, and that work has been authorized.

Now, then, there is an amendment which is appended to a bill now before the House, put there by the Senate, for the purpose of paying certain damages for condemnation of land proceedings in connection with the Connecticut avenue extension. Is that correct?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes; that is correct. I understand $230,000 is the sum required.

Mr. CANNON. Well, that was in pursuance of legislation that came from the gentleman's committee. The gentleman thought it necessary. At any rate, the condemnation proceedings were had. Damages have been found and the matter awaits appropriation.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, will the gentleman allow another correction just there?

Mr. CANNON. With pleasure.

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman is confounding the action of his own committee with that of the District Committee.

Mr. CANNON. Well, this is a matter on the District bill, at all events.

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes; on the District bill; but it did not come from the District Committee. We are willing to bear the burden of all that we do. But yours is a large committee, and we ought not to be expected to bear the burden of everything.

Mr. CANNON. Well, at all events, if the gentleman will permit me, he and his committee are mainly responsible for the District appropriations.

Mr. BABCOCK. But the Appropriations Committee, the gentleman must remember, has charge of the District bill. It is a big committee, and we do not want to assume all of their sins.

Mr. CANNON. Well, my friend was for it and took charge of the matter on the floor.

Mr. BABCOCK. Oh, no; not at all. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. We did not assume to take charge of that bill.

Mr. CANNON. My friend is the strongest representative of the Appropriations Committee on the District appropriation bill. He has more strength in that connection than any half dozen members of the House who may be selected at large. Ordinarily, of course, the District Committee has charge of these appropriations, or rather the advisability of making them. Of course, the Appropriations Committee stands responsible for the appropriation itself. And I am not complaining. The gentleman has charge of District matters. He has control of them in his committee. But I want to say I think, if he will counsel—I mean if he will take counsel with the members of his committee about it—that the conference committee should accept that Senate amendment. Am I correct in that?

Mr. BABCOCK. I think it ought to be accepted.

Mr. CANNON. And the appropriation ought to be made. Now, if the extension of Eleventh street, and Connecticut avenue bridge, the Massachusetts avenue bridge, and payment of damages are to be considered and acted upon—and the gentleman admits they all ought to be carried into effect as legal appropriations by this Congress—if these appropriations which have been made, and some other things, are to go on, and all are to be paid from the District revenues, and I understand that there is only about $600,000 left in the Treasury?

Mr. BABCOCK. Six hundred and eighty-three thousand dollars.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. Now, the things that I have mentioned, without going into the consideration of other matters which the gentleman regards as necessary, will exhaust the District revenues absolutely. Does not my friend think, in view of the fact that this extension of Rhode Island avenue is to be paid out of the District revenues also, it had better wait until next winter, and possibly until next Congress, and let us reinforce this surplus in the District revenues? Otherwise I believe my friend will find we will have to authorize a District loan, the Government guaranteeing it later on, or have legislation brought in to pay half of this expense from the United States Treasury.

My friend does not want that state of things in this matter, and it seems to me, in view of what I have stated, we can rest for this session of Congress from any further opening of streets and payment of damages from the District revenues. I want to say it respectfully; because I, in good faith, with reluctance, set up my judgment against the judgment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BABCOCK. I desire to say to the gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that the District Committee has been very careful not to report bills carrying appropriations specifically except in connection with legislation.

The Massachusetts avenue and Connecticut avenue matters were first referred to the District Committee, and by me re-referred to the Committee on Appropriations, which is charged, as we concede, with the appropriations of the District. If your judgment—and we consider it requires all the powers and all the good judgment of both committees to look after this legislation, and I am willing at any time to accept suggestions of the gentleman from Illinois—if it is his judgment and his opinion that this matter ought not to be considered at this session, and if any gentleman on the floor will say that he will raise the question of no quorum, I will withdraw the bill.

Mr. CANNON. That is putting it both ways. Now, I will say to my friend that after all it is the legislative committee that controls, because when there is legislation, appropriation must follow. The Committee on Appropriations, reporting appropriations in pursuance of law, is but the servant, so to speak, of the District Committee. It is the legislation that knocks the persimmon; and as this legislation is to be made, I am merely challenging my friend before it is everlastingly and eternally too late. I feel with great diffidence that we ought not at this time to go further in opening these streets and avenues.

Mr. BABCOCK. Well, I will agree—

Mr. MUDD. I would like to ask the gentleman if he then takes the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois and withdraws the bill?

Mr. BABCOCK. I have not made that proposition.

Mr. CANNON. No; I want to do the gentleman just exact justice. He said: "If the gentleman would say in his judgment this ought not to be done, and then some other gentleman would say that he would not make the point of no quorum"—

Mr. BABCOCK. Both to happen.

Mr. DOCKERY. I think that both of these things could happen. The gentleman from Illinois has said in his judgment it ought not to happen, and I could insist on the point of no quorum.

Mr. BABCOCK. I do not think the gentleman will do that in a measure of this kind. I want to suggest to the gentleman that I am entirely willing to leave it to the House on the information they have now. If, in the judgment of the House, without any filibustering or without any further argument, they think that this street should be opened, well and good.

Mr. DOCKERY. I want to put a question to the gentleman from Wisconsin. I want to know of him if he thinks it sound policy to pass this bill in view of the items of liability which the gentleman from Illinois has just given the House and the further liability of $300,000 for beginning the completion of the Lydecker tunnel, which was not included in the statement of the gentleman from Illinois? I know very well that if this was a matter involving the private interests of the gentleman from Wisconsin I could rely upon his judgment, because I know he would not mortgage his resources; he would not issue notes or bonds in his private affairs if it could be avoided; and if you pass this bill you will exhaust the surplus of the District revenues, and thus compel a loan.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am very glad the gentleman raised that point. I did not intend to refer to it, out of charity to him. Now that he has gone over the list of appropriations, as he calls them, and these liabilities, he makes about a million dollars. From the last statement we have as to the surplus revenues of the District they amount to $683,000. Since then necessary appropriations have been made out of this surplus, as it has been called. Now, Mr. Chairman, the officers of the District and the people of the District realize and know that their taxes here are at the very minimum, that there are millions and millions of personal property to go on the tax roll, and it is not a question of appropriating $50,000, $100,000, or $200,000 to make a deficit in the District revenues. They are ample, and if not ample, there is abundance of property not on the tax roll now that should go on, and that all—

Mr. PITNEY. Who are the parties that agree to that proposition? Everything I hear is to the contrary. They complain that the taxes are large—

Mr. BABCOCK. The District Committee have gone very carefully over this matter. For three months they have had the District assessors of these taxes and the rolls before them. They went over the property of the District to see what was listed and what not, and these are the facts. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ODELL] was chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. PITNEY. Were those facts reported to the House?

Mr. BABCOCK. The facts have not been reported to the House.

Mr. PITNEY. Simply to obtain facts to lay before the committee?

Mr. BABCOCK. I never heard any gentleman dispute that proposition.

Mr. PITNEY. I do not dispute the proposition of the gentleman; my opinion coincides with his. But it is disputed by every one by whom I have been approached. They claim that the taxes are too large. I should like very much to have the facts reported to the House by the committee.

Mr. COWHERD. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ODELL] is getting the facts in condition to report.

Mr. BABCOCK. I think the gentleman from Missouri was on the subcommittee, and I yield to him to make a statement in reference to that report as to the property borne on the tax list.

Mr. COWHERD. The gentleman has stated the facts properly. There is practically no tax in the District on personal property. A large part of the bank stock of the District is not taxed, and there has been no very urgent effort, I think, to raise revenue. The statement made by gentlemen to the committee was that they raised more revenue now than Congress would appropriate, and therefore there was no particular reason why they should attempt to raise more revenue.

Mr. KNOWLES. Why has not personal property been on the tax list heretofore?

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask that general debate be considered as closed.

Mr. DOCKERY. I have no objection, but I want to offer an amendment to the committee amendment. I desire to move to strike out the word "fifty" in line 10, and insert "one."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 2, line 10, strike out the word "fifty" and insert the word "one;" so as to read "one thousand."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DOCKERY) there were 9 ayes and 5 noes.

So the amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to. The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. DOCKERY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "award," in line 9, section 2, and insert the word "expenses."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on a second amendment recommended by the committee, which the Clerk will report. The Clerk read as follows:

In line 12 strike out the word "one-half" and insert in lieu thereof the word "all."

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to discuss this amendment at any length, but I desire to enter my protest against the House agreeing to it. As the committee will understand, the purport of the amendment is to require the local government of the District to pay all the expenses of this street extension out of its local revenue. I am opposed to doing this, and I am opposed to any such departure from the organic act of 1878, which requires that all such expenditures shall be paid for jointly out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the revenues of the Government of the United States.

I shall not, however, interpose the point of no quorum to the passage of this bill, as I did to another bill a few days ago, and which I am almost fully persuaded I ought to have done this morning to the proposition to extend Eleventh street; but I was unwilling, and I am now unwilling, to be put in the position of blocking District legislation by interposing that point of order. However, I will call attention again to the point, as I did the other day, that we are appropriating money lavishly for one section of the city to the utter exclusion and entire disregard of other sections.

I do not say that I shall vote against this bill, but I do say that it ought not to be passed in this way. There is some merit in the bill. While it is appropriating the money for the northwestern part of the city—it is not in the northeastern, as some gentlemen said—yet it is in a course which, going a short distance farther, will place the street in the northeastern section, and I am in favor of anything which tends toward the development of the eastern or southern portion of the city. I know it will be quite a time before Congress will see any of its work actually done in the northeast or the southeast section. Therefore I will take hold of this little straw which, as I say, extends in the direction of and toward the development of the northeastern portion of the city, and in a few years will get into the neglected section, and I hope that in years to come by some possibility we shall get some legislation on behalf of the southeast and the southern sections of the city.

Gentlemen have asked me on the floor why I did not bring in individual bills for the opening up of streets in the southeastern section of the city and District. It is because I should never get favorable action on them. I do not mean to say that the committee of this House of which I am proud to be a member would not report such bills, but under a practice which has grown up they would have to go to the District Commissioners for their approval, and I do not believe the Commissioners of the District of Columbia would ever report in favor of any substantial improvements for the southeastern and southern sections. Why? That perhaps will seem a strong statement, but I will say that I do not believe that the Commissioners are appointed for the purpose of or with any expectation that they will recommend improvements of any appreciable value for the eastern or southern section of this city. Practically they never have, and they do not intend to do it. Their judgments, we must assume and take it for granted, are against the wisdom and the propriety of such action. They are selected through the influence of agencies of a speculative character of the northwestern section of the city. They are put there with that purpose in view by the people who secure their appointment, and they will recommend for that northwestern section right along in the future, as they have in the past.

Now, out of the time I may have I want to put in the RECORD a statement which seems to be a very clear and strong statement by a gentleman of intelligence upon this discrimination between these sections. I will ask the Clerk to read between the points I have marked. It is taken from a letter I received this morning from a gentleman of this city.

The Clerk read as follows:

The southeast section, which embraces all the territory situated southeast of the Anacostia River, contains approximately one-third of the entire territory within the District outside the original limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown; in other words, one-third of the entire county. This same southeast section contains, according to the police census of April, 1897, one-quarter of the entire population of the county. By that I mean one-quarter outside the original boundaries of Washington and Georgetown. This same southeast section pays yearly 10 per cent of all the county taxes. Now look and see what we receive:

Year.	Total for county roads and streets.	Southeast section.
1895-96	$25,000	$1,000
1897-98	154,500

During the last three years Congress has appropriated for county roads and streets $315,000. Of this immense sum our section, the southeast, received the munificent sum of $4,000, the balance $311,000 being allotted to the section of the county situated north of Boundary and west of the Anacostia River. Our section, containing as it does 53 per cent of all the territory of the county, numbering as its inhabitants 25 per cent of the entire population of the county, and the residents paying as they do 10 per cent of the entire county tax, is allowed 1.27 per cent of public money spent for making roads and streets to 98.73 per cent to the northwest section of the county. This outrageous discrimination no one can justify.

Mr. MUDD. I do not know the gentleman who wrote that letter; I do not know his connection with this matter or his interest in it; but if the facts he states are true, they are well worthy of consideration, and I know nothing to controvert them; they are certainly in accord with the general public impression on this matter, and present an unwarrantable and outrageous condition of affairs.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD] has expired.

Mr. MUDD. I ask unanimous consent to continue my remarks five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. To correct a possible misunderstanding or misapprehension, I would like to propound this question to the gentleman. Does he say that the Commissioners of this District are appointed with the special view of improving the northwestern portion of the city, or that such is the case with the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. MUDD. I said that the Commissioners are recommended by people who live in that section and who want improvements there. I did not mean to imply any reflection upon the committee at all. I do not say a word against any member of the committee. I want the House to understand that I feel great pride as well as pleasure in my companionship with the members of that committee. I think that as a general thing it has done as much, if not more, good work as any other committee of the House, with the exception of two or three having in charge the important general legislation of the country.

I stated that the Commissioners are recommended—I want to be understood on this point—by people and interests favoring legislation for the northwestern section of the city. I do not wish, let it be further understood, to accuse the Commissioners of anything approaching corrupt action in this matter; but I say that the agencies and influences recommending and securing their appointment represent interests in the northwest and look out for them almost exclusively; the resultant of such a condition is an undue and disproportionate consideration of the interests of that section to the neglect of others, and the proof of this lies in the fact that for years such has been the course of things in this District.

Now, one word as to the amendment. I desire to enter my protest emphatically against a departure from the system under which the General Government has paid one-half of the expenses of the District of Columbia. In my view—from my standpoint—it is a wanton breach of faith for the Congress of the United States to make this radical departure. The organic act of 1878, under which the General Government took exclusive control of the interests of the people of this District, embraced a pledge that one-half of the expenditures for the benefit of the District, including the opening of new streets as well as the repair of old ones, should be borne thenceforth by the General Government.

I believe the General Government should contribute to this extent. In my judgment there is every consideration of reason, justice, and good policy in favor of this arrangement; and for this reason I enter my protest against this amendment—not particularly against the bill. I am in favor of improvements in all sections of this city and District. I want their growth to be continuous and symmetrical. And I want the National Government to keep faith, in order that there may be such growth.

Mr. BABCOCK. Is the gentleman aware that under section 2 as now amended only $1,000 is appropriated, and that for the purpose only of paying expenses of the condemnation?

Mr. MUDD. I understand that, but the principle remains the same.

Mr. BABCOCK. That is all there is involved in this bill—merely $1,000.

Mr. DOCKERY. But the courts have held that an appropriation to that extent is sufficient to authorize the initiation of condemnation proceedings and carrying them forward to a final issue so far as a judgment is concerned.

Mr. MUDD. I understand that; and this very bill contemplates that an appropriation to pay the whole expense will ultimately follow. It is not the amount involved here that I am protesting against; it is the principle, or rather the wanton disregard of principle—the serious breach of the solemn compact between the Congress of the United States and the District of Columbia made in the law of 1878. On that ground I oppose the amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I move that this bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that its further consideration be postponed until the first District day in December next. I do this in the interest of the public Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to amend the motion by simply moving that the bill be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. DOCKERY. That motion would come afterwards. It is not in order now.

I simply want to say, in view of the fact that the surplus of the District treasury is already practically exhausted by liabilities incurred up to this time, as I understand it, and there being no surplus in the treasury, I simply move to consider this matter in December next, instead of now, when it is reasonable to suppose that the surplus will have increased.

Mr. BABCOCK. I hope that motion will be voted down.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the "noes" seemed to prevail.

Mr. CANNON. I think the "ayes" have the most votes, but the "noes" make the most noise. [Laughter.] I ask a division.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 16, noes 25.

Mr. BABCOCK. I move now that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with favorable recommendation.

Mr. MUDD. But the amendment of the committee has not yet been voted upon. I demand a separate vote with reference to the question of requiring the expense of this work to be divided between the General Government and the city.

The CHAIRMAN. This amendment has not yet been acted upon, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 12, after the word "appropriated," strike out the word "one-half" and insert "all."

Mr. BABCOCK. But the committee amendments were adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Only one of them. Not this amendment.

Mr. KING. Is that a committee amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. A committee amendment.

Mr. MUDD. That is correct; it is recommended by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment just read.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to prevail.

Mr. MUDD. Let us have a division.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 30, noes 8.

So the amendment was adopted.

The motion of Mr. BABCOCK was then agreed to.

Mr. HANDY. I demand a division—

Mr. BABCOCK. But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is too late in his demand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman is too late. The Chair had announced the result of the vote before he heard the gentleman make a demand for a division.

So, no further count being demanded, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HEPBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill S. 4571, had directed him to report the same to the House with certain amendments, and, as so amended, that the bill do pass.

The amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

WATER RIGHTS, GREAT FALLS OF THE POTOMAC.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to ask consideration of the bill S. 1754—

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to interpose objection—

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will first report the title of the bill. The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1754) to acquire by purchase or condemnation land and water rights at the Great Falls of the Potomac.

Mr. PITNEY. Reserving the point of order that this bill should have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole—

Mr. BABCOCK. There is no question about that.

Mr. PITNEY (continuing). I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that it is wiser to postpone its consideration until the next session of Congress? It is a matter of vast importance, involving the expenditure of the public money without any present necessity, and it is well, I think, that it should go over, so that members may be able to inform themselves more fully about it.

Mr. MUDD. The motion is not open to debate.

Mr. DOCKERY. What is the motion?

Mr. MUDD. To consider the bill in committee, as I understand it.

Mr. PITNEY. I have not received a reply to my inquiry as yet.

Mr. BABCOCK. This is a matter that ought not to be passed over. It has received the approval of the Senate, and I think the committee of the House would be subject to severe criticism unless it gives the House an opportunity to dispose of the bill, or at least to discuss it at this time.

Mr. PITNEY. I want to say to the gentleman in all kindness—

Mr. BABCOCK. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 1754.

Mr. CANNON. What is the bill?

Mr. BABCOCK. The Great Falls bill.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. PITNEY demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 23, noes 22.

Mr. PITNEY. I fear there is no quorum present, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will examine into the matter.

Pending the count,

Mr. PITNEY said: Mr. Speaker, I am constrained by the fact that other business of great public importance ought to come up a little later to withdraw the point of no quorum.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 1754) to acquire, by purchase or condemnation, land and water rights at the Great Falls of the Potomac, with Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will rise informally, to receive a message from the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DALZELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had still further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 6897) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes, numbered 143 to 167, inclusive, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; had further disagreed to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12; had still further insisted upon said amendment; had asked a further conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. CULLOM, and Mr. COCKRELL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

- S. 873. An act to remove the charge of desertion against Edwin Higgins;
- S. 1334. An act granting a pension to William J. Murray;
- S. 1361. An act granting an increase of pension to John N. Landon, of Leavenworth, Kans.;
- S. 1368. An act granting an increase of pension to Alvah A. Eaton;
- S. 1737. An act to correct the military record of Patrick Hanley;
- S. 1807. An act granting an increase of pension to Abraham T. Casey, of Larned, Kans.;
- S. 2038. An act to increase the pension of Mary C. Cook;
- S. 2117. An act granting a pension to Fannie Kautz, widow of August V. Kautz, late brigadier-general United States Army.
- S. 2338. An act granting a pension to James C. Young;
- S. 3111. An act granting a pension to Cornelia M. Mason;
- S. 3169. An act granting a pension to John E. Bevan;
- S. 3506. An act granting a pension to Mary E. Kline;
- S. 3668. An act granting an increase of pension to Ephraim C. Baldwin;
- S. 4298. An act granting an increase of pension to Edward R. Young; and
- S. 4439. An act to relieve the owners of mining claims who enlist in the military service of the United States for duty in the war with Spain from performing assessment work during such term of service.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Speaker, this conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill is a matter that ought to be acted upon at once, and I should like to submit it now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DALZELL). The committee only rose informally to receive a message.

Mr. PITNEY. Yes; but I think there will be no objection to having this District of Columbia conference report acted upon at once. It is a report of a disagreement between the Senate and House conferees upon the remaining amendments to the District appropriation bill. I ask for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It can only be done by unanimous consent. The Chair will put the request.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask unanimous consent that the House consider the District of Columbia conference report at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report which the Clerk will report, if there be no objection. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6897) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

MAHLON PITNEY,

ALEX. M. DOCKERY,

Managers on the part of the House.

W. B. ALLISON,

S. M. CULLOM,

F. M. COCKRELL,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Speaker, there are only two subjects that remain in disagreement between the Senate and House on this appropriation bill. The one is the appropriation for the free public library, and the other is made up of a group of amendments which all relate to the appropriations for charities. The conferees on the part of the House were unwilling to take the responsibility either for the failure of this bill or for an agreement which should be in opposition to the repeatedly expressed views of the House of Representatives. The House has on previous occasions repeatedly voted against this appropriation for a free public library, and it has also repeatedly expressed its opinion about the appropriations for charities.

The conferees on the part of the Senate insist that the House must recede on both these propositions or that the appropriation bill must fail. Your conferees therefore leave the matter to the judgment of the House of Representatives. I can only say that it is of the utmost public importance that this appropriation bill either pass or fail to-day. If it is to fail, some other provision must be made at once for the expenses of the District government on and after the 1st day of July. Otherwise the District government must suspend operations. For the purpose of testing the sense of the House, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 12, being the appropriation for a free public library, and agree to the same.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 12 and agree to the same.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PITNEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, the other amendments are numbers 143 to 167, inclusive, being those which relate to the much-disputed question of the District charities. I can only say that the conferees on the part of the House have made an earnest effort to secure an agreement in accordance with the wishes of the House repeatedly expressed upon this subject, and we have been unable to secure an agreement. The time has come when we think we ought to leave it to the judgment of the House as to whether it will insist to the extent of defeating an appropriation bill. If any gentleman desires—

Mr. CANNON. Is this Senate amendment substantially the same as in the law for the current year?

Mr. PITNEY. My recollection is that the Senate amendments make the same specific appropriations, substantially, and for the same institutions in the District of Columbia for which we have appropriated money for a number of years.

Mr. CANNON. The same as in the present law?

Mr. PITNEY. I think so. I think they are the same.

Mr. NORTHWAY. If the gentleman will permit, this is the same question that has been fought over in the last three appropriation bills.

Mr. PITNEY. The same question is involved. The only difference in the status of the matter at the present time is that since the last District appropriation bill was passed a joint committee, constituted a couple of years ago, of three Senators and three Members of the House, of which the gentlemen from Ohio and myself are two of the Members of the House, have completed an investigation and made a thorough and exhaustive report, which has been printed both as a Senate and as a House report, and a copy sent to each member; and I may say that your conferees, or at least I, as one member, took the recommendations of the joint commission into the committee of conference (I being supported in this by the Senate District Committee) and urged that some of the results of the joint investigation should be embodied in the appropriation bill. But in order to do so it was necessary to go to some extent into new legislation, and a point of order was raised by the Senate conferees that they would not permit legislation to be introduced in the bill at this stage; and as the question of order was in their favor, we were obliged to confess that it was questionable whether we could legislate in that way.

Mr. NORTHWAY. If finally the recommendations of the joint commissioners are accepted, would it not obviate the difficulties about sectarian appropriations?

Mr. PITNEY. It will obviate the difficulties not only about sectarian appropriations, but the difficulties about the extravagant use and improper use of money in a number of instances in sectarian and other institutions.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Do you believe it is better to accept the Senate amendment this year or not?

Mr. PITNEY. I think the House of Representatives can accept the Senate amendment without any violation of principle and take the opportunity to consider the question of new legislation at its leisure at the next session of Congress.

Mr. NORTHWAY. That is my idea.

Mr. PITNEY. For the purpose of testing the sense of the House, I will move that the House recede from the former disagreement to the Senate amendments numbered 143 to 167, inclusive, and agree to the same.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I think that ought to be done.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PITNEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House receded from its disagreement to the Senate amendments above named and agree to the same was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee will resume its session.

WATER POWER OF THE GREAT FALLS OF THE POTOMAC.

The committee resumed its session, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill (S. 1754) to acquire by condemnation land and water rights at the Great Falls of the Potomac.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 1754) to acquire by condemnation land and water rights at the Great Falls of the Potomac.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby directed, under and with the advice of the Attorney-General, to obtain title for the United States, by right of eminent domain, as herein provided, to the lands upon each side of the Potomac River at the Great Falls not now owned by the United States, extending from a point at or near the Government dam to a point at or near where Difficult Run enters the Potomac River, and extending back from the waters of the river upon each side not more than one-half mile, together with the title to Conns Island and the other islands in the river between the points named, and to all grants and privileges in and to the water and the water rights at the Great Falls between said boundaries: Provided, That the canal and lands and water rights of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, on the Maryland side of the river only, are hereby excepted from the operation of this act.

SEC. 2. That the Attorney General shall, within two months after the approval of this act, examine and give to the Secretary of War his opinion, stating what lands, grants, and rights within the general boundaries above mentioned are necessary to be taken to vest in the United States all of the water rights at the Great Falls of the Potomac, including the right to use the water for power purposes. The Secretary of War shall, within three months after the approval of this act, cause a survey to be made of the lands and islands required to be taken, in the opinion of the Attorney-General, and such other lands within the general description in section 1 of this act as may be necessary for the erection and maintenance of canal, power house, and other buildings necessary to use said water power and for generating electricity for use in the District of Columbia and other purposes, and shall cause a map to be made thereof, clearly defining the boundary lines of all the lands and islands required, and shall prepare a written statement in triplicate, specifying by metes and bounds the lands, and by proper designation the grants and water rights taken hereunder; and shall file said map and statement in the office of the recorder of deeds in the District of Columbia, the county of Fairfax, Va., and the county of Montgomery, Md., respectively, which filing shall be a taking by the United States of the lands, grants, and water rights described and designated in said map and statement.

SEC. 3. That to further carry out the purposes of this act and obtain the lands, grants and water rights the title to which is not in the United States, the Attorney-General shall, within three months after the filing of said map and statement, cause proceedings to be commenced by petition, in the name of the United States, in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, making the known owners of the lands and water rights taken the title to which is not in the United States parties defendant; and all persons interested therein, but not known to the Attorney-General, may be made parties defendant under the title "unknown owners." Notice to the known owners shall be by personal service of summons with a copy of the petition, which may be served by any United States marshal in any judicial district where such owner or owners reside, and to the "unknown owners" by publication of a notice in newspapers, to be designated by the court, published in said District of Columbia and in said counties, specifying the nature of the proceeding and the time when the matter will be heard, such notice to be published for thirty consecutive days in the District of Columbia and once a week for four consecutive weeks in said counties, and such other notice as the court may order. The court may, in its discretion, appoint guardians ad litem of minors or other persons under disability or suitable representatives of unknown owners. Said court shall, in general term, prescribe rules of procedure conformable to practice in like cases, to give the owners a fair hearing and secure speedy determination of the rights of the parties, and shall designate a judge of said court to hear said cause at a special term; said court shall forthwith, after service and expiration of said notice, summon a jury, to hear and determine, under the instructions of the court as in other cases, the compensation and damages, if any, to be paid the owners for such land and water rights; but in determining such amounts there shall be considered only the values of the land and water rights at the time of such taking, and the value of such properties to the city of Washington for the uses for which they are taken or to which they may be applied under the provisions of this act shall not be considered. The Attorney-General may appoint special counsel for the United States familiar with the laws relating to riparian rights and hydraulics. Said court shall enter judgment against the United States for the amount or amounts ascertained as aforesaid and for the costs of the proceeding, and said judgments shall draw interest until paid. Appeals may be taken from said judgments as in other cases.

SEC. 4. That upon payment of the judgment rendered in pursuance of this act the title to the lands, grants, and water rights condemned shall vest in the United States. Where claims are now pending in any court against the United States for compensation or damages for taking water at the Great Falls and the damaging of property by reason of such taking, such claims may be heard and determined in the proceeding hereunder.

SEC. 5. That for the purpose of paying the costs and expenses incurred in carrying out the provisions of this act, including court costs, jury and witnesses fees, special counsel, engineering, and other expenses, the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLET].

Mr. GILLET of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, it is not my habit to take advantage of the freedom of debate in Committee of the Whole to impose upon the House my views upon a subject which is not before it, particularly such a crowded House as this is. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] a short time ago made a speech against some resolutions which I introduced, to exempt private property on the sea from capture during this war, and I wish for a few moments to respond to his remarks. He was the chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which had under consideration that resolution.

The resolution simply provided that private property on the sea should be exempt from capture during this war, except when it was contraband or endeavoring to elude blockade; and in some remarks which I made in support of it it seemed to me I satisfactorily established that that was in exact accord with the way war is conducted on land; that it was in exact accord with the spirit of international law, and also that it was in exact accord with the whole history of our country and with the contentions that the United States have made for over a century in their diplomatic negotiations and treaties, which our leading statesmen have been in favor of and which we endeavored to insert in the declaration of Paris in 1856; and I maintained that if now, when we had the opportunity, we did not put in practice a principle which we have always insisted upon in theory, we were inconsistent and cowardly.

In reply to this, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, without denying these statements and admitting that these resolutions were in full accord with the spirit of international law, says that now, in a time of war, is not the time to adopt principles, but that that should be done by convention between nations before the war breaks out and that after war has once broken out we must act upon whatever doctrines our opponents will accept or upon doctrines that every nation accepts. That, it strikes me, is a preposterous theory. When we heard from Cuba that our soldiers there had been mutilated by the knives of the Spaniards, we did not say that because the Spaniards adopted this old barbarous custom of mutilation the United States would adopt the same practice.

We said we are a civilized nation, and we will stand by civilized practices, no matter what our opponents do. It seems to me exactly the same logic is applicable to these resolutions. Those are our principles which we had declared through a century of peace, which we have insisted upon, and now in time of war, when there is an opportunity for us to put them in practice, it is not for us to say because the Spaniards do not adopt that principle we will desert it. Most of the ameliorations of the horrors of war which have so signally marked the advance of civilization in the last three centuries have come about not by conventions and treaties between nations in times of peace, but by the self-respect of the nations when at war.

Moreover, we do not yet know that Spain would not adopt this resolution if we did. All we have to do is to declare that it is our principle. If they do not adopt it, if they act in such a way that we think they will not reciprocate, there is time for us to repeal it. I suppose it is with nations as with individuals, that their virtue depends something on the test to which it is put. In this war with Spain, if these principles of ours were too much of a test, we might be compelled to withdraw from them, though I think that highly improbable; for if there ever was a war when we can afford to live up to our principles of a century it is this one, when the opposing nation is so weak.

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania says Spain has not accepted our proposition to give up privateering, and so has not shown any disposition to meet us halfway. After President McKinley issued his proclamation that we would not authorize privateering, Spain, in her proclamation, said that for the present she would reserve the right to issue letters of marque, but she has not issued any; she has thus far lived up to our proclamation, and the very same principle that led us to say that we will not privateer leads us logically to say that we will not capture private property on the sea. We said we would not privateer without first consulting Spain on the subject, and she has followed our lead. Why should we not follow the same course on the kindred subject of exempting private property from capture? It seems to me our action there is an argument in favor of these resolutions instead of against them. But, he says, it is not fair that our gallant sailors, who have taken these prizes, should not have their prize money; that the last clause of the resolution, which says ships already seized shall be given back, of itself condemns the resolution.

There are two answers to that. In the first place, it is easy to strike out the clause; in the second place, if, as he says, the sailors have a vested right, then if these prizes are surrendered at the end of the war, we must make an appropriation and give the sailors what they have earned in prize money. But that very fact illustrates the unfairness and the obsolescence of this practice of prize money. Why should the sailors on the sea have prize money when the soldiers on the land have none? Why should the sailors who manned the little Mangrove, a revenue cutter, and took large prizes without any great risk—why should they have thousands of dollars apiece as prize money, while our soldiers, who are going to bear the real brunt of the war, do not get a dollar? It seems to me there is an inconsistency which of itself is in favor of this resolution.

Moreover, if any sailors are to get prize money, if anyone is deserving of compensation, I think it should be the ones who risk their lives, who are running some danger, and not those who are in comparatively safe occupations. The sailors of this war who will be in danger, who ought to be rewarded, are probably the sailors on the Indiana, the Iowa, and the big battle ships who are going to be opposed to the forts in Cuba. They are the ones who are risking their lives.

They do not get a dollar of prize money in fighting these forts and subjecting themselves to the dangers of heavy guns, while the men most likely to get prize money are the sailors on the cruisers, who simply seize the foreign merchantmen. So it seems to me that this argument made against the resolution is really an argument for it. In fact, it seems to me, as a matter of principle, supported by our contention of a century, and as a matter of practice, and as a matter of fair play for the different arms of our service, these resolutions ought to have been acted upon favorably by the committee and so reported to the House.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, if there is any other gentleman who intends to oppose the bill now under consideration, I will now yield him time, in order that the proponents of the measure may know what questions need attention in the discussion.

Mr. Chairman, this bill, as stated by the chairman of the committee, has been passed by the Senate upon two occasions. At any rate, it passed during this session and was referred to the House committee. There it received consideration, and a report was submitted recommending the passage of the Senate bill with certain amendments.

The bill, after its reference to the committee of the House, was by that committee transmitted to the Attorney-General with the request that he offer any recommendations which were deemed necessary to improve and perfect the measure. After consideration at his hands it was submitted to the committee with a few verbal amendments, and those amendments have been accepted by the committee and are incorporated in the present bill.

The importance of this measure none can deny. There may be a question as to whether or not it is expedient to pass the measure at present, because of the fact that it involves some expense. This bill provides for the acquisition of certain land and water rights at Great Falls, on the Potomac River, for the purpose not only of furnishing water for domestic and culinary purposes to the inhabitants of this city, but also that a public utility, namely, a splendid water power, may be procured, by means of which, whenever desirable, the city may be illuminated by electric power generated by water owned and held for the benefit of this city.

Elaborate reports have been made by various officials of the Government, and particularly by members of the army corps who have been detailed by their superior officers for the purpose of investigating this subject. In the reports which have been submitted by them the wisdom of this measure is clearly set forth, and any action which may be taken looking to the carrying into effect their recommendations will, it seems to me, be fully vindicated by the facts presented in the reports submitted by them.

They report that the city has not sufficient water for domestic and culinary purposes; that by condemnation it has acquired about 25,000,000 gallons per day; that since these condemnation proceedings were instituted and terminated a conduit has been constructed and an increased amount of water has been diverted from the Potomac River and is now taken through the conduit to the city; that 75,000,000 gallons daily are now used by the inhabitants of Washington, all of which is taken from the Potomac River, and that the amount which has been acquired by the city through purchase, condemnation, and otherwise aggregates only 25,000,000 gallons per diem.

These investigations also reveal the fact that after the second appropriation of about 25,000,000 gallons per day was made by the city a suit was instituted by persons claiming to be the owners of the land upon both sides of the Great Falls, and that suit is now pending, for, as I remember, about $500,000.

After the appropriation of this second quantity of water a further appropriation aggregating from twenty to twenty-five million gallons per day was made by the city; and for this appropriation another suit has been instituted by those claiming to own the land upon both sides of the river at the Great Falls. So that now suits are pending against the Government by the claimants of this land for amounts aggregating $600,000 or $700,000.

Under the first adjudication, which was made by the Court of Claims of the United States, it seems to me the liability of the Government was established and fixed. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the judgment of the Court of Claims was affirmed. So the question suggests itself at the threshold of this discussion whether or not, if the Government is liable for water which has been diverted and used by the city for domestic purposes—and it is diverting 50,000,000 gallons daily for which compensation has not been made—and suits are pending to recover damages alleged to have been sustained, and remembering the further fact that as the city grows and the population multiplies additional water will be required for domestic and culinary purposes—whether in the face of all these facts it would not be wise to have at once a finality to this question, to end this divided ownership of property, and vest in the city, or in the Government for the use of the inhabitants of the city, the title to a sufficient quantity of water to last the city as long as time shall endure?

Mr. PITNEY. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. PITNEY. The gentleman, I think, must be mistaken in his figures. He says that the present capacity of the waterworks is 75,000,000 gallons daily, which I understand to be correct. It is not at all true, however, that we are using 75,000,000 gallons daily. The amount consumed in the city is only about 45,000,000 gallons daily, and it has been shown by experiments conducted by the District Commissioners that this consumption is upon the basis of wasting about 3 gallons for every gallon legitimately consumed. In other words, the enforcement of any reasonable economy in the use of water in this District would reduce the daily consumption to much less than 25,000,000 gallons, with an abundance of water for all legitimate purposes.

Mr. COWHERD. I think the gentleman from Utah [Mr. KING] will admit that the city will never need all of this water for city purposes.

Mr. PITNEY. Why, sir, the advocates of this bill are so anxious to find a necessity for the bill that they are talking about using the water for power purposes, for lighting the streets, and all that sort of thing.

But the point I am now making is that the water we are now using does not begin to reach the capacity of the present works; and if it is true, as the gentleman seems to think, that we have only paid the condemnation awards on the basis of 25,000,000 gallons a day, that is more water than we need in this city today. The experiments of the District Commissioners with regard to the waste of water prove conclusively that the per capita consumption of this city now is 170 gallons daily for each citizen. A legitimate per capita consumption would be about 40 gallons, or, at the outside, 50 gallons, and that would require far less than 25,000,000 gallons daily.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, in reply to what my distinguished friend from New Jersey has just stated, I desire to invite his attention and the attention of the members of this committee to some reports which have been submitted by various officials of the Government in connection with this matter; and especially I desire to invite the attention of my friend to the very elaborate and able report made by Col. George H. Elliott, of the Engineer Corps, which bears date March 20, 1894. He there states that at that time the city of Washington was using 45,000,000 gallons per diem. Since then the amount taken from the river has been increased.

Mr. PITNEY. That is just what I stated—the amount used and wasted.

Mr. KING (continuing). Further statements indicate that the capacity of the conduit is 75,000,000 gallons per day and that more than 45,000,000 gallons flow through this conduit—

Mr. PITNEY. The gentleman from Utah is probably referring now to the Lydecker tunnel. That tunnel, I will state to him, is not yet completed, and work was suspended because of frands in connection with its construction, which were discovered as the work progressed.

We have just now—only a few moments ago—incoming to a final agreement with the Senate on the District of Columbia appropriation bill, made provision for the expenditure of a large sum of money to complete that tunnel. When that is done we will probably use a little more than 45,000,000 gallons of water daily—I mean use and waste it, because under the present arrangement we may expect that most of the water that is provided at the faucets to the users of water throughout the city will be wasted. But notwithstanding that fact, I repeat my statement, that the legitimate consumption in this city should not be over 20,000,000 gallons. Twenty-five million gallons would be an exceedingly large estimate, and would allow nearly 100 gallons per day to each man, woman, and child.

Mr. KING. The report made by the District Committee and which accompanies this bill is founded largely upon the investigations and written statements made by various Government officials charged with the responsibility of reporting all the facts to the Government. The results of these investigations can be found not only in the committee's report, but in the Senate report and the accompanying documents.

Mr. PITNEY. There were hearings before the Committee on Appropriations only a few months ago, when reports were received from the District Commissioners on this subject of water consumption and waste, which embody the facts I have stated.

Mr. McCULLOCH (to Mr. KING). Do the District Commissioners recommend your bill?

Mr. KING. Yes; it is recommended by them.

Mr. PITNEY. I do not know how it can be that they favor this bill, if they do favor it. There is no present necessity for it whatever. My information is to the effect that a company was organized to buy up the land over there some time ago, and this company, in its own interest, is urging the passage of the bill by all the specious arguments that can be brought forward.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New Jersey, when he makes a charge of that kind, ought to elaborate it and give us all of the facts. He ought to make it clear to the members of this body who must vote upon this question when he makes a charge of this kind.

Mr. KING. It ought to be done in all fairness to these people in the city of Washington who are interested in the water supply here.

Mr. PITNEY. I am trying to do that very thing for their benefit.

Mr. BABCOCK. That is another question; but when the gentleman submits a statement that a land company has been organized, and characterizes their work as selfish, and that they are urging the passage of the bill from private interests, he ought to give the facts, if he has any facts, for the benefit of the committee.

This bill has been before the Congress ever since I was a member of this House—

Mr. PITNEY. And defeated over and over again.

Mr. BABCOCK. Not at all. It never reached the stage where action could be taken upon it, as I remember.

Mr. DOCKERY. But substantially, if the gentleman will allow me, this bill was before the House two or three years ago for consideration.

Mr. PITNEY. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. But objection was raised to its consideration at the time, if gentlemen will remember, and it was withdrawn.

Mr. BABCOCK. It was presented, I will admit, but it was withdrawn from consideration.

Mr. PITNEY. Then, my statement was entirely correct.

Mr. DOCKERY. That was my recollection of it.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. But it was only temporarily withdrawn from the consideration of the House, and not for any such reasons as have been assigned here.

Mr. PITNEY. Now, if the gentleman will permit me—

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor, and I desire to refer to the unfounded statement of my friend from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY].

Mr. PITNEY. If the gentleman will allow me to state, in fairness to the gentleman from Wisconsin, I do not desire to make any charge, as he seems to think was my intention. I make no such charge on my own authority. I am just like nine of every ten members of this House, possessed of but little information on these subjects and desirous of acquiring more.

But I do state that it was communicated to me, in good faith, that a company was organized to purchase these lands for an insignificant sum; that their intention was to make a large claim against the Government for water rights; that they bring suits against the Government for vast sums for alleged damages; and that the Government does not require and will not require to purchase their property; and what I have requested is that if there be evidence, an opportunity shall be offered to present it on the floor of the House, and that this measure may be postponed until that evidence is accessible.

Mr. BABCOCK. But this interest belongs largely, I will state to the gentleman, to the Butler estate.

Mr. PITNEY. What Butler estate?

Mr. DOCKERY. That is just the point.

Mr. BABCOCK (continuing). The estate of Benjamin Butler, of Massachusetts. And this has not been acquired lately. He purchased this property, I think, when he was a member of Congress.

Mr. MUDD. And the Butler estate organized this Great Falls Power Company?

Mr. BABCOCK. I understand that to be true.

Mr. PITNEY. Well, we will get at all the facts if we proceed long enough.

Mr. KING. Now, if the gentleman from New Jersey would not be so ambitious and eager to make charges which can not be substantiated, he might obtain some information which would be some use to him if he is desirous of procuring the facts.

Mr. PITNEY. Bring in all the facts you have. That is precisely what I am asking for.

Mr. KING. The gentleman was not satisfied with the statement he has made in regard to the consumption of the water in the District of Columbia, as supplied from the Potomac River, but he proceeds now to discuss another feature of the case. It seems to me that the proper way would be to consider the questions serially. And without, for the present, being diverted by the last charge of my friend, which I assure him is clearly without foundation, I shall proceed to a brief discussion of the matter first adverted to by him. Referring to this report, to which I have invited attention, I read:

(3) The bill requires that the land and water rights at Great Falls are to be taken to the extent that may be deemed "necessary for the present and future supply of said District of Columbia, the water so taken to be used for any and all purposes." This is not contained in the act which the bill proposes to amend. The present supply to the city is about 45,000,000 gallons per diem.

If provision is to be made for future supply, either in this bill or elsewhere, the amount should, I think, be stated at 200,000,000 gallons per diem. This for the reason that from computations that I made after the last census of Washington (1890) I found the supply per diem per capita to be about 250 gallons, and I am of the opinion that if we are now to make arrangements for all time provision should be made for not less than 1,000,000 inhabitants.

Mr. PITNEY. What report is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. KING. I have announced it several times. It is appended to the Senate report prepared by Senator PROCTOR on January 20 of this year, when this bill was unanimously reported with a favorable recommendation. I stated to my friend that it was a report which had been prepared by Col. George H. Elliot at the instance of the Government, pursuant, as I understand, to a resolution passed by the Senate requiring an investigation to be made to ascertain whether or not (1) any additional water rights should be acquired by the Government in the Potomac River, and (2) whether it was expedient and feasible to utilize the power which could be generated at Great Falls for the purpose of lighting the public buildings and the streets, parks, etc., of Washington.

Pursuant to this resolution investigations were made. These reports declare in favor of acquiring the land on both sides of the Potomac at the Great Falls in order to obtain the advantages of riparian proprietorship; and also that without acquiring additional water the supply for domestic purposes will be inadequate.

Colonel Elliot also refers to the advantages which would accrue from an undivided ownership in the land and water and the vexations and difficulties which will constantly occur if private persons are partners with the Government in the stream.

Mr. Chairman, there are other reports here bearing upon this question, and I desire that they shall be considered by the committee before reaching a conclusion. The president of the Board of Commissioners, under date of February 2, 1897, writes to the chairman of the District Committee as follows:

OFFICE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, February 2, 1897.

DEAR SIR: The Commissioners recommend favorable action upon H. R. bill 10133 "To amend an act approved July 15, 1882, entitled 'An act to increase the water supply of the city of Washington, and for other purposes,'" which was referred to them at your instance for their examination and report, if the same be modified by adding, after the word "damage," in line 16 of section 4 the words: "Provided, That in making the valuations the jury shall consider only the present values of the land and water rights and shall not consider their values to the city of Washington for the uses for which they are taken or to which they may be applied under the provisions of this act."

Very respectfully,
JOHN W. ROSS,
President Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia.

Hon. J. W. BABCOCK,
Chairman Committee on District of Columbia,
House of Representatives.

The bill to which this refers is one very similar to the one under consideration, the differences being verbal, not structural, and not affecting in the remotest degree the substantial provisions of the measure. The acting president of the Board of Commissioners, Mr. Wight, under date of March 15, 1898, writes:

OFFICE OF COMMISSIONERS OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, March 15, 1898.

The Commissioners have the honor to return herewith H. R. bill 7133, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, to acquire by purchase or condemnation land and water rights at the Great Falls of the Potomac, referred to them by your committee for examination and report.

The object of the bill is of great importance to the people of the District of Columbia, and the Commissioners are heartily in favor of a measure which will accomplish the desired results.

Commissioner Ross wrote to the chairman of this committee, when a similar bill was under consideration, as follows:

OFFICE OF COMMISSIONERS OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.
Washington, April 13, 1896.

DEAR SIR: The Commissioners have the honor to make the following response to your reference to them, for their examination and report, of bill H. R. 7066, to amend an act approved July 15, 1882, entitled "An act to increase the water supply of the city of Washington, and for other purposes."

The Commissioners deem it of the highest importance to the public interests that the Government acquire the title to all the water rights in the vicinity of the Great Falls of the Potomac River not now owned by it. All the available flow of the river at that point will be needed to meet the growing needs of the national capital for its water supply, and the Commissioners earnestly urge that possibility of contentions and embarrassments from divided jurisdiction over this source of supply be eliminated through the acquisition of all those water rights by the Government.

In the judgment of the Commissioners, the earliest action possible in this direction is advisable, but as the Washington Aqueduct is under charge of the War Department, they take the liberty to suggest that the bill be referred to the Secretary of War.

Very respectfully,

JOHN W. ROSS,
President.

Hon. J. W. BARCOCK,
Chairman Committee on District of Columbia,
House of Representatives.

So, Mr. Chairman, I assert that this measure has received the approval of the Commissioners of this District, and, as I before stated, it has received the recommendation of officials who have been appointed for the purpose of making an investigation. Col. George H. Elliott writes, under date of February 5, 1897, to the chairman of the committee:

1603 O STREET N.W.,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1897.

SIR: I have read with great pleasure your report, as printed in the Evening Star, on the bill for the acquisition of all the water rights at the Great Falls of the Potomac not now owned by the United States, and I write to ask if you will kindly direct your clerk to send me a copy of the bill as reported and of your report.

There is one point that I do not see in your report as printed in the Star, and which, I beg to suggest, might have an influence on the passage of the bill. It is this:

The light of all the gaslights, six to eight thousand in number, now dimly lighting nearly all of the streets of Washington and Georgetown; of the hundreds of gaslights now very insufficiently lighting the public parks and other public grounds, and of the electric lights now lighting a few of the streets and owned by private companies, can all be replaced by electric lights derived from the power of the falls, and, in addition, all of the public buildings can be so lighted with a saving of nearly $100,000 a year of the present cost of this lighting of the streets and public buildings and grounds. (See marked paragraph, page 10 of my report of July 18, 1894, as contained in Senate Executive Document 154, Fifty-third Congress, second session, copy herewith.) And in addition to the power required for this lighting, there would remain at the lowest stage of the Potomac nearly 2,000 horsepower that could be utilized for pumping from the United States mains in the city to the extensive high-service area of the city, and for other public purposes, replacing with great economy the steam power now used for all of these purposes. (See marked paragraph of same report, page 7 of same document.)

The proposition for the United States to acquire by the fair and equitable method provided for in the bill all of the water rights at the Great Falls was first suggested by me and strongly advocated when I was in charge of the Washington Aqueduct in my report of March 20, 1894 (see marked paragraph, on page 25, of the document before referred to); and was approved by the late Chief of Engineers, General Casey. (See page 17 of same document.)

It carried out, it will without doubt prove of incalculable benefit to the United States and the District of Columbia, and I shall regard it as one of the most important acts of my long career in the service of the United States.

With much respect, your obedient servant,

GEORGE H. ELLIOT,
Colonel of Engineers (Retired).

Hon. J. W. BARCOCK,
Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia,
House of Representatives.

Mr. Chairman, it would not perhaps serve any useful purpose to call attention in detail to all of the reports which have been made by the various officials who have investigated this subject, but suffice it to say that numerous reports have been made by persons who are familiar with this question and at the instance of the Government, with a view to ascertaining the necessity of the acquisition of this property and the expediency of the Government taking immediate steps in order to obtain it.

Now, the questions that are presented, it seems to me, are as follows: First, does the Government or the District own a sufficient water supply to answer the present and immediate future demands of the inhabitants of Washington? If this question can be answered affirmatively, then it is clear it would be unnecessary and unwise to incur any expense for the purpose of securing more water.

Mr. PITNEY. That is right.

Mr. KING. But still it would be unjust to the proponents of this measure were I not to invite attention to another reason which is urged very strongly for the acquisition of the property. I do not know that it can be stated with greater clearness than in the Senate report, which was prepared by the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. This report, which is dated January 20, 1896, employs this language:

There can be no question of greater importance to the people of any large city than that of securing a sufficient supply of water, pure in quality, and with a reserve in quantity ample for the demands of the future. Here it is not merely a local question, but one of importance to the whole country as well. Washington is the temporary residence of thousands, and is visited annually by millions coming from all parts of the country.

The United States owns a large share of the property. The public buildings, parks, and grounds, as a whole, are the finest in the world. The demand for new buildings and other improvements will be frequent and imperative, as the machinery of government must continually and steadily increase with the increase of population of the whole country. Whatever concerns the welfare of this city, therefore, will become more and more of general interest.

Mr. PITNEY. Who says it is not sufficient?

Mr. KING. Senator PROCTOR. I have the report here and read from it; and he buttresses that statement with numerous reports made by officials of the Government.

Gen. Thomas Lincoln Casey, brigadier-general and Chief of Engineers, approved a measure of this character, and approved the findings of Colonel Elliott that the water supply of the city was inadequate.

He states in one of his letters:

I concur in the conclusions of the board that it is feasible to utilize the water power of the Great Falls as specified in the resolution, and that this power will be insufficient to furnish light to private consumers.

Now, Capt. John G. D. Knight and Colonel Elliott, by reason of a resolution passed on April 20, 1894, requiring the Secretary of War to make an investigation as to the expediency of acquiring this property, made an elaborate report; and in that report the acquisition of the property at Great Falls is recommended. They considered the feasibility of generating electrical power for lighting purposes, answering the question affirmatively, and also investigated the question of the water supply of the city, and its probable future needs for culinary and domestic purposes. I invite my friend's attention to this report in the executive document to which I have just called attention.

Mr. Chairman, Edward Burr, captain, of the Corps of Engineers, also submits a report favoring legislation of this character, and he states:

There can be no question that the existence of the Great Falls of the Potomac, its water rights, power, and privileges, is of great value to the city of Washington and the District of Columbia.

The United States, directly through its ownership of large amounts of property in the District and indirectly through the presence in the city of many of its officers and of many visitors, all brought here by reason of its being the seat of government, has certainly a large interest in all that pertains to the welfare of the District of Columbia.

He further adds:

The United States first acquired land at Great Falls and the water rights appertaining thereto when the provision of the present system of water supply was undertaken. When the increase of the water supply was undertaken in accordance with the act of July 15, 1882, certain additional lands and water rights were taken. The claims of the parties owning these lands and water rights have not yet been settled. With each increase in the water supply the same difficulty will no doubt be encountered in arriving at a settlement with the parties interested for the land and water rights taken.

It would seem to be but a wise business foresight on the part of the United States to acquire now, for the benefit of the District of Columbia, such lands and water rights at Great Falls as will suffice for all time. The acquisition of all of the water rights at Great Falls will probably never be necessary for the supply of water, but it will be necessary in order to put an end to contentions arising from a divided ownership of these rights, and the excess above that necessary for the water supply can be used to very great advantage for electric lighting and power purposes.

He further states:

These reports show the desirability of sole ownership by the United States of all the water rights at Great Falls, and also show that the water available at the lowest stage of the river is sufficient to furnish a supply of 200,000,000 gallons per diem, and in addition to furnish sufficient power for lighting all of the public buildings, grounds, and streets in a much better manner and at a considerable annual saving over the methods now in vogue.

The general drift in municipal lighting at the present time is toward municipal ownership of the plant for such lighting. Such ownership has resulted in an increase in both quantity and quality of the service, with a decrease in the cost. The lighting of public grounds and streets in the District of Columbia is at present very deficient—much below the standard set in other branches of municipal work—and the service should be largely increased. By the use of the large water power available at Great Falls this service can be raised to that degree of efficiency that modern requirements demand, and a model service can be secured at a minimum of annual expense.

In addition to this, Mr. Chairman, Brigadier-General Craighill, Chief of Engineers, recommends the passage of a measure of this character.

A measure similar to the one under consideration, which has the same object in view, was referred to Captain Gaillard; and he writes as follows:

OFFICE OF THE WASHINGTON AQUEDUCT,
2728 PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE,
Washington, D. C., April 22, 1896.

Brig. Gen. W. P. CRAIGHILL,
Chief of Engineers, U. S. A., Washington, D. C.

GENERAL: I have the honor to return herewith H. R. bill No. 7066, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session, referred to me for report by Department letter of April 17, 1896 (E. D. 14877).

The records of this office show that every attempt to increase the water supply by operations on the dam at Great Falls has been the basis of claims or threatened suits against the United States by riparian owners either for the overflow of lands and property or for the diversion of a certain amount of the volume of flow of the river.

Almost all of these claims remain still unsettled, and as the consumption of water by the city is rapidly increasing, and as it is but a question of a comparatively few years before another conduit will be required, it would appear to be of vital importance that the riparian and water rights of the United States at Great Falls should be clearly established and all existing claims definitely settled.

The bill in question provides for the settlement of these claims, and further provides for the acquirement by the United States of all water rights not now owned by the United States at and in the vicinity of Great Falls and such land as may be necessary; and it assures to the city the control of a supply of water far in excess of all probable future requirements for domestic purposes, the surplus of which, it is stated in the report of the board convened by special order No. 19, headquarters Corps of Engineers, United States Army, Washington, D. C., April 19, 1894, it is feasible and advisable to utilize in lighting by electricity the public buildings and grounds and the streets of the District of Columbia.

It therefore appears that the objects to be accomplished by the bill should be beneficial not only to the United States but also to all of the other riparian owners in the vicinity.

His communication also contains a few recommendations respecting the form of the bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that all the reports that have been made, either by the representatives of the District or the representatives of the Government, have been to the effect that the interests of the city would best be subserved by the acquisition of the entire property.

Now, my friend from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] says that he understands some land has been acquired, and the purpose of this measure is to enable persons owning the same to dispose of it to the Government. Land has been acquired upon both sides of Great Falls. It was acquired many years before my distinguished friend came to Congress; it was acquired many years ago, long before there was any thought of the Government acquiring any of this property or before water was taken from the river for the benefit of the residents of Washington.

As stated by the chairman of the committee, General Butler purchased from a number of persons who owned land on both sides of the river, and he organized a company, and that company subsequently transferred its interest to another company, which to-day claims to own the land upon the Virginia side which borders on the river at and near the Great Falls, and also an undivided one-half interest in the land bordering the river on the Maryland side.

Have we sufficient water for the present needs of the city and for its future requirements? I think the testimony that has been adduced compels us to answer this question in the negative. Then how shall the requirements be met? Only by condemnation. Aside from the question of water for domestic purposes is the question of lighting. My friend seems to treat that question very lightly.

But it does seem to me, in view of the fact that municipalities are acquiring public utilities and taking from private persons the authority to control the water supply and the plants and power employed in lighting the streets and public buildings, that it would be wise for the city now to acquire this property, before any valuable improvements have been made or any expenditures have been incurred by the present owners.

Mr. Speaker, there are suits pending, and I assert that the decision of the Court of Claims, which I have before me, and which is found in the sixteenth volume of the reports of that court, indicates the liability of the Government for taking water from the river. This decision was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States (112 U. S.). So that the question of liability has been finally settled adversely to the contention of the Government.

This city has taken, even according to the confession of my friend, 20,000,000 gallons per day to which it has no title. A suit is pending for damages against the Government for the value of the power destroyed by this taking, and there is no question but that if the first decision was right, the doctrine announced will be confirmed when another case involving the same rights is brought before the court. Would it not be better, in view of the fact of the liability of the Government, to acquire all the water rights, so that for all time the question of an adequate water supply for the city need not concern the Government or the inhabitants of Washington?

Mr. BRUCKER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. BRUCKER. In what way is the water being used by the claimants?

Mr. KING. They are not using it at all.

Mr. BRUCKER. Under what theory, then, do they present a claim for damages against the Government for taking this water from the river?

Mr. KING. Under the theory that if you deprive them of water from which power may be derived, you are liable for such diversion.

Mr. BRUCKER. Hereafter?

Mr. PITNEY. Consequential or inferential damages.

Mr. KING. That was the view I took. I was surprised when I saw the decision of the court. I thought the damages ought to be only nominal. Of course there was a trespass, and under the old riparian law if you divert water above a landowner you must return it to the stream before it reaches his property, undiminished in quantity and undeteriorated in quality.

This city has taken from the Potomac River, my friend concedes, 45,000,000 gallons per diem, 25,000,000 of which the Government has paid for, damages to the extent of $15,000 having been allowed the plaintiff in its suit against the Government for that taking. Since then, as I have stated, the Government has taken additional water, and suits are now pending in the Court of Claims the ad damnum being $600,000 or $800,000 for such taking. The court seems to rest its determination upon the proposition that these owners had a right to have the water flow where it was accustomed to flow.

Mr. BRUCKER. Irrespective of the question whether they were peculiarly damaged or not?

Mr. KING. Yes, that is the theory that the decision of the Court of Claims seems to be predicated upon; and also upon the ground, perhaps, that there was a permanent diversion.

Mr. BRUCKER. The question is not a question of actual damages, the amount of damages that could actually be proved, but a mere question as to the taking of the water.

Mr. KING. Let me suggest this to my friend: Suppose that the riparian owners should prove to the court that they could have obtained water power, and from the utilization of that water power they could have obtained a profit; does he not think that in a case of that character, where the proof was clear, they would be entitled at least to an injunction restraining the city from using the water where the statute of limitations had not run?

Mr. BRUCKER. That is based on the supposition that they are using the water, or are about to use the water, and that the taking of the water in this way is a peculiar and special damage to them.

Mr. KING. I think under the riparian law, whether a man uses the water or not, an injunction would lie to restrain a party from diverting it.

Mr. PITNEY. Not in the absence of proof of substantial damage. His right could be preserved by getting a judgment for nominal damages. He could not get an injunction unless he could show a real injury.

Mr. BRUCKER. He would have to allege in the complaint damages and irreparable injury.

Mr. PITNEY. A judgment for nominal damages would prevent the running of the statute of limitations.

Mr. KING. I do not agree with my friend—

Mr. BRUCKER. Has the District to-day any riparian rights, any frontage on this river at any point where they intend to take water?

Mr. KING. Yes, the District owns jointly with the Great Falls Company an interest—the exact amount of which I am unable to state, for there seems to be some controversy—in a portion of the land on the Maryland side of Great Falls. But before my friend departs from the first question he asked me, I desire to say, assuming that there have been no damages and that only nominal damages could be recovered against the Government, that would be an argument in favor of immediate acquisition, because if the owners are going to extend the system, the Government and District would be required to pay substantial damages for the taking of the water and for the improvements made.

So, whether the owners have been damaged by the subsequent taking is immaterial. I agree with the gentleman that the damages ought to have been only nominal and that the decisions of the Court of Claims and of the Supreme Court of the United States are somewhat mysterious and unfathomable to me. I do not see upon what hypothesis they awarded $15,000 damages, unless it was for a permanent depreciation, but they did so.

Mr. PITNEY. That was not for temporary diversion of the water, but for permanent impairment of the property rights, a very different thing. The question is whether any large claims ought to be allowed for temporary diversion of the water, as we take it from day to day or from month to month.

Mr. KING. I do not know that an answer to that question is necessary to a determination of this matter or to reach a proper conclusion with respect to the course which we ought to pursue at this time. I agree with my friend from New Jersey and the gentleman from Michigan, that the damages by our taking water from day to day would be merely nominal. It would be a mere naked trespass, for which only nominal damages ought to be recovered.

But, as I stated a moment ago, if individuals go to the expense of putting in a power dam and power plant, then if we desire to acquire additional water for domestic purposes or for other purposes beneficial to the city, we would have more than nominal damages to pay. We would have to pay whatever damages the parties had sustained by reason of being deprived of the power which they had developed by the expenditures made.

Mr. BRUCKER. Would we not run up against the same question even though we should proceed to acquire riparian rights by condemnation proceedings? Suppose persons there had acquired property rights, had erected manufacturing plants, and were using the water for manufacturing purposes; if the Government should then undertake to divert the water or to take the water from the stream, would we not run up against the same question?

Mr. KING. After we had acquired the property?

Mr. BRUCKER. After we had acquired riparian rights on the stream.

Mr. KING. Perhaps my friend does not understand the locus, or the situation. This bill proposes to purchase land on both sides of the falls. If we acquire land on both sides, there would be no other place where power could be developed; the canal, dam, and the machinery must be placed there. So that if the city or the Government should now, under this bill, acquire land on both sides of the Great Falls, it would preclude any person from putting in a power plant or developing any power.

Mr. BRUCKER. The Government would then acquire all the site, with all the riparian rights that could be used for manufacturing purposes?

Mr. KING. Exactly. So that if we only utilized 200,000,000 gallons per day for culinary purposes, and did not utilize the several hundred million gallons which would yet remain—sufficient according to the report of experts to develop power to the extent of about 10,000 horsepower—the city later on could utilize that power if it desired; and no person could acquire any rights there in the meantime, because there would be no ground upon which they could place their power plant.

Mr. PITNEY. Does the gentleman know what is the total flow of water in dry weather at Great Falls?

Mr. KING. I have not the figures.

Mr. PITNEY. It is more than 200,000,000 gallons?

Mr. KING. Oh, yes; very much more.

Mr. PITNEY. Is it six or eight hundred million gallons a day?

Mr. KING. Oh, yes; more than that—considerably more—sufficient to furnish 200,000,000 gallons daily to the city (which may be diverted absolutely and not restored to the stream), and then sufficient would remain to develop power enough to light the city—all the public buildings and streets—with electricity.

Mr. PITNEY. But has the gentleman any idea how large a population 200,000,000 gallons of water per day will supply?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. PITNEY. That quantity would supply at a reasonable consumption 5,000,000 people; and in this whole city there are only 300,000.

Mr. KING. My friend differs from numerous reports which have been made and on which the committee relied, stating that 200,000,000 gallons would be sufficient for 1,000,000 people.

Mr. PITNEY. That is on the basis of 200 gallons a day for each person—man, woman, and child?

Mr. KING. I think that is the basis.

Mr. PITNEY. There is not a city in the country whose citizens legitimately use one-fourth of that amount.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And there is not a city in the country that uses half as much as the city of Washington for irrigating lawns, etc.

Mr. PITNEY. I call such irrigation a legitimate use. I am not talking about restricting the use of water for sprinkling lawns, streets, and so forth. I am including that when I speak of legitimate consumption. And I say that the legitimate consumption of water in our cities can not exceed 40 gallons, or at most 50 gallons, per capita per day.

Mr. KING. I did not yield for a speech. I will undertake to answer any proper question.

Mr. PITNEY. The question I asked in the first place has not been answered. What is the total daily flow of the Potomac River at the Great Falls—not in the time of a freshet, but in a dry time?

Mr. KING. I can not state exactly. According to my recollection it is several billion gallons per day.

It is sufficient, as I have already stated, to furnish all of the water that is necessary for domestic purposes in the city as well as for all power purposes.

Mr. PITNEY. And the proposition is to condemn it all?

Mr. KING. Yes; it provides for the condemnation of the rights of all persons claiming interests either in the land or water at the Great Falls. The report of the engineers states that it will save $100,000 per annum if the city will, by the utilization of the power which the water at the Great Falls will produce, illumine the streets and public buildings. That is, $100,000 can be saved each year, by the city taking from the hands of private persons the duty of lighting the public streets and buildings and undertaking this work under the direction of the city officials.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KING. If the gentleman will withhold a moment, I will yield first to my friend from Maryland, who, I understand, desires to make an inquiry.

Mr. MUDD. My purpose was to take the floor in my own right against the bill.

Mr. KING. That is the gentleman's right.

Mr. MUDD. But I will ask the gentleman, however, this question with his consent: He said, in answer to an inquiry of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRUCKER], that if we could go ahead and construct the plant, machinery, and so forth, at the expense of the cost of the acquisition of the water rights, that we are now talking of, that expense would be very much higher to them. Now, who do you mean by "them?" The power company or the Government?

Mr. KING. I refer to the company and their successors—any one who may acquire the right.

Mr. MUDD. And that company is the Great Falls Power Company, possessed of all the property there at this time.

Mr. KING. So far as the committee is advised or the report exhibits, and so far as the decision of the Court of Claims is involved and the findings of fact as reported by it, the present company owns all of the land bordering on the river on the Virginia side, as well as an undivided interest on the Maryland side.

Mr. MUDD. But the gentleman will concede, I presume, that the title to the bed of the river is in the State of Maryland.

Mr. KING. Well, there may be some question as to that, but if so the State of Maryland, by a grant in 1854 and by a subsequent grant in 1894, gave unlimited and unreserved power not only for the construction of dams, aqueducts, canals, and whatever was required to divert the waters of the river at the point indicated, but also granted the right to divert water from the Potomac for other purposes.

Mr. MUDD. I only wanted your theory of the matter. I am content.

Mr. KING. So whether or not the fee to the bed of the river is in the State of Maryland is entirely immaterial, in view of the grants which have been made by the State.

Mr. MUDD. That is what I wanted to hear from the gentleman. Now I would like to have time in my own right.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Before the gentleman proceeds, I wish to ask the gentleman from Utah to whom this grant was made by the State of Maryland of the right of the diversion of this water for power and culinary purposes in the Potomac River—whether to the Government itself or to the Great Falls Power Company?

Mr. MUDD. To the Great Falls Power Company.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Was it made to the District of Columbia or to the Great Falls Power Company?

Mr. KING. I could give the gentleman the exact facts by reference to the statutes of Maryland. The object was to supply the city of Washington with water—

Mr. NEWLANDS. To the exclusion of the Great Falls Power Company?

Mr. KING. The act was passed in 1853, and subsequently a grant was made to the Great Falls Power Company of a somewhat similar character, as I remember it. If the gentleman will pardon me a moment, however, I think I can refer to the matter in detail, which will be more satisfactory than mere recollection.

Mr. MUDD. The grant was made to the Great Falls Power Company.

Mr. KING. In 1894 the legislature of the State of Maryland passed the following measure:

The Great Falls Power Company are hereby granted the right to erect such dam or dams or other structures in the Potomac River in this State, between the Great Falls and the United States Government aqueduct dam, as may be necessary to use the water and water power at or near Great Falls for those purposes and objects set forth in this measure.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Did that grant interfere at all with the previous grants to which the gentleman has referred?

Mr. PITNEY. By its terms it seems not. It only permits the construction of power dams near the Great Falls or between the Great Falls and the aqueduct dam.

Mr. KING. I do not think it did, but I will state to the gentleman from Nevada, if there is any conflict the first grant, I think, would take precedence over the other.

But if the Government acquired by condemnation proceedings the right to the Great Falls Power Company, any right acquired by the company from any grant made by the State of Maryland would pass to the General Government, and it would be in the power of Congress to prevent the making of the improvements by any private corporation whatever.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that the time of the gentleman from Utah has expired?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask unanimous consent for an extension of five minutes, so that I can put some questions to the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nevada asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Utah [Mr. KING] be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. KING. There will be no objection to my friend from Maryland [Mr. MUDD] having time later on.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to inquire further as to whether any dam at present exists there?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Erected by whom?

Mr. KING. By the Government.
Mr. NEWLANDS. Has any dam been erected by the power company?

Mr. KING. No.
Mr. NEWLANDS. Has it been deemed advisable by the Government to raise that dam?

Mr. KING. Upon two occasions.
Mr. NEWLANDS. Do the District Commissioners advise the raising of that dam still farther?

Mr. KING. Yes.
Mr. NEWLANDS. Will that require ownership of both banks of the Potomac River in order to accomplish it?

Mr. KING. Well, I think that perhaps under the condemnation proceedings initiated a great many years ago we have a right to the banks for the erection of the dam as it was then constructed, but we have no right to increase the height of the dam, and therefore I am compelled to answer the question of my friend affirmatively with this modification, that on the Maryland side it is conceded that the Government of the United States is a joint owner with the power company.

Mr. NEWLANDS. On the Maryland side?

Mr. KING. On the Maryland side.

Mr. NEWLANDS. On the Virginia side it has no rights.

Mr. KING. On the Virginia side it has no rights except such as were acquired under the first condemnation proceedings.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And in order to raise the dam higher it would be necessary to acquire rights on the Virginia side.

Mr. KING. I think that is unquestionably true.

Mr. PITNEY. That is not the point of this condemnation now proposed. It is not for the purpose of raising the dam higher, but it is for the purpose of diverting from the river the whole of its flow.

Mr. KING. If need be.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And that means raising the dam.

Mr. PITNEY. Raising the dam higher increases the reservoir.

Mr. KING. But it overflows land on both sides.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It enlarges the reservoir.

Mr. KING. And diverts a greater flow of the river.

Mr. PITNEY. You can not divert more than the entire flow of the river.

Mr. KING. You can divert more than is now being taken.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Do I understand the gentleman to claim that the present dam will enable the diversion of the entire flow of the river?

Mr. PITNEY. I want to ask some questions myself about that; but I do undertake to say that the present dam and arrangements there permit the diversion of 76,000,000 gallons a day.

Mr. KING. How many?

Mr. PITNEY. Seventy-six million gallons a day, and the amount consumed, used, and wasted, of which three-quarters is waste at present, is only 45,000,000 gallons a day.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. PITNEY. I should like to ask the gentleman from Utah a question or two myself, if the gentleman from Maryland will permit.

Mr. MUDD. Certainly.

Mr. PITNEY. I want to inquire whether the waterworks dam is above the Great Falls?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. PITNEY. How far above?

Mr. KING. A short distance, a few hundred yards.

Mr. PITNEY. And there is no water power in use between the waterworks dam and tide water, is there?

Mr. KING. No.

Mr. PITNEY. There is no dam across the Potomac River below the Government dam by which power is stored and used for manufacturing or other purposes?

Mr. KING. No.

Mr. PITNEY. So that this present proposition is to condemn the right to construct, if necessary, another dam at the Great Falls, instead of above the Great Falls, where the present dam is, so as to divert out of the river the whole flow of the river, amounting to several billion gallons per day?

Mr. KING. This proposition is dual in its character. First, it is to enable the District to enjoy the use of that property free from the vexations of divided ownership; secondly, to obviate the necessity of defending suits now pending, aggregating $600,000 or $700,000, for the diversion, as my friend has conceded, of 75,000,000 gallons.

Mr. PITNEY. No; I did not concede that. I say the capacity of the works is sufficient to divert that much.

Mr. KING. I understood the gentleman to say that the diversion was that much.

Mr. PITNEY. It is 45,000,000 gallons; but we could with the present works take 76,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose this bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. You have a right to be recognized, as you are a member of the committee.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the purpose of this bill, it is not merely to increase the water supply of the District in the ordinary sense of water supply, but the object of the bill as set forth in the substitute proposed by the committee is as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War shall, within three months after the approval of this act, cause a survey to be made of such of the lands and islands within the general description in section 1 of this act as in his judgment may be required for the construction and maintenance of canal, power house, and other buildings necessary to the employment of the water rights and privileges aforesaid for generating electricity for use in the District of Columbia, and for other public purposes.

In other words, the object of this bill is to provide a means by which the Government can generate and supply its own electricity for all public purposes in the District of Columbia. Now, the Government of the United States, acting for the District of Columbia, either has or has not a sufficient title to acquire and to exercise these water rights and privileges. If it has sufficient title under the cession made by the State of Maryland in the act of 1853 or otherwise, why, then the bill is useless. If we have not sufficient title, then the Government has to acquire the title.

We may assume from the fact that the bill is here that the interests behind the bill, the District Commissioners and those who think this project feasible and desirable, concede that the Government has not the title necessary to control these water rights and to utilize the power and the privileges incident thereto. Now, if we have not these rights, we have got to get them; and the question is how to obtain them. The chairman of the committee and the gentleman in charge of the bill both claim that all the property rights at Great Falls are in the Great Falls Power Company; that that company is a corporation which has capitalized and owns the rights obtained by the late Gen. B. F. Butler alongside of and in the Potomac River.

Gentlemen claim here that the Great Falls Power Company owns practically all the property at Great Falls, and my contention is that the company owns practically nothing at Great Falls. Bear in mind that Great Falls are not in the District of Columbia, but are situated between the State of Maryland and the State of Virginia, in the Potomac River, about 10 miles or more from this city.

Now, if the Great Falls Power Company owns all this property, including the water and the water rights and the bed of the river, then of course we can condemn and acquire those rights; but if it be established that the State of Maryland owns and controls the bed of the Potomac River at this point and is the only power from which title can be obtained to the water rights incident to it, then we are confronted with another and very serious matter. Then, if we propose to go on and condemn the bed of the Potomac River, we must get over or get away from the generally accepted theory that you can not sue a State. Now, let us look at the language of the Maryland legislature in the grant to the Great Falls Company, made in 1864. The language is this:

The right to erect such dam or dams or other structures in the Potomac River in this State, between the Great Falls and the United States Government aqueduct dam, as may be necessary to use the water and water power at or near Great Falls for the purposes and objects set forth in its charter: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to give said Great Falls Power Company authority to interfere with any existing right of the United States or of any person or corporation in said Potomac River or the waters thereof: Provided, That the acceptance of this act shall oblige and bind the said Great Falls Power Company to take, occupy, use, interfere with, or damage no property or right vested in the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, acquired as the successor of the Potomac Company or otherwise, and to endanger no part of the canal or works of said canal company in any degree by liability to flood, except by or under written agreement or agreements between said power company on the one part and the said canal company and the trustees for the time being as the bondholders of said canal company under its mortgage of 1848 and 1878 on the other part, and approved by the board of public works.

In other words, the Great Falls Power Company, by the express language of the act of the Maryland legislature, have powers to "use the water" of the Potomac River at Great Falls for the objects of the charter of that company, said objects being, in general, as set forth in its charter obtained from Virginia, the acquisition and use of water rights and water power, using the same for manufacturing and other purposes and for generating, transmitting, selling, and leasing electricity. Now, it would seem that that was a pretty broad power, and yet my contention is, and it is borne out by the authorities, that the language of the act conferred upon the Great Falls Power Company no property rights at all.

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MUDD. Certainly.

Mr. BABCOCK. If they buy and own all property that abuts on the river, will they have no property rights?

Mr. MUDD. Riparian rights, but not ownership of the river bed and the rights incident to it. They would not have the right to take all the water that they could use, without stint or limit, under riparian rights. The right to the control and use of the water in the manner and to the extent that is needed and desired by a power company and for the purposes of this bill, involving in its exercise, as it does, the erection of dams and structures across the stream, is a thing that is incident not to riparian ownership, but to ownership of the bed. Now, I have read the language of the Maryland legislature that conveys to the Great Falls Power Company the power that is granted by it. The gentleman who prepared the report now seeks to sustain the title, as he indicates, in the Great Falls Power Company, and he calls attention to the case of the Illinois Central Railroad against the State of Illinois, which is reported in 146 United States Reports.

In that very case, which is relied upon here as sustaining the proprietary rights of the Great Falls Power Company, it was expressly laid down and set forth that language similar to this, language broader and more comprehensive than this, which was used in the grant of the State of Illinois to the Illinois Central Railroad, conveys not an easement, not an indefeasible proprietary right, but simply a revocable license to the use of property which the State can recall and take charge of at any time it sees fit. The same decision was made in a Pennsylvania case, reported in 36 Pennsylvania, being the case, if I recollect aright, of the Barclay Railroad Company vs. Ingham. In that case, also, it was said that language similar and stronger than this, conveyed, not an easement, not any right in the fee, but simply a revocable license which the State could take back at any time it saw fit.

Now, the language used by the Great Falls Power Company is not as strong, is not as comprehensive, as that used in the two cases I have referred to. My contention is, and it is one which will not be seriously controverted, that all the Great Falls Power Company has is a revocable license to use the water of the Potomac River for the purpose of generating electricity and other similar and kindred purposes incident thereto and essential to the usufruct thereof. If it is a license, it is not transferable; it is not assignable; and that being true, then the Great Falls Power Company have no proprietary right whatever which can form the subject-matter of condemnation proceedings.

Of course gentlemen will answer me at once that it matters not who owns the property, because the condemnation proceedings will act upon the title and the interest of all parties concerned, whoever they may be; but I say it does matter, because if the Great Falls Power Company has no proprietary right, then the right is in the State of Maryland, and those rights can not be obtained by condemnation unless you are prepared to assert and to hold that the United States Government can condemn property belonging to the State of Maryland or any other State. It is well known in the House that the Potomac River belongs to the State of Maryland.

By the original grant from Charles I to Cæcilias Calvert the boundary of the State of Maryland runs to the south bank of the Potomac River, so that the State of Maryland owns the whole Potomac River. That is admitted by decisions of the court of appeals of our State, by legislative proceedings, and it has, if I mistake not, Congressional recognition. The State of Maryland is the proprietor of the bed and of the stream. Not only is the bed of the river in the territory of Maryland, but it actually belongs to the State as public property, and before you can condemn that property you must admit that you can sue a State, which no member of this House will hardly contend for.

My contention is that the Great Falls Power Company has no transferable rights, has no rights that can be acquired by condemnation, and that you can only acquire the property from the State of Maryland by agreement with the State, through her legislature, or by making her, with her consent, a party to proceedings which are tantamount to a suit.

In 1853, when Congress desired to acquire rights in the river—and this is exactly in line with the theory that I am advancing—it did not provide for the acquisition nor make the necessary appropriation for putting it into effect until it had obtained the consent of the State of Maryland.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MUDD. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. How did the United States obtain the rights which it now has?

Mr. MUDD. The rights the United States now have in the Potomac River, outside of the unimportant incidental riparian rights growing out of the land condemned by the side of it, were obtained through the joint operation of an act of Congress of the year 1853, I believe, and an act of the Maryland legislature of 1853. Congress passed the act for the acquisition of these rights, but said it should not go into operation, should not take effect, until the State of Maryland had assented to it, and the State of Maryland did assent in the act of 1853.

Mr. HEPBURN. What was the extent of that consent? Was it not to all the rights the United States contended for?

Mr. MUDD. My answer is this. The rights acquired by that act were these: It gave the United States the power to acquire such rights there as were needed to supply the citizens of Washington with water for ordinary purposes. My contention is that the supplying of water for such purposes as are contemplated by this bill must be differentiated from the supply of water for ordinary domestic purposes, such only as could have been contemplated at the time of the acquisition of the rights now possessed by the United States, and that the newly developed and highly and financially valuable use of water power, which an advancing science has evolved and made known, as the use of it for generating electricity, could not have been thought of and could not have been conferred by the mere grant of a right to a supply of water for the purposes then in vogue.

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. MUDD. Certainly.

Mr. BABCOCK. Does the gentleman concede that the United States has the right there for domestic consumption of water?

Mr. MUDD. I would assume that; yes, sir.

Mr. BABCOCK. If it has, how has the Supreme Court of the United States rendered judgment in favor of parties for water taken for domestic purposes, and why are there suits upon the docket for three-quarters of a million dollars for taking additional water?

Mr. MUDD. I am not familiar with those suits. We all know that it is a fact that the State owns this river. The act of the Maryland legislature conferring the right of domestic consumption is referred to in the report accompanying this bill which you acquiesce in. I do not know precisely the ground on which those damages were awarded.

Mr. PITNEY. The gentleman contends, as I understand, that the Government has not the right to use this water for domestic purposes, because the Supreme Court has rendered judgment for water taken and because a few more suits are pending on account of new dams which have been put in to obtain additional water?

Mr. MUDD. I say that if the United States Government has not been able effectually to acquire rights in pursuance and by the aid of an act of the legislature of Maryland, I think it may be much more strongly held that it can not do so without such an act. The Government comes in and undertakes to acquire property rights on the Potomac River which you say it has not now. If it must acquire those rights, it must acquire them from the people who own them.

Mr. PITNEY. But the Maryland legislature has ceded the right to these other parties.

Mr. MUDD. The act of the Maryland legislature on this subject was passed in 1894. By that act it granted a right, which the United States Supreme Court, in the case of the Illinois Central Railroad, has said is only a revocable license—nothing more; and if it is a revocable license, and nothing more, it can not be the foundation of a right which those people can convey to another party. They can not convey a right greater in extent than that conferred upon them by the act of the Maryland legislature.

Mr. PITNEY. It has been stated that the Supreme Court of the United States, affirming, on appeal, the finding of the Court of Claims, has given a certain judgment against the United States in behalf of these property owners for damages. Does the gentleman know the amount of this judgment?

Mr. MUDD. I do not.

Mr. PITNEY. The amount has not yet been stated, but it is stated that claims are pending for a large amount.

Mr. MUDD. I do not know the amount.

Mr. PITNEY. Has the gentleman investigated sufficiently to know on what basis the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court of the United States have adjudicated that damages ought to be awarded for the temporary diversion of the water?

Mr. MUDD. I am not familiar with that decision; I have not examined it. I do not consider that it is material to the particular matter now before us.

It may be contended that during the existence of this license to the Great Falls Water Power Company, so long as the license is unrevoked, acts may be done by the Government which may form the subject of damages. But the State of Maryland can revoke that act at any time. The rights acquired under it constitute no interest which is assignable. That has been decided by the supreme court of Pennsylvania and the Supreme Court of the United States.

It may not enter into this controversy, perhaps, but it is not improper for me to mention that after the acquisition of these alleged rights by the Great Falls Power Company they came here to Congress and stated, with much innocence and an apparent desire to serve the Government, that if the Government wished to acquire the rights which this company claimed to have acquired under an act of the Maryland legislature in 1894, the Government might have them for the very inconsiderable sum of $500,000. How were these rights acquired by these parties?

They went down to the Maryland legislature two or three years ago, and with much shrewdness—I remember to have heard something about it at the time; I did not happen to be in the legislature then—they went down there to the Maryland legislature and talked about this experiment in the domain of science which they wanted to make. They asked permission to use—that is the language of the grant to them—to use the water of the Potomac River to experiment—to use that great water power in generating electricity. They did not pay a cent for this privilege; they have not expended a cent—not a solitary dime in pursuance of this grant. They got from the Maryland legislature a right to use—only to use—

Mr. KING. Does the gentleman say that it is customary, when legislatures grant to private persons a charter to operate some industrial enterprise, to make them pay for it?

Mr. MUDD. Oh, no; not in Maryland, not even in those days. I simply said that this privilege cost these parties nothing. I hope it does not excite surprise in the mind of my friend to say that it did not cost anything.

Mr. KING. Oh, no; not at all. Now, one other question. Does my friend think it is very improper for a legislature to permit the utilization of some of the agencies of nature to promote public purposes?

Mr. MUDD. Oh, not at all.

Mr. KING. I thought the gentleman was declaiming against that policy.

Mr. MUDD. Not at all. I claim simply that the State of Maryland granted to this company the right to use the water of the Potomac River for specific purposes, and if, in the exercise of that power, while it is unquestioned and unrevoked, they constructed machinery and erected a plant by which they would generate and transmit electricity for lighting purposes to the city of Washington, I claim it would be nothing wrong or illegal on the part of the company to furnish that electricity for the District of Columbia for lighting purposes. But I claim, Mr. Chairman, that they could not go beyond that. They have not the power to divest themselves of the rights granted to them by the State to transfer to others.

I claim that they have nothing to transfer to the United States or to anyone else; and in connection with that contention on my part, and as bearing upon it and bearing it out, I was proceeding to say that it would be strange indeed if the people obtaining a right to so use the water power of the State of Maryland, by a license granted from that State, should undertake to capitalize their good luck, and sell nothing—for they have nothing to sell—and should be allowed to sell it, for the sum of $500,000. I think it strange if Maryland should be placed in such an anomalous position, and the strangeness of it, fortifies my contention that the law of Maryland did not mean the conveyance of a right to do any such thing, and did not in fact operate as any such conveyance.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I claim, first, that the Great Falls Power Company has no authority or right to sell or transmit to the United States any grant which they have received from the State of Maryland. In that view of the case I claim that there is nothing in the possession of the Great Falls Power Company that can be condemned for public use, and if that be true, and it is sustained by the decisions to which I have referred, the only authority that can do anything or can give a title to the ownership of this property is the State of Maryland itself, and to do that we must go to the legislature of Maryland and get its assent, and not expect to acquire that right by the condemnation of something claimed to be held by this company at the Great Falls.

Mr. KING. Now, if the gentleman will permit me, if the Great Falls Company had no title, as I understand him—

Mr. MUDD. I do not say it has no title. I say it has no transmissible title.

Mr. KING (continuing). Then it has no title and has nothing which in a court of justice could be considered as of sufficient importance to justify a verdict or award to obtain possession of the property. In other words, it has no title whatever under the contention of the gentleman.

Now, if that be true, will it not make the proceedings against the people who obtain title all the simpler, and the Government would have to pay just that much less for the purpose of acquiring a title which is necessary for the public use? If that be true, if these people have no right that can be transmitted, the Government can acquire the right they have and will have to pay them nothing for it.

Mr. MUDD. The gentleman's contention may be true; but my position is that, it being clear that they have no right, and the only party having any right in the premises being the State of Maryland, and it being doubtful if you can proceed—if, indeed, it be not clear that you can not proceed—against the State, it is useless for Congress to make all this ado about nothing, when no proceedings of the kind suggested here can have any avail.

Mr. KING. Why, then, did my friend assert that these people would get $500,000 for the right?

Mr. MUDD. I think the gentleman is mistaken in that statement. I did not claim they would. I say they want to, and if it were held that they have title, which I deny, but which the gentleman asserts, then there would be some ground for their claim.

Mr. KING. You contend that they would not be entitled to anything, because they had no rights that they could transmit?

Mr. MUDD. That is my contention.

Mr. KING. Then, the proceedings would cost the Government nothing but the cost of a lawsuit.

Mr. MUDD. That is all. And it would be a useless proceeding. Of course, I apprehend that no court would take the mere expression of opinion of Congress as to the law as governing in any particular case. If it did that, I admit that this would be a very dangerous proceeding, in case the bill were passed, with Congress upholding claim of title of the Great Falls Power Company.

Mr. JENKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maryland if the question of title was raised and litigated in the several suits referred to where suits were brought to recover damages for the use of the water?

Mr. MUDD. I do not know. But I might say to the gentleman in answer, that nobody ever undertook to assert such a title to water rights at Great Falls, as might be asserted if we pass this bill. The assertion of title as against the State of Maryland never could have come up to the extent that it will come up under this bill.

Mr. JENKINS. Has Maryland ever made any claim whatever to the property, or for damages against the United States for the use of the water?

Mr. MUDD. No; because we gave to the United States the right to use the water for domestic purposes, but not to generate electricity. In other words, the State of Maryland supplied the city of Washington with water, and they are willing to supply the city of Washington with a great many other things, but not with its electric lights.

Mr. JENKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maryland if he is not speaking largely in the interest of the State of Maryland rather than the District?

Mr. MUDD. I undoubtedly always bear that interest in mind as I go along. [Laughter.]

Mr. KING. Rather for his district than the District of Columbia.

Mr. MUDD. For the State of Maryland and the District of Columbia, too. I bear them both in mind as I go along.

Mr. JENKINS. I wanted to find out whether the State of Maryland had ever made any claim whatever to this property.

Mr. MUDD. I do not know that it has. There never was any reason for it as against the rights thus far claimed by others, that I am aware of. The State of Maryland does not mind furnishing the people of the District of Columbia and those temporarily living here with water, but when it comes to water power for electrical purposes, that is a different matter, and if there be a source of wealth in the bed of the Potomac and the water over it, which nature has given and science has made known, the State of Maryland is entitled to it, and it is just as well that the State of Maryland should get the benefit of it as that some company should get it which owns nothing, has expended nothing, and yet claims tremendous rights there.

Mr. JENKINS. If the State of Maryland is recognized as the owner of this right, you have no objection to the passage of this bill, and neither has the State of Maryland?

Mr. MUDD. We will see about that when the Maryland legislature meets. It is a little premature to talk about that now. I apprehend that the State of Maryland, in the exercise of the usual generosity that has characterized her action toward the District of Columbia, might even do that. I would not undertake to guarantee that.

Mr. JENKINS. I assumed that the gentleman from Maryland was speaking solely in the interest of the title of the State of Maryland.

Mr. MUDD. I have an eye to the interests of the State of Maryland always. I am not quite sure that the State of Maryland is ready to throw away any rights or interests of value, even to the District of Columbia or to the United States.

The State of Maryland will stand upon her rights in this matter to the extent that she has them, and if the Government of the United States is to expend large sums of money for the acquisition of property rights sought to be obtained by this bill, I for one propose, as far as I am able, to see to it that the treasury of the State of Maryland shall not be overlooked in the distribution of funds in return for property rights which the State of Maryland alone can convey.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard for a few moments in opposition to this bill. I have not as much information about the matter as I should like, but I probably have more than the average member of the House has. I am opposed to the bill, Mr. Chairman, because there is no present necessity and no prospect of any public necessity in the near future for the condemnation of the water rights at the Great Falls. It is not pretended, and can not be pretended on an intelligent examination of the statistics as to the water used by the District of Columbia or of the water that is likely to be used or needed by the District of Columbia in the near future, that we require to take any additional rights at the Great Falls in order to get water for domestic consumption.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman permit me right there?

Mr. PITNEY. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The gentleman interrupted me several times. I was happy to have him do so.

Mr. PITNEY. I will yield to the gentleman gladly.

Mr. KING. My friend says we are taking no water there for culinary purposes, and that we have no right to do so. That is the inference of his remarks.

Mr. PITNEY. I said something very different from that, and I should like to have my statement taken rather than the inference of the gentleman. I say it can not be pretended on an intelligent examination of the statistics as to the water we use and the water that we shall be likely to need in the near future that there is any present necessity or any likelihood of any necessity in the near future for any additional water for domestic purposes, whether for culinary purposes or for drinking purposes.

Mr. KING. Does my friend think we do not need to exceed twenty or twenty-five million gallons per diem for culinary and domestic uses in this city?

Mr. PITNEY. I mean to say that if any reasonable economy were enforced in the use of water here—I do not mean to restrict its use at all; I mean permitting its use in the most liberal manner for household use and for sprinkling lawns and street sprinkling, and other such purposes—if any reasonable economy were enforced in the use of water for these purposes, 15,000,000 gallons a day is more than we need. I shall not confine myself, however, to that statement. I mean to say that we now use 45,000,000 gallons a day, and we now can use 75,000,000 gallons a day without any additional liability.

Mr. BABCOCK. Oh, no.

Mr. PITNEY. There may be a nominal liability to pay something in addition. There may be claims filed; but an actual present liability in a substantial amount does not exist.

Mr. KING. I agree with my friend that if this city does not need more than 15,000,000 gallons per day for present uses, having acquired by condemnation the right to use 25,000,000 gallons a day, we do not need to acquire any more, at least for some time, and if the District does not require the water for power purposes, and we do not look to the future and the future does not develop the necessity for a very greatly increased amount in excess of 25,000,000 gallons, then I say we do not need to acquire the rights of the company.

Mr. PITNEY. I go further and say that if we undertake to use 75,000,000 gallons a day, we need not institute this condemnation at the present time.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman will permit me upon that question of needed supply, the report of Col. George H. Elliott upon this subject says:

It is estimated, in the report referred to, that "other increases of the amount of water required for the supply of Washington will be necessary from time to time, and it is estimated that not less than 200,000,000 gallons per day will ultimately be required."

Mr. PITNEY. Will the gentleman refer me to the page of Colonel Elliott's report?

Mr. HEPBURN. I have not that report, but I have an extract from that report, on page 4 of the report of the committee, made by the gentleman from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Speaker, I am just as capable and the gentleman from Iowa is just as capable of making the calculation as Colonel Elliott. The gentleman himself can see the statistics from all over the country, and he knows that 40 or 50 gallons per diem per capita is a liberal allowance for all ordinary legitimate use of water for domestic purposes. He knows that 200,000,000 gallons will supply a population of 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 souls, and we have not a population of over 300,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. That will do for New Jersey.

Mr. PITNEY. The gentleman nods to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY], who nods, assenting, in reply. The gentleman knows that when those statistics from Massachusetts were obtained it was shown that there were less than 40 gallons used per capita.

Mr. MOODY. I think I know something of that subject. I should like to know where the gentleman got the statistics.

Mr. PITNEY. They are from the official hearings of our committee. The District Commissioners made a report to that effect, and the gentleman from Massachusetts did me the honor to agree with my conclusions on the subject at the time the District bill was reported.

Mr. MOODY. That it was less than 40 gallons?

Mr. PITNEY. In one case 27.

Mr. MOODY. I very much differ from your conclusion.

Mr. PITNEY. That is, where they undertake to use the water and refrain from wasting the water.

Mr. MOODY. I think the gentleman is mistaken—I am quite sure he is as to the amount.

Mr. PITNEY. Very well, I want to go a little further. The bill itself does not purport to supply water for domestic uses alone. The declaration is made that it is intended to establish a power plant, and collect water, not for aqueduct purposes, but for the purpose of running a manufacturing plant, an electric plant, and some other such purpose. There is no need of any such water rights to supply Washington with water—none whatever. We are now taking 45,000,000 gallons, but could with the present works take 75,000,000 without changing them in the least—I mean so far as the Great Falls is concerned—and then, in addition, when the Lydecker tunnel is completed, which gentlemen have just voted for, that will enable us to use 75,000,000 if we wish.

Now, the gentleman from Utah [Mr. KING] says we have only condemned the right up to 25,000,000 gallons per diem. Very well; the contention I make is that there is no substantial liability for what we use in excess of this amount, unless the owners of the Great Falls could use in useful manufacture the water we are diverting. In that case they could call upon the United States Government for substantial damages. As it is now the water would run to waste over the falls if the city did not take it, and so there is no liability for substantial damages by reason of the excessive diversion. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] says that suits have been filed aggregating several hundred thousand dollars.

I asked the gentleman from Utah how many claims had been allowed, and he tells me only one, and that was away back in the early part of the century, for about $15,000; and on investigating further I find that the $15,000 was allowed, not for diverting the water from day to day, but for taking from the riparian owner the permanent right of diversion. The water rights have been taken and paid for up to 25,000,000 gallons per diem, not on the basis of money lost by the property owners in the past because of diversion, but for the diminution of the value of the property by reason of the Government perpetually taking the water in the future.

Now, an act was passed in 1882 permitting certain suits to be brought against the Government, and I had supposed the claims for water taken in excess of 25,000,000 gallons daily had been brought under that act of 1882; but I am now told the present suits were brought at about the time this condemnation bill began to be mooted in Congress.

Mr. BABCOCK. They never thought of it.

Mr. PITNEY. I am speaking of the last three years. At any rate, the act of 1882 does not purport to give damages for the temporary daily diversion of water; and gentlemen on a little reflection will understand the difference. A man who has a water power that he is using upon a stream has a cause of action against a riparian owner upstream who takes out of the river more water than he puts into it, and who thereby diminishes the flow, for the lower owner's business is interfered with from day to day. But where there is no water power below, no milldam or power plant or factory—and there is none in this case—there is no liability for substantial damages by reason of a temporary diversion. Nor does the act of 1882 create such a liability. The act does seem to create a liability if the Government condemns a permanent right of diversion, and if so, the riparian owner would be entitled to substantial compensation.

But that is because he may develop the property in the future, and it has a future value for that purpose, and he is entitled to compensation if the water right is taken away from him permanently and the diversion made permanent. Now, the act of 1882 gives a right of action for compensation only in case the Government permanently dams back the water above or diminishes the flow to the land below.

Now, we have not taken that, as I understand, and there is no basis in fact or in law for these pending claims. The gentleman from Utah [Mr. KING] admitted that the decisions of the Supreme Court were mysterious to him. So they would be if there is any foundation for the statement that they give hundreds of thousands of dollars of damages to people who have suffered no damage at all. If so, Congress had better busy itself in changing the law than to busy itself in passing a bill acquiring property for the Government far in advance of the needs of the public and the cost of which can not be estimated.

Mr. KING. Now will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. PITNEY. Certainly.

Mr. KING. What I want to ask the gentleman is this: Ought not the fact that the owners of the land at the Great Falls, and also the right to the use of the water, that have not utilized the power for any purpose, to be considered when we come to determine the question whether we ought to acquire this property? Now, if we do not acquire it, and the owners proceed and construct a plant by which they can utilize the power and find a market for it, and then we suddenly awaken to a realization that we need more water, would not the District be compelled to pay heavy damages for the taking of the water and the deprivation of the power that would result, whereas now, according to the logic of my friend, and I think it is sound, if there has been no utilization of the power, the owners would be entitled to merely nominal damages? Is it not wise to condemn when the damages are nominal, instead of deferring until the power has been utilized, as a result of which we would be compelled to pay substantial damages?

Mr. PITNEY. There are two questions, which admit of two answers. We ought not to condemn any land, or pay for any land, a generation or two in advance of our need for it. In the second place, we ought not to condemn any water rights on the plea that they are necessary for the purpose of furnishing drinking water, when in fact the purpose is to set up a project for a manufacturing plant, in order to get an excuse for unloading upon the Government property which the Government does not need.

Furthermore, if there was a great value in the plant for power purposes, if it were capable of economical development and being applied to the needs of the city of Washington or the public in general, it is very strange that in the hundred years the city has stood here and the country about here has been under development nobody has thought it worth while to build a power plant there. It may be valueless or it may be valuable some time for furnishing electricity to Washington; but if so, let the owners apply it to its legitimate purposes.

Mr. KING. Niagara has been there more than a hundred years, and yet it is within a few years only that it has been utilized for the generation of electricity.

Mr. PITNEY. Yes; and if Niagara was as near to the city of Washington as the Great Falls are, there would be somebody proposing to Congress that the Government should buy it.

Now, I do not want to talk long about this matter. I have already explained that we now have, and are now using, and have now the right to take, more water than the city of Washington needs. I have already explained that if we are taking more for the purpose of wasting it, we may continue to take it until somebody needs it for legitimate purposes, and when it is needed for legitimate purposes and a motive is given to the water commissioners to economize the water, we can reduce our consumption to 25 per cent of its present proportions.

I want to say here and now, we are most liberally appropriating for this water plant. We have consented to another expenditure this year, which will eventually amount to $1,000,000, for the completion of the Lydecker tunnel. The appropriation, in all, will amount to $2,000,000. It will cost one million to complete the tunnel, and the reservoir will cost $900,000 in addition. So it is no time for us to go into an improvement of the sort proposed at Great Falls. There is another reason why this bill ought not to pass. The gentleman from Utah is mistaken in saying that the water of the Great Falls is to be owned by the District. He is mistaken in saying that the rights are to be acquired by the District. The bill does not say so.

The bill proposes that the Federal Government shall acquire the right, and that every dollar shall come out of the Federal Treasury. It is true, in the first instance, that the waterworks were built out of Government money, built because the Government employees could not stay here without better water than they had from the wells. It is true that the Government has devoted the waterworks to the use of the people of the District upon terms which reserve to the Government buildings the free use of the water, with an understanding that the surplus revenues shall be applied to the development of the plant, and they have been so applied.

I submit to the Committee of the Whole that we ought not to call upon the Federal Treasury at this time to pay for property that we shall not need for a generation, while at the present time the revenues of the water department are taxed to their utmost for improvements to the plant already undertaken. What we are more in need of is the introduction of a system of economical management in the direction of preventing waste of water and the introduction of a filtering system to purify the water we use. For filtering can never be introduced at a reasonable expense until the consumption of water is reduced. We do not need to acquire this great water power, which would supply water for the consumption of Washington for domestic purposes if Washington contained as many millions as it now contains hundreds of thousands.

Mr. KNOWLES. Mr. Chairman, I have been much surprised at the information which I have obtained from members of the District Committee in this discussion to-day. We have been told by the chairman of the District Committee that only a small portion of the property of the District is found upon the tax list, and that even then taxes are down to the minimum of 1½ per cent.

Not satisfied with this statement, he called upon the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] also a member of the committee, to confirm his statement, and I give Mr. COWHERD's own words as taken down by the reporter:

Mr. COWHERD. The gentleman has stated the facts properly. There is practically no tax in the District on personal property. A large part of the bank stock of the District is not taxed, and there has been no very urgent efforts, I think, to raise revenue. The statement made by gentlemen to the committee was that they raised more revenue now than Congress would appropriate, and therefore there was no particular reason why they should attempt to raise more revenue.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, this member of the committee tells us that by the aid of the $6,000,000 per year which the poor people of this country contribute toward paying the taxes of the property owners of this District, they have more revenue than they know what to do with, and therefore do not need to tax personal property at all, and real estate only to the extent of 1½ per cent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the people of the city in which I reside are taxed 6½ per cent upon all their property, and yet by the villainous law enacted by Congress, they must also contribute toward paying the taxes of the land grabbers of the District of Columbia.

Mr. Chairman, if taxes are only 1½ per cent in this city, and only a small portion of the property is ever found upon the tax list, why would it not be a good idea to have all the property listed and let the people of this city pay their own taxes? Why should the poor people of the whole country, who are already overburdened, be taxed to make contribution to the land grabbers of this District? And yet that is just what you are doing. You are putting your hands into the pockets of the poor all over this country to help pay the taxes of the property owners of this city to the extent of $6,000,000 per year.

Since 1878, when this villainous law was enacted, you have taken more than $100,000,000 from the poor of this country to build up enormous fortunes for such men as John Sherman, who has made millions in land grabbing in this city. He bought land here at $1,000 per acre, divided each acre into twenty lots, and sold them at $1,000 per lot; and the poor people of the whole country have been paying his taxes. Had he been compelled to pay his own taxes he could not have held his lots out of use until the necessities of the people compelled them to pay his price. It is because of this villainous system that less than 1 per cent of the people of this District own their own homes, while the entire product of their labor goes into the pockets of the landlords.

Mr. Chairman, it is pretended that the people of this District can not be trusted to govern themselves because of the large per cent of colored population, or "niggers," as they choose to call them. But I state here that it is my candid opinion that you may turn the government of this District over to the "niggers," allow none but "niggers" to vote, and they could not possibly establish a government a thousandth part as corrupt as the present one. There are many "niggers" with white skins, but with hearts as black as hell, and these are the "niggers" who constructed and now maintain the present iniquitous government which taxes the poor people of this country $6,000,000 per year to pay the taxes of the landlords of this District, while they in turn filch ten million more from their tenants. [Applause.]

Mr. DOCKERY. Only a single observation. The statement which has just been quoted and which was made on this floor by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia might seem to imply that the dereliction in the assessment of taxes was due to the law. In refutation of such an impression, if it exists, I will say that if bank stock and other forms of personal property escape taxation in this District, it is not the fault of the law. It is because of official neglect. Some one earlier in the debate of to-day stated that bank stock and other personal property, in large part, escaped taxation. If that is true, it is not the fault of Congress—

Mr. BABCOCK. It is not the fault of the law, either.

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly it is not the fault of the law. If true, it is the fault of the officials. I do not know whether it is true or not. That statement has been made, and it is a very grave charge, of which the Commissioners of the District should take official notice. Congress has provided ample machinery to assess every dollar of property, real and personal, and has provided ample clerical force for the collection of taxes. If assessments have not been properly made, and if there has been a failure to collect, the fault is with the District government, not with Congress.

Mr. BABCOCK. Permit me right there. A word should be said in explanation of this matter. The assessment of real estate in this city is very high—much higher than is usual in most of our cities—running about 60 per cent of the market value; and for that reason it is not necessary to assess personal property to any great extent to raise the amount of money required.

Mr. DOCKERY. But let me say—

Mr. BABCOCK. I am giving that as the reason; it is the argument that is used.

Mr. DOCKERY. But the law commands the assessor to assess personal property as well as real, and he can not exercise discretion under the law.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is not the present government of the District of Columbia, through Commissioners, practically irresponsible to anybody? Is not that the truth about it?

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, it is responsible to Congress and to the President.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But Congress does not exercise the supervision over these officials that a local city council would exercise, does it?

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, that is in part probably true. I see what my friend is driving at. I am in favor of local self-government. But I will say to my colleague [Mr. CLARK] that every estimate of the Commissioners as to appropriations—I speak from the standpoint of personal experience—is carefully revised and investigated by the Committee on Appropriations at this end of the Capitol, and I have no doubt the same scrutiny is observed elsewhere. Of course I can not speak as to legislation except only in a general way, but I know that the estimates of the Commissioners are revised with exacting scrutiny.

I sympathize with the proposition to give the people of this District local self-government, but it is a matter of history that by the act of June 20, 1874, the voters of this District were disfranchised, when the party of which I am a member was not in power, when the party represented on the other side of the aisle controlled both bodies, as I remember, by substantially a two-thirds majority. For reasons obvious and known to the country, but which I will not now refer to for fear of precipitating a political discussion, the present system of government by Commissioners was then established. The Republican party had then an overwhelming majority in both the Senate and the House.

Mr. MUDD. I agree with the gentleman in the desire he has just now expressed that a political discussion should not be precipitated. I do not want to bring on any such discussion. But is it not a fact that the act of 1878 establishing a form of government for this District was passed by a Democratic Congress?

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman is referring to the organic act which established the ratio of taxation between the United States Government and the District of Columbia.

Mr. MUDD. It not only did that, but it confirmed and made permanent the present form of government for the District. The local government here from 1874 till 1878 was only tentative and experimental. The act which finally fixed the present form of government as a permanent form of government, doing away with suffrage here for all time, was passed by a Democratic Congress in 1878.

Mr. DOCKERY. If so, it was only confirming the act of a Republican Congress.

Mr. MUDD. A Democratic Congress ought not to confirm bad legislation.

Mr. DOCKERY. The act of 1874—and, mark you, I am not asserting that the act was not wise—

Mr. MUDD. I assume that a Democratic Congress would not have confirmed the action of a Republican Congress if it had not been right.

Mr. DOCKERY. I have not investigated the subject sufficiently to have a very clear judgment upon it; but I do say that the original act of 1874 was passed when there was an overwhelming Republican majority in both branches of Congress.

I shared in the judgment of the Republican party at that time. They thought, in view of the action of the board of public works as it then existed, a system inaugurated under the then council of this city, that if the local government was to be continued for any considerable length of time, the taxpayers would have nothing to pay taxes with and property holders would become bankrupt. I suppose that was the reason why steps were taken to disfranchise the people. But whatever the Democratic party did by the act of 1878 was done in harmony with what had preceded under the Republican policy and as a result of the precedents established by the Republican party.

Mr. BABCOCK. Is that usual with the Democratic party? [Laughter.]

Mr. DOCKERY. Oh, well, Mr. Chairman, we frequently camp on Republican ground. I hope that will be true in November—

Mr. HEPBURN. But you often camp where we do, do you not?

Mr. DOCKERY. Oh, certainly; when we have the Republicans "on the run," we must do so occasionally. [Laughter.] But for myself, to be perfectly frank, I think it was wise.

Mr. MUDD. And still you said a little while ago that you favored a local government here!

Mr. DOCKERY. Oh, no; I have not so asserted, or did not so intend.

Mr. MUDD. I understood the gentleman to say that he thought the system of local government would be better.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman knew, and his party knew in 1874, that they could not escape the responsibility for the scandals under that local government. The country had observed the proceedings and knew that right under the very shadow of the Dome of the Capitol corruption was rampant in all the offices of the city government.

Mr. MUDD. And that the Republican party wiped that all out. Mr. KING. We were calling it to the attention of the country, while you were charging the Democratic party with it.

Mr. DOCKERY. Whatever may have been the cause, there was a strong sentiment in favor of some reform in the city government.

Mr. BABCOCK. Is it not true that monetary matters are handled in the District with greater economy to the people and with better results for the amount of money expended than in any other city in the Union? Let us be frank about these things.

Mr. DOCKERY. I have found myself looking with favor on the local administration of affairs in the District of Columbia. I confess that I learn now for the first time, and with amazement, from the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia himself, that in the assessor's office of the District the high duty he has been called upon by the people to perform has been disregarded and personal property, to a large extent, allowed to escape taxation.

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman must remember that that does not apply alone to the District, but nevertheless it is a fact.

Mr. DOCKERY. However that may be, I am glad the gentleman has called attention to it. In many, if not in all, departments of the District government wise business management prevails. But certainly, according to the gentleman's own statement, it does not prevail in the assessor's office; and having had the notice given us, I think when we come to consider the District appropriation bills hereafter, we will take note of the statements which have been made; and if I do not mistake the sentiment of my associates, we will make a careful investigation of this whole subject.

Mr. MAGUIRE. If the gentleman from Missouri will permit me?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I understand the failure to properly tax personal property in the District is the fault of the administration of the law and not of the law as it now exists.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is true. The law provides that every species of property shall bear its due proportion of taxation. The law assumes that taxes shall be levied impartially and that all personal and real property shall be assessed. And it came to me here for the first time a few moments ago in this debate, with, as I have already said, some degree of amazement, that personal property escaped taxation.

Mr. BURKE. Then, if that is true, to whom are the city officials responsible if not to Congress? If they neglect or fail to do the duty devolved upon them by the law and under Congressional enactment, to whom are they responsible?

Mr. DOCKERY. To Congress and the President.

Mr. BURKE. Then why should not Congress assert its control over these officials who fail to discharge their duty?

Mr. DOCKERY. I have just stated that I hoped the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia would join with us in making a careful investigation of this matter. For myself, although I have been a member of this body for fifteen years, I am free to say that this matter has not heretofore been brought to my attention.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the whole trouble arise from the fact that in the first place Congress is incapable of acting intelligently as a council or governing body for the District of Columbia, and in the second place that the only way Congress can remove an official is by the process of impeachment; and in practice has that not proved to be an absolute failure wherever it has been tried? Now, does it not grow out of these two things?

Mr. DOCKERY. I have no doubt that ordinarily a city government selected by the people would perhaps be more responsive to their wishes and demands than under the system that prevails in this city. But I want to say that, having had some knowledge of the officials here for a term of years, I believed them to be exceedingly efficient. I did not know until to-day that the assessor was inefficient, according to the testimony of the chairman of the District Committee.

Mr. FARIS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. FARIS. Is the District of Columbia the only place where the gentleman has ever heard of personal property escaping taxation? It seems to burden the gentleman very much.

Mr. DOCKERY. Oh, no; I have no doubt that personal property escapes taxation in Indiana and in Missouri.

Mr. FARIS. Is it not notorious all over the Union that it does so?

Mr. DOCKERY. But in this case—and I am only speaking upon the statement made by the gentleman who is at the head of the District Committee—in this case property escapes taxation with the connivance of the officials.

Mr. BABCOCK. Oh, no; I did not say anything of that kind. I stated the fact, which is, that a large majority of the personal property in the District is not on the tax roll.

Mr. DOCKERY. I should be glad if the gentleman from South Dakota would read that extract, from the notes.

Mr. BABCOCK. I have never made the charge that it was by the connivance of officials at all.

Mr. KNOWLES. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] was entirely frank about it. He says:

A large part of the bank stock of the District is not taxed, and there have been no very urgent efforts, I think, to raise revenue.

There is practically no tax in the District on personal property.

And then he goes on to explain. He says:

The statement made by the gentleman to the committee was that they raised more revenue now than Congress would appropriate, and therefore there was no particular reason why they should attempt to raise more revenue.

Mr. BABCOCK. That is the statement of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD], not my statement.

Mr. DOCKERY. You yielded to him. My colleague [Mr. COWHERD] is not here at this time.

Mr. BABCOCK. There is nothing there about any connivance of officials at all.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If bank stocks in this town escape taxation, it must in the very nature of the case be by the connivance of the assessor or somebody else. A man might have a whole raft of bonds stuck away in some pigeonhole or safe-deposit vault or something of that kind, so that you would not be able to ascertain it; but bank stock, in the very nature of the case, must be a quasi-public thing, and there is not a single county or town in the State of Missouri that does not get at the bank stock and tax it, and I suppose that that is true with reference to every other State in the Union. There has been a squabble going on in some of those places as to whether bank stock should be taxed at its face value of 100 per cent, while other property was only assessed at, say, 60 per cent; but the idea that the assessor can not reach the bank stock of the District to get at it to tax it is absolutely preposterous.

Mr. PITNEY. Is there any more difficulty in getting at the stock of manufacturing corporations than at the stock of banks?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Not a bit in the world. I undertake to say that any stock can be got at where the institution is located in the District. If a man in this District goes and buys stock of an institution in your town or in New York, he may stick that away and conceal it, but it is preposterous to say that you can not reach bank stocks and corporation stocks and everything of that kind located in this town, unless some official somewhere connives at it.

Mr. BABCOCK. I think the committee ought to understand clearly right there and have no misconception of the facts. In the State where I live bank stocks and corporation stocks are not taxed at all, but the corporation as a whole is taxed. The corporation pays the tax. I know that to have been a fact in Iowa when I lived there, having had some connection with one or two of the banks, that the banks were assessed as a whole and not the stockholders individually.

Mr. MOODY. National banks?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes. The property of the bank and its capital was assessed, and not the stock of the individual stockholder. As to how that assessment is made here I am unable to state; but it is not a fact that in all places stockholders are liable to assessment of their stock. That is a mistake.

Mr. DOCKERY. The stock is either assessed to the bank or to the shareholders. In my State shareholders are assessed.

Mr. BABCOCK. That may be.

Mr. DOCKERY. And the bank pays the tax for the shareholders.

Mr. BABCOCK. It is only a difference in method.

Mr. DOCKERY. And it is charged up to the "interest and exchange" account as a rule; but at any rate it is assessed either to the bank directly or the individual shareholder. But, as I understood this morning, the statement was made, and I thought the chairman agreed with the statement, because he called upon my colleague to make the statement—

Mr. BABCOCK. He is a member of the subcommittee.

Mr. DOCKERY (continuing). That bank stock escaped taxation. Now, then, if that be true, it is due to the fact that the officials of the District government have failed in their duties under the law.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, that statement could be made in reference to the State of Wisconsin, where I live, and still would be misleading; for I own myself stock in several corporations none of the stock of which is ever assessed and taxed, but the corporation does pay tax upon all its property whether it be real estate or personal property or money. It is assessed for a certain amount and oftentimes for a greater amount than the entire stock.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Do I understand under the law relating to taxation in the District of Columbia that the property of every corporation has to be taxed and the stock representing the property is also to be taxed?

Mr. BABCOCK. I think not. I did not attempt to state what the law was specifically. I just called the attention of the committee to the fact that the bank stock not being assessed did not necessarily mean the banks did not pay any tax.

Mr. PITNEY. Inasmuch as the present discussion has been precipitated by the inquiry of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK], addressed to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], as to the management of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, as I have taken a part in the previous discussion, I desire to state that in my opinion their management is exceedingly good, and on the whole the Commissioners are entitled to great praise for endeavoring to secure the best business methods of management. If there is one general criticism that I think might be raised and is raised, it is this, that, like everybody else in the District of Columbia, they seem to be disposed to large and extravagant public expenditures. There is no public sentiment in the District to enforce economy of the public funds.

As I have said many times in private conversation, so far as public sentiment in the District of Columbia is concerned, public money wasted is deemed better than money saved. It does not come out of their pockets, except to the extent of 50 per cent, under ordinary circumstances, while under this bill the whole expense is to come out of the Federal Treasury. On the other hand, the city and the District thrive and prosper in proportion as the public money is expended here. There is no newspaper in Washington that will criticize the most extravagant bill that Congress will pass; and there is no influential public sentiment here bringing pressure to bear either upon Congress or upon the Commissioners in the direction of economy.

To that extent, in this matter, the District Commissioners, like all other governing bodies, yield to public pressure. They are servants of the people, whether elected by the people or not; but with that exception I think the District Commissioners give us an admirable administration of the government, and are not subject to criticism.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How can you or anybody justify the proposition that the people of the United States in general should be taxed to pay one-half of the taxes of the people in the District of Columbia?

Mr. PITNEY. I never have advocated that proposition. I have dissented from it, as applied to certain matters, very vigorously, on many occasions, and I think it is an arrangement in which the District of Columbia has the big end of the bargain.

Mr. BABCOCK. Permit me to say to the gentleman that the two bills under discussion this morning, and the bill under discussion before this, which the gentleman from New Jersey opposed, and which the gentleman from Missouri opposed, were bills where the people of the District of Columbia asked to have this appropriation made, and to pay it themselves; they did not ask the United States to do it.

Mr. PITNEY. The gentleman is mistaken in saying I opposed the bill he referred to this morning.

Mr. BABCOCK. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. PITNEY. I advocated certain amendments, one of which was advocated by the gentleman himself. I do not think I opposed the bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. Did the gentleman favor the bill for the extension of Rhode Island avenue?

Mr. PITNEY. I did not oppose it after the amendment was accepted proposing to cut down the amount to be expended, and providing that when the total award was made the matter should come back to Congress for it to pass upon the appropriations to be made in the payment of the award.

Mr. BABCOCK. I am glad to hear the gentleman make that statement.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to plead "guilty" to an attitude of hostility to the bill and to some other bills the effect of which would be to bankrupt the District treasury. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] stated that no answer had been made to the question propounded by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK]. If I did not make a clear statement of my views I will do so now.

Mr. BABCOCK. I think the House understands the views of the gentleman from Missouri perfectly.

Mr. DOCKERY. In my judgment the management of the District Commissioners during the last ten years, in which I have had knowledge of District affairs, has been creditable; and I said that the fact that there had been an alleged failure to assess certain personal property was the first time a dereliction of duty had been called to my attention. I think the Commissioners have acted fairly and justly with the people of the United States and the people of the District as to the expenditure of public money committed to their care. The trouble with the District Commissioners and the trouble with the good people of the District of Columbia is this, the Government is considered legitimate "prey."

It is considered a sort of vast reservoir, and all we have to do is to "ask and it shall be given you," forgetting for the moment that every dollar of money in the Federal Treasury comes from the pockets of the citizens of the United States. Therefore, the District Commissioners and the people of this District, in my judgment, are fairly subject to good-natured criticism for asking more in their estimates than the District is entitled to receive. But after we have made our appropriations, I think every District Commissioner within the ten years has honestly and economically disbursed the public money.

Mr. PITNEY. That is the statement that I was about to make.

Mr. DOCKERY. And if the assessors have not assessed bank stock, they are subject to just censure.

Mr. BABCOCK. I want to say that so long as the Government Treasury has such an able defender as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] I do not think there is any danger of its ever being looted.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. DOCKERY. What is that?

Mr. PITNEY. I did not catch your motion.

Mr. BABCOCK. That the committee now rise.

Mr. DOCKERY. General debate has not been yet closed.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PAYNE). The point of order is well taken. The general debate is not closed.

Mr. BABCOCK. Well, Mr. Chairman, I move that the general debate close in five minutes.

Mr. DOCKERY. Say ten minutes. I promised to yield to the gentleman from Utah and one other gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. Close the general debate in ten minutes? Oh, no, no; we can not do that. We all want to talk to-morrow on this bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. Do I understand that the closing of debate must be by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. It must be.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I had the floor, and I do not quite see how I lost it. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yielded, as the Chair understood, to the gentleman from Wisconsin, who asked unanimous consent for the closing of debate.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, if this bill goes over without being disposed of now, it goes over until next District day, does it not?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it would go over until next District day.

Mr. CANNON. I think it is an important bill, and we shall have something to say about it further. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], as I understand, would like to talk sixty minutes or so.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BABCOCK. The ruling has been that the District Committee had no right to offer District bills except on District day. That was the case last District day, when we were dividing at the time the House adjourned, and I was unable to call up that bill again until to-day. We are exceedingly anxious to dispose of this bill to-night, and yet, of course, I defer to the opinion of the Chair that it would come up to-morrow.

Mr. PITNEY. That was not the ruling of the Chair. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the Chair held that the bill would come up next District day.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the Chair's response to the former inquiry, but, of course, the Chair can not bind the House.

Mr. PITNEY. I should not appeal from that decision.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY]?

Mr. BABCOCK. I would ask, Mr. Chairman, that general debate be closed at quarter of 5.

Mr. HEPBURN. I object.

Mr. DOCKERY. I agreed to yield time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. KING] and to the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE], but I seem to have been taken off the floor, and I have not any time to yield.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I want to make one observation in reply to my friend from New Jersey [Mr. PITNEY] in respect to the charge of the expense contemplated by this bill. Speaking for myself only, when this report was drawn I was under the impression that there was a general law that in all appropriations for the improvement of the District of Columbia one-half was to be paid by the District and one-half by the General Government. I shall offer an amendment making provision that whatever award may be allowed under this bill shall be paid one-half out of the District treasury and one-half by the United States.

Mr. PITNEY. When the gentleman does that he will provide for the payment of more money than the District treasury will have at its disposal and will subject himself to the very criticism indulged in by my friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. DOCKERY. That is what this committee has been doing all the time.

Mr. PITNEY. That is true.

Mr. KING. Such an amendment will simply entail upon the District the payment of one-half of the expense.

Mr. PITNEY. But the District can not pay it unless there is money enough in the treasury to do it.

Mr. KING. I concede that. But I think the investigation which has been made has demonstrated that a great deal of personal property has escaped taxation.

Mr. MUDD. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration Senate bill No. 1754, and had come to no resolution thereon.

RICHMOND P. HOBSON.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

On the morning of the 3d of June, 1898, Assistant Naval Constructor Richmond P. Hobson, United States Navy, with a volunteer crew of seven men, in charge of the partially dismantled collier Merrimac, entered the fortified harbor of Santiago, Cuba, for the purpose of sinking the collier in the narrowest portion of the channel, and thus interposing a serious obstacle to the egress of the Spanish fleet, which had recently entered that harbor.

This enterprise, demanding coolness, judgment, and bravery amounting to heroism, was carried into successful execution in the face of a persistent fire from the hostile fleet, as well as from the fortifications on shore.

Rear-Admiral Sampson, commander in chief of our naval forces in Cuban waters, in an official report dated "Off Santiago de Cuba, June 3, 1898," and addressed to the Secretary of the Navy, referring to Mr. Hobson's gallant exploit, says:

"As stated in a recent telegram, before coming here I decided to make the harbor entrance secure against the possibility of egress of the Spanish ships by obstructing the narrow part of the entrance by sinking a collier at that point. Upon calling upon Mr. Hobson for his professional opinion as to a sure method of sinking the ship, he manifested a most lively interest in the problem. After several days' consideration he presented a solution which he considered would insure the immediate sinking of the ship when she had reached the desired point in the channel. * * * The plan contemplated a crew of only seven men and Mr. Hobson, who begged that it might be intrusted to him.

"As soon as I reached Santiago and had the collier to work upon, the details were commenced and diligently prosecuted, hoping to complete them in one day, as the moon and tide served best the first night after our arrival. Notwithstanding every effort, the hour of 4 o'clock in the morning arrived and the preparations were scarcely completed. After a careful inspection of the final preparations I was forced to relinquish the plan for that morning, as dawn was breaking. Mr. Hobson begged to try it at all hazards.

"This morning proved more propitious, as a prompt start could be made. Nothing could have been more gallantly executed. * * * A careful inspection of the harbor from this ship showed that the Merrimac had been sunk in the channel.

"I can not myself too earnestly express my appreciation of the conduct of Mr. Hobson and his gallant crew. I venture to say that a more brave and daring thing has not been done since Cushing blew up the Albatross."

The members of the crew who were with Mr. Hobson on this memorable occasion have already been rewarded for their services by advancement which, under the provisions of law and regulations, the Secretary of the Navy was authorized to make; and the nomination to the Senate of Naval Cadet Powell, who in a steam launch followed the Merrimac on her perilous trip for the purpose of rescuing her force after the sinking of that vessel, to be advanced in rank to the grade of ensign, has been prepared and will be submitted.

Cushing, with whose gallant act in blowing up the ram Albatross during the civil war Admiral Sampson compares Mr. Hobson's sinking of the Merrimac, received the thanks of Congress upon recommendation of the President, by name, and was in consequence, under the provisions of section 1598 of the Revised Statutes, advanced one grade, such advancement embracing 56 numbers. The section cited applies, however, to line officers only, and Mr. Hobson, being a member of the staff of the Navy, could not under its provisions be so advanced.

In considering the question of suitably rewarding Assistant Naval Constructor Hobson for his valiant conduct on the occasion referred to, I have deemed it proper to address this message to you, with the recommendation that he receive the thanks of Congress, and, further, that he be transferred to the line of the Navy and promoted to such position therein as the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may determine.

Mr. Hobson's transfer from the Construction Corps to the line is fully warranted, he having received the necessary technical training as a graduate of the Naval Academy, where he stood No. 1 in his class; and such action is recommended, partly in deference to what is understood to be his own desire, although, he being now a prisoner in the hands of the enemy, no direct communication on the subject has been received from him, and partly for the reason that the abilities displayed by him at Santiago are of such a character as to indicate especial fitness for the duties of the line.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 27, 1898.

FRANK H. NEWCOMB.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

On the 11th day of May, 1898, there occurred a conflict in the bay of Cardenas, Cuba, in which the naval torpedo boat Winslow was disabled, her commander wounded, and one of her officers and a part of her crew killed by the enemy's fire.

In the face of a most galling fire from the enemy's guns the revenue cutter Hudson, commanded by First Lieut. Frank H. Newcomb, United States Revenue-Cutter Service, rescued the disabled Winslow, her wounded commander, and remaining crew. The commander of the Hudson kept his vessel in the very hottest fire of the action, although in constant danger of going ashore on account of the shallow water, until he finally got a line made fast to the Winslow and towed that vessel out of range of the enemy's guns—a deed of special gallantry.

I recommend that, in recognition of the signal act of heroism of First Lieut. Frank H. Newcomb, United States Revenue-Cutter Service, above set forth, the thanks of Congress be extended to him and to his officers and men of the Hudson, and that a gold medal of honor be presented to Lieutenant Newcomb, a silver medal of honor to each of his officers, and a bronze medal of honor to each member of his crew who served with him at Cardenas.

It will be remembered that Congress, by appropriate action, recognized the several commanders of ships of war for their services in the battle of Manila, May 1, 1898.

The commander of the revenue cutter Hugh McCulloch, present and in active cooperation with the fleet under Commodore Dewey on that occasion (by Executive order under the provisions of section 2757, Revised Statutes), is the only commander of a national ship to whom promotion or advancement was not and could not be given, because he already held the highest rank known to the Revenue-Cutter Service.

I now recommend that, in recognition of the efficient and meritorious services of Capt. Daniel B. Hodgson, United States Revenue-Cutter Service, who commanded the Hugh McCulloch at the battle of Manila (that officer being now in the sixty-third year of his age and having served continuously on active duty for thirty-seven years), be placed upon the permanent waiting orders or retired list of the Revenue-Cutter Service on the full duty pay of his grade.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 27, 1898.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HITT. I ask unanimous consent to take up a bill reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs to amend the Chinese exclusion act. Its passage is asked for by the Secretary of the Treasury in two urgent letters.

Mr. BAILEY. I will ask the gentleman whether the matter which he now wishes to bring before the House has any connection with the war?

Mr. HITT. It has not.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, Mr. Speaker, I feel constrained to renew the demand for the regular order which I made this morning.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the announcement of the vote on the motion to adjourn, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BREWER, indefinitely.

To Mr. BENTON, for two weeks, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. OGDEN, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. VANDIVER, indefinitely, on account of important business.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

S. 4568. An act granting a pension to Jacob Miller;

S. 2068. An act to authorize the White and Black River Valley Railway Company to build a bridge across the Black River in Arkansas;

S. 129. An act to amend an act for the correction of the military record of Wilhelm Spiegelburg, approved July 21, 1892;

S. 1361. An act granting a pension to John N. Landon;

S. 3169. An act granting a pension to John R. Bevan;

S. 4400. An act granting an increase of pension to Joel Blackman; and

S. 4456. An act to designate Gladstone, Mich., a subport of entry.

The result of the vote on the motion to adjourn was then announced; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a draft of a bill to indemnify the governors of States for expenses incurred by them in aiding the United States to raise and organize and supply and equip the Volunteer Army—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Commissary-General of Subsistence, together with a draft of a bill relating to details in his Department—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Paymaster-General of the Army relating to promotions, and inclosing a draft of a bill—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. GRIFFIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10636) to increase the daily army ration, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1626); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. HILL, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10807) to carry into effect the recommendations of the International American Conference by the incorporation of the International American Bank, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1627); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. HITT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10829) relating to the exclusion of Chinese, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1628); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS INTRODUCED.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. DOCKERY: A bill (H. R. 10805) to amend the act relating to pay of volunteer soldiers—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. JENKINS: A bill (H. R. 10806) to provide for the relief of certain settlers upon Wisconsin Central Railroad lands forfeited under the act of September 29, 1890, which lands were treated by the Interior Department erroneously as Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis and Omaha indemnity lands—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. HILL, from the Committee on Banking and Currency: A bill (H. R. 10807) to carry into effect the recommendations of the International American Conference by the incorporation of the International American Bank (in lieu of H. R. 7341)—to the House Calendar.

By Mr. ALDRICH: A bill (H. R. 10808) to create the army and navy supply board, to define its duties, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HULL: A bill (H. R. 10809) to provide auxiliary volunteers, authorizing the President of the United States to organize, arm, and equip such militia of the several States and Territories and of the District of Columbia as is composed of citizens of the United States, made such by the operation of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, said militia when organized to be mustered into the service of the United States and to be known as the United States auxiliary volunteers, and to be used for the occupation and defense of any island, islands, or any other territory under, or that may come under, the control of the United States—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HITT: A bill (H. R. 10829) to amend an act approved November 3, 1893, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States' approved May 5, 1892"—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. McDONALD: A joint resolution (H. Res. 288) to provide for the mustering into the United States Volunteer Army of one regiment of colored troops—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SMITH of Illinois: A joint resolution (H. Res. 289) directing the presentation of a first-class life-saving medal to Lieut. Fidelio S. Carter, United States Navy—to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. BROWNLOW: A resolution (House Res. No. 331) for the relief of J. C. Hiatt—to the Committee on Accounts.

By Mr. BAIRD: A memorial of the legislature of the State of Louisiana, for the improvement of the Ouachita River—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Also, a memorial of the Louisiana legislature, for the improvement of the Atchafalaya River—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. DAVEY: A memorial of the legislature of the State of Louisiana, for the improvement of Atchafalaya River—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. MEYER of Louisiana: A memorial of the legislature of the State of Louisiana, for the improvement of the Ouachita River—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. DAVEY: Memorial of the legislature of the State of Louisiana, for the improvement of the Ouachita River—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BARTHOLDT: A bill (H. R. 10810) to correct the military record and grant an honorable discharge to Charles Stierlin—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10811) for the benefit of William H. Miller—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10812) to correct the military record of Julius H. Rogge—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BERRY: A bill (H. R. 10813) granting a pension to Charles C. Kilburn, late master of the United States tug Jesse—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine (by request): A bill (H. R. 10814) for the relief of the owners of the British ship Foscolia and cargo—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. DOLLIVER: A bill (H. R. 10815) for the relief of Cordelia Sessions—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10816) for the relief of Shadrack S. Walker—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FOWLER of New Jersey: A bill (H. R. 10817) granting an honorable discharge to John Fagan, late sergeant of Troop B, Sixth Cavalry, United States Army—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GAINES: A bill (H. R. 10818) for the relief of the estate of William H. Gill, deceased—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HENRY of Connecticut: A bill (H. R. 10819) granting an increase of pension to John E. Higgins—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KNOX: A bill (H. R. 10820) granting a pension to Emma C. Nudd—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10821) to remove the charge of desertion now standing against the record of Alfred Reno—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. OTEY: A bill (H. R. 10822) for relief of Mrs. Susan A.

Dinwiddie, Campbell County, Va.—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. RIDGELY: A bill (H. R. 10823) to remove charge of desertion against Adam R. Hartzell—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10824) to correct war record of Elijah I. Smith—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10825) for the relief of William Blundell—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LLOYD: A bill (H. R. 10826) to correct the military record of Duncan McCoy—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10827) granting an increase of pension to Byron Slemmons—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DAVIS: A bill (H. R. 10828) increasing the pension of Thomas J. Myers—to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, the following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. BABCOCK: Petition of the Plymouth (Wis.) Dairy Board of Trade, to have American cheese placed upon the list of Army rations—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 28, 1898.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

Mr. FAULKNER. I wish to state to the Senator from Minnesota that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] who has the floor and who will proceed with his argument this morning, is not now here.

Mr. DAVIS. Let the morning business be proceeded with.

Mr. FAULKNER. With the understanding that the Hawaiian resolution will not be pressed before the Senator from Louisiana comes into the Chamber, the reading of the Journal may be dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the further reading of the Journal will be dispensed with. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ALLEGED MUTILATION OF THE DEAD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 22d instant, the official correspondence and reports relative to the mutilation after death of the bodies of the United States marines or sailors who were recently killed in battle at or near Santiago de Cuba by the Spanish soldiery, etc.; which, on motion of Mr. HALE, was, with the accompanying correspondence, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MCENERY presented a petition of the legislature of Louisiana, praying that an appropriation of $15,000 be made for the removal of the drift in the Bayou Courtableau, in the parish of St. Landry, La.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House concurrent resolution No. 15.

Whereas Bayou Courtableau, in the parish of St. Landry, has been dammed up for the past four years by accumulation of drift from Atchafalaya River; and

Whereas the present appropriation for the removal of said drift is insufficient: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be memorialized to use their best efforts to obtain an appropriation of $15,000 for this special purpose, and that a copy of these resolutions be sent to them.

S. P. HENRY,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

R. H. SNYDER,

Lieutenant-Governor and President of the Senate.

Approved June 23, 1898.

MURPHY J. FOSTER,

Governor of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. MCENERY presented a petition of the legislature of Louisiana, praying that an appropriation be made for the construction of a system of locks and dams in the Ouachita River, Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[House concurrent resolution No. 12. By Mr. Wooten.]

Memorializing Congress relative to the construction of a system of locks and dams in the Ouachita River.

Whereas the feasibility of the construction of a system of locks and dams in the Ouachita River, to insure slack-water navigation therein, is well established, the same having been thoroughly demonstrated by examinations and surveys by United States engineers, and in view of the importance of this great commercial waterway; and

Whereas investigation has shown that such locks and dams can be constructed at a low expense as compared to similar works on other rivers in the North and West of far less navigable and commercial importance; and

Whereas the completion of such locks and dams will be of vast and incalculable benefit to the people residing in the fertile Ouachita Valley, insuring navigation at all seasons of the year, with its consequent conveniences and advantages from competition in freight rates: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives of the general assembly of Louisiana (the senate concurring), That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are hereby respectfully urged to keep this important matter before Congress and the proper authorities at Washington, and that the superior advantages and commercial importance of the Ouachita River, with its navigable length of more than 400 miles, be pointed out when compared to streams in other sections of the Union where similar improvements have been made.

Be it further resolved, That we, the general assembly of Louisiana, do most respectfully memorialize Congress to make the necessary appropriation for the construction of this work, and that our Congressmen be requested to join with such other Representatives of the State of Arkansas as may be concerned in pressing the claims of the said river, to the end that this just and advantageous public enterprise may at an early date receive the attention it deserves.

Be it further resolved, That our Senators and Representatives be furnished with a copy of these resolutions.

S. P. HENRY,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

R. H. SNYDER,

Lieutenant-Governor and President of the Senate.

Approved June 21, 1898.

MURPHY J. FOSTER,

Governor of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. MCENERY presented a petition of the Grand Lodge, Knights of Pythias, of Donaldsonville, La., praying for the enactment of legislation declaring it against public policy for any contract for life insurance to stipulate that it shall be forfeited in case the assured enlist in the Army or Navy of the United States in time of war, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PLATT of New York presented a petition of the New York Preachers' Meeting of the Methodist Episcopal Church, praying for the enactment of legislation granting a charter to the Washington and University Railroad in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GEAR presented a resolution adopted at a joint meeting of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, Order of Railway Conductors, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, and Order of Railway Telegraphers held in Philadelphia, Pa., June 5, 1898, praying for the passage of the so-called anti-scalping ticket bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. CANNON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4823) granting an increase of pension to Phineas L. Squires, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. 4534) to grant a pension to Ovid G. Sparks, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 9224) increasing the pension of David R. B. Harlan;

A bill (H. R. 10117) granting a pension to Martha Jennie Freer;

A bill (H. R. 0076) to increase the pension of Thomas B. Hammond; and

A bill (H. R. 7362) to grant a pension to Junius Alexander.

Mr. HANNA, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 990) granting an increase of pension to George E. Welles, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1720) granting an increase of pension to Thomas H. Ballard, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

TARIFF COMPILATION.

Mr. MORRILL. I report from the Committee on Finance a comparison of the tariffs of 1897, 1894, and 1890, with index, to which is appended the administrative customs act of June 10, 1890. I move that the compilation be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

THEODORE F. SWAYZE.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1004) for the relief of Theodore F. Swayze, administrator de bonis non of the estate of John S. P. Wheeler, deceased, to report it without amendment. As the bill conforms in all respects to the general usage, I ask to have it considered at the present time.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It instructs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue duplicates in the name of Theodore F. Swayze, administrator de bonis non of the estate of John S. P. Wheeler, deceased, in lieu of United States 4 per cent registered bonds issued under the acts of July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871, No. 30954, for $50; No. 174652, 175053, 175053, 176095, 176098, 176740, for $100 each; inscribed in the name of John S. P. Wheeler, and alleged to have been lost. But Theodore F. Swayze shall first file in the Treasury a bond in a penal sum equal to the amount of said missing bonds and the interest which would accrue thereon until the principal becomes due and payable, with two good and sufficient sureties, residents of the United States, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, with condition to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any claim because of the lost bonds.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF ABEL ADAMS.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. From the Committee on Finance I report favorably with an amendment Senate bill 4583, a similar bill, to pay for some lost coupons, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4583) for the relief of the estate of Abel Adams, deceased. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the legal representative of the estate of Abel Adams, late of the city of Poughkeepsie, State of New York, $2,300, in full for the following United States 6 per cent bonds, stock of the loan of 1861, issued under the acts of July 17 and August 5, A. D. 1861, namely: Nos. 10681, 10682, and 10683, of $100 each; Nos. 74385 and 74387, of $1,000 each, and in addition thereto the interest maturing on said bonds after January 1, A. D. 1865, to the date when said bonds ceased to bear interest.

The amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in line 8, page 2, after the word "Treasury," to strike out the words "in a sum double the amount of said bonds;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the legal representative of the estate of the said Abel Adams shall first give bond, with sureties, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, conditioned to secure the United States harmless against said bonds and coupons, said bonds having been lost by the said Abel Adams prior to his death, which occurred on the 13th day of June, A. D. 1868.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

J. AND W. SELIGMAN & CO.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. From the Committee on Finance I report favorably another bill of the same character, to pay for some lost coupons. If it is not imposing upon the Senate, I should like to have that also considered. Immediate action is necessary in order to get it through at this session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill (S. 4812) to pay J. and W. Seligman & Co. the sum of $1,794.56 for certain coupons detached from United States bonds, which said coupons were lost on the Cunard steamship Oregon, sunk at sea March 14, 1886?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent to call up from the Calendar Senate bill 4807, reported by me from the Committee on Finance a few minutes ago.

Mr. LODGE. Before that is done, I should like to submit a report from the Committee on Printing, if the Senator from Arkansas will allow me.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly; I have no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas will withhold his request for a few moments.

THE BUREAU OF AMERICAN REPUBLICS.

Mr. LODGE. I report from the Committee on Printing an original concurrent resolution, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to print 2,000 copies of volume 2 of the Commercial Directory of the American Republics in cloth binding, corresponding to that of volume 1, of which 100 copies are to be for the use of the Senate, 500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,400 copies are to be distributed by the Bureau of the American Republics to the presidents of the Republics composing the International Union of American Republics, to the executive departments of the various Republics of the union, to the newspaper press, and for such other public uses as may be deemed advisable. The Public Printer is also authorized and directed to print 10,000 copies of each issue of the Monthly Bulletin of the Bureau of the American Republics during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, for distribution by the Bureau of the American Republics, upon requisition from members of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the first part of the resolution be read again. I did not catch the first part of it.

Mr. LODGE. It is to print the second volume of the Commercial Directory of the Bureau of American Republics and their bulletins for the year.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. MANTLE introduced a bill (S. 4828) granting a pension to John Hunsberger; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HANSBROUGH submitted an amendment relative to the appointment of a commercial commission to China, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

On motion of Mr. HOAR, it was Ordered. That the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate for the remainder of the session.

THE COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS.

On motion of Mr. HOAR, it was Ordered. That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate for the remainder of the session.

C. C. SNIFFEN.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4807) directing the issue of duplicate of lost check drawn by C. C. Sniffen, major, United States Army, in favor of Fourth National Bank, New York City.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The preamble recites that C. C. Sniffen, a paymaster, United States Army, did, on the 6th day of April, 1897, issue a check numbered 715702, upon the assistant treasurer of the United States at New York, in favor of the Fourth National Bank of New York City, for the credit of the post exchange at Fort Grant, Ariz., on account of payment of officers' pay accounts, on which said post exchange has advanced the money as an accommodation to such officers, which check is alleged to have been lost in transmission through the United States mails; and the provisions of the act of February 16, 1885, amending section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States, authorizing United States disbursing officers and agents to issue duplicates of lost checks, apply only to checks drawn for $2,500 or less.

The bill instructs Maj. C. C. Sniffen to issue a duplicate of the original check, under such regulations in regard to its issue and payment as have been prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury for the issue of duplicate checks under the provisions of section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

PORT OF TITUSVILLE, PA.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask leave to call up the bill (H. R. 10585) designating Titusville, Crawford County, Pa., a port of delivery in the customs collection district of Erie, Pa.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BOOK TYPEWRITERS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4717) authorizing the use of typewriting machines for the recording of deeds and other instruments of writing in the office of the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not object to the passage of that bill, but after it is disposed of I shall call for the regular order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Thank you.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, in line 9, after the word "office," to insert "on the approval of the justices of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or one of them."

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the first section be read as it will read when amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to purchase and use in his office, for the recording of deeds and other instruments of writing required by law to be recorded in said office, typewriting machines, the expense of purchasing and maintaining said machines to be paid out of the receipts or fees of said office on the approval of the justices of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or one of them; and all deeds and other instruments of writing required by law to be recorded in said office which shall be recorded by typewriting machines are hereby declared to be legally recorded.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was read the third time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to ask if the bill has been reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. GALLINGER. It has been reported, I will say to the Senator, after very careful consideration.

The bill was passed.

RICHMOND P. HOBSON AND OTHERS.

Mr. MORGAN. Yesterday a message came in from the President recommending certain votes of thanks and other compliments and awards to Hobson, of Alabama, and other gentlemen connected with the sinking of the Merrimac in the harbor of Santiago de Cuba. I asked that the message might be printed and laid upon the table. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs was not then in the Senate and I desired to delay it until he came in. I now learn that it is the wish of the committee to have the matter referred to them, and I move that the President's message be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There were two messages laid on the table, the second message relating to the services of Lieutenant Newcomb and Captain Hodgson.

Mr. MORGAN. Very well; let both messages be referred.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request that the two messages from the President be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

ANNEXATION OF THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 259) to provide for annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. CAFFERY. I desire, Mr. President, to submit some more observations on section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution:

New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or part of States, without the consent of the legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State.

Now, Mr. President, the first inquiry which suggests itself to the mind after reading this section is, What are new States? What does that term imply? Under this section of the Constitution has Congress power to admit States which may be termed old States; and if so, what are old States? Could a state, for instance, of Europe, which has had statehood almost from the first records of history, be admitted into the Union as a new State under this section of the Constitution? Does that term refer to any old state in any country under any form of government?

Mr. President, it is to my mind absolutely clear that it does not. The term "new" applies to such States, in my opinion, as may be carved out of the territories jurisdiction over which is given in the succeeding paragraph of this section.

Is Hawaii a new State? Can Hawaii be admitted under this section of the Constitution as a new State? If it can not be admitted as a new State, how can it be admitted as a Territory except by treaty? Texas was, in a certain sense, a new State. It was carved out of territory belonging to Mexico originally and erected into a republic. It was a republic of very recent origin. It was in a sense new. It might have been admitted, possibly, under this section of the Constitution as a new State, provided it can be successfully held that the term "new States" embraces other than the States to be carved out of the then territory belonging to the United States by cession from various States.

Hawaii has been a state since 1823, when we first recognized that island as a government by negotiating a commercial treaty with it. It has been a state ever since. In order to obviate the difficulty of introducing it into the Union under her nondescript constitution, which, in my opinion, is unrepugnant in form, the expedient has been resorted to of procuring the annihilation of that state and introducing it as a territory into the United States.

When the negotiations between Hawaii and the United States were current Hawaii was a state. She could only contract to be admitted into the Union as a state. She made the contract in the capacity of a state—and quite an old state at that—and in order to obviate the objections that would have been urged to the very singular and phenomenal constitution that Hawaii possessed, they resorted to the expediency of annihilating themselves, committing a kind of state suicide, destroying themselves, and having themselves admitted into the Union as a territory.

Mr. President, I will advert again to the letter of the draftsman of the Constitution, December 4, 1803, at the time when the Louisiana purchase by Mr. Jefferson engaged the attention of the statesmen of the country:

I always thought when we should acquire Canada and Louisiana it would be proper to govern them as provinces and allow them no voice in our councils. In wording the third section of the fourth article I went as far as circumstances would permit to establish the exclusion. Candor obliges me to add my belief that had it been more pointedly expressed a strong opposition would have been made.

This distinguished man, Gouverneur Morris, anticipated the period when we should acquire Louisiana and Canada, and in this letter he states that he himself in wording the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution went as far as possible to keep them from being States. He intended to keep them as provinces. The original thirteen colonies were jealous of their statehood. They had acquired it through war and suffering, and they were not disposed at that period of our country's history to embrace within the Union any fresh territory that might spring up in any direction and erect it into a State.

So this letter of Gouverneur Morris, in my opinion, is a full and clear commentary upon the meaning of the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution in regard to admitting new States. If he intended to keep these coterminous territories from statehood, with much more reason did he intend, and did the framers of the Constitution intend, to keep these transmarine possessions from statehood.

It is abundantly clear to my mind, in considering the fact that after a cession to the United States by various States of the Northwest Territory and the incorporation into the Constitution of the provision giving Congress the power to pass all needful rules and regulations concerning the government of those Territories, that thereby it was intended to erect those Territories into States and to place them beyond the treaty-making power.

How could we treat with our own Government? How could the United States treat for the admission of a territory with a government appointed by the United States? So construing the cession part of the Constitution relating to the government of the Territories, together with the treaty-making power, it is abolutely evident and clear that the treaty-making power could only extend, and was intended to extend only, to matters external to the United States, to the foreign relations of the United States, and if it was wise to do so, by treaty power to embrace foreign territory within the United States.

No foreign territory under this Constitution can be admitted into the United States by act of Congress. A provision relating to the admission of States refers entirely to our own territory. It can refer to no other territory. It refers to new States. All States organized outside of the United States could never be admitted as new States.

Mr. Webster was not in public life during the debates upon the admission of Texas, but when he returned the session after the admission he made a speech in which he stated that Texas could only be admitted to the Union under the treaty-making power. He did not argue the question, but simply gave his opinion as that of a citizen that there was no warrant in the Constitution of the United States for the admission of Texas as a State by an act of Congress.

Mr. Webster said:

Mr. President, I was not in Congress at the last session, and of course I had no opportunity to take part in the debates upon this question; nor have I before been called upon to discharge a public trust in regard to it. I certainly did, as a private citizen, entertain a strong feeling that, if Texas were to be brought into the Union at all, she ought to be brought in by diplomatic arrangement, sanctioned by treaty. But it has been decided otherwise by both Houses of Congress; and, whatever my own opinions may be, I know that many who coincided with me feel themselves, nevertheless, bound by the decision of all branches of the Government.

My own opinion and judgment have not been at all shaken by anything I have heard. And now, not having been a member of the Government and having, of course, taken no official part in the measure, and as it has now come to be completed, I have believed that I should best discharge my own duty and fulfill the expectations of those who placed me here by giving this expression of their most decided, unequivocal, and unanimous dissent and protest; and stating, as I have now stated, the reasons which have impelled me to withhold my vote.

I agree with the unanimous opinion of the legislature of Massachusetts; I agree with the great mass of her people; I reaffirm what I have said and written during the last eight years at various times against this annexation. I here record my own dissent and opposition; and I here express and place on record also the dissent and protest of the State of Massachusetts.

Now, going on to the admission of Texas, I desire to know why it is that the precedent of Texas has not been followed, if it is a precedent? How is it that the consent of the people of Hawaii has not been sought in advance to the admission of that country into the Union? If the precedent of Texas is cited, that precedent must be followed to the letter, or at least the spirit of that precedent must be followed, and is, that the people of Texas in convention assembled declared their willingness to enter the Union as a State, to give up their special statehood and be incorporated into the Union, and be mingled in a general statehood; to form one of a galaxy of States, not to shine alone on our western border as a single star.

That is lacking in the case of Hawaii. It is not only lacking in the case of Hawaii, but it is impossible in the case of Hawaii. The people of Hawaii do not want annexation to the United States either as a Territory or as a State. When I speak of the people of Hawaii I speak of the native Hawaiians and of the intelligent population of the country, and I have no hesitation in saying that from the evidence before us the people of Hawaii will vote down the proposition to have Hawaii incorporated as part of the territorial domain of the United States.

Why, sir, it has been contended that half a dozen or any small number of Americans going to any country in the world and by hook or crook obtaining the dominancy in that country have a right of themselves to ask the United States to take that country into its domain and to shelter it with its flag.

I will read the first of the acts of Congress under the old Confederation, of date Tuesday, October 10, 1780, as found on page 64, House Miscellaneous Document, second session Forty-seventh Congress:

Resolved, That the unappropriated lands that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States by any particular State, pursuant to the recommendation of Congress of the 6th day of September last, shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and be settled and formed into distinct republican States, which shall become members of the Federal Union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence as the other States; that each State which shall be so formed shall contain a suitable extent of territory, not less than 100 nor more than 150 miles square, or as near thereto as circumstances will admit; that the necessary and reasonable expenses which any particular State shall have incurred since the commencement of the present war, in subduing any British posts, or in maintaining forts or garrisons within and for the defense, or in acquiring any part of the territory that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States, shall be reimbursed.

That the said lands shall be granted or settled at such times and under such regulations as shall hereafter be agreed on by the United States, in Congress assembled, or any nine or more of them.

I desire to incorporate this into the RECORD and make it a part of my remarks, so that it can be seen that the territory ceded by certain of the original States was ceded for the express purpose of being carved into republican States with such and such dimensions, and it is those States, and those States only, which are new States and can be called new States under the fourth article of the Constitution.

Mr. BATE. May I ask the Senator from Louisiana a question?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. BATE. Does that apply particularly to the Northwestern Territory ceded by Virginia, or to all the Territories after that act?

Mr. CAFFERY. It applies to every particle of the territory that was then ceded or that might be thereafter ceded by Virginia, by New York, by Connecticut, by Massachusetts, by Georgia.

Mr. BATE. And by North Carolina.

Mr. CAFFERY. And by North Carolina. Every State that had uninhabited lands ceded them over to the United States, in order that out of the common fund proceeding from the sale of the lands the whole Union might be benefited and the expenses of the war in part reimbursed.

Mr. President, this inquiry, to my mind, is not only interesting, but very instructive. Take these cessions, take the article of the Constitution providing for the admission by Congress of new States, the article providing for the regulation of the Territories, the article providing for the power of making treaties, and the whole matter will resolve itself into the proposition that the original framers of this document had no other view, no other purpose, in granting the power to Congress to admit new States than to grant the power to admit just such States—new, republican—as might be carved out of this ceded territory.

I contend that the precedent of Texas is no precedent whatever. It is nothing more nor less than the precedent that a certain political majority in Congress, having political purposes in view, voted as for a partisan necessity to take Texas into the Union under the clause of the Constitution allowing Congress to admit new States. That precedent has no judicial force or sanction; it is not supported by any, or if by any, by no strong argument. If the proponents of this scheme rely upon this precedent as the precedent, let them follow the precedent. They have not followed the precedent. Take Hawaii in her Statehood, such as it may be, if you want to follow the precedent; take Hawaii with the consent of the Hawaiians, if you want to follow the precedent. You have done neither; you propose to annex it as territory under a legislative act, a law. Why, sir, there never has been so flagrant a violation of the terms of the Constitution, so flagrant a departure from the precedents set up for us to follow.

Mr. President, I shall argue next that the Government of the United States owes it to itself to look into this matter of the annexation of the territory of Hawaii, because the officials of the United States, civil and military, in my judgment, contributed to the overthrow of the old Kingdom of Hawaii and the establishment of the present so-called Republic of those islands.

What, sir, is the history of those islands? As early as 1720 they were discovered by an English navigator, Captain Cook. Long before the missionaries from New England went there, in 1820, the islands were a necessary resort for the whaling ships that sailed from the Atlantic around the Horn into the Pacific to stop for supplies of water and provisions. At that period the North Atlantic and the arctic seas were filled with whales, and the Hawaiians were brought into prominence and into commercial contact with the United States by and through our merchant marine stopping at those islands in order to carry on successfully their whaling voyages.

In 1820 certain devout, pious, educated, highly cultured gentlemen from New England undertook to spread the light of Christianity in those islands and to win the natives from their idolatrous worship. They were a set of men of noble purpose and, so far as history goes, they were men of exemplary lives. The native Hawaiian was a savage but little removed from cannibalism, but with an extraordinary docility of character, a wonderful hospitality of nature, and he accepted gladly the aid that the missionaries gave him to see the beauties and the benefits of the Christian religion and of Christian civilization.

History does not record, Mr. President, a similar class of Indians to those that inhabited the Hawaiian Islands. There is no other record in history that I am aware of where the white man's religion and the white man's civilization was cordially and gladly accepted by the natives. The North American Indians met our ancestors with the bow and with the arrow. They fought every inch of territory that the white man attempted to occupy. They scorned his religion and his learning. The only instance in all this North American continent where any peaceable means was exercised to obtain possession of lands from the Indians was in the case of Pennsylvania. These Hawaiians were a very docile, a very gentle, a very hospitable people. They numbered, it is said, at the time Captain Cook discovered the islands, about 300,000 souls.

After the New England missionaries had become firmly planted in the islands they gradually obtained the confidence of the Hawaiian chiefs, they gradually ingratiated themselves into the favor of the ruling powers, and they gradually shaped the character and kind of government that the islands possessed afterwards. They changed a feudal, tribal monarchy into a constitutional kingdom. They not only gave Hawaii its religion, but they gave it its laws.

Mr. President, about 1843 this little Kingdom was disturbed by the hostile act of a British commander of a war vessel. On account of some wrong, real or imaginary, he took possession of the public buildings of Honolulu and erected the British standard. He attempted to collect, and did collect, the custom revenues of the island in order to indemnify a British subject for an alleged wrong. This act was complained of, and the Hawaiian Government sent commissioners to the United States. Those commissioners laid the complaint of the Hawaiian Kingdom before this Government. That was the first instance where this little Kingdom was overawed by the show of hostile force by a foreign nation. The terror inspired by the taking possession of the public buildings of Honolulu by Lord George Paulet seems never to have been dissipated; it always lingered in the minds of the Hawaiians.

Again, some years later, the commander of a French frigate undertook and carried through the same hostile act, or about the same hostile act, as that perpetrated upon the Islands of Hawaii by the English commander. He took possession of the public buildings; he erected the French flag; and assumed charge and control over the city of Honolulu, the principal city of the Hawaiian Islands. That again was made the subject-matter of complaint upon the part of the Hawaiian Government. They sent their commissioners to the United States, implored the intermediation of the United States in their behalf, and finally, through the exertions of our minister in France and the Secretary of State here, the act was disclaimed upon the part of the French Government, and the wrong partially remedied. There again was the Hawaiian, good-natured, docile, hospitable, unwarlike, terrorized by the force of the white man.

At or about that time the King of Hawaii authorized a cession of these islands to the United States. That cession was made in view of depredations upon that Kingdom by the English and the French. There never has been any intention upon the part of Great Britain or of France or of any other power to take and to hold those islands as a dependency of their Government, but situated as they were in midocean, weak as they were in point of military strength, unwarlike as they were from their nature, they were subject to these sporadic depredations of foreign powers.

They became accustomed from these depredations to the irresistible power of the white man; for be it known that these Hawaiians are a race of Polynesian Indians, a most unique race, intelligent, hospitable, accepting the white man and his laws and his religion, and yet they are devoid of that natural and innate ferocity and courage that characterizes the North American Indian. About this time Mr. Webster stated the principle that the United States would observe toward the Hawaiian Islands. This is the first friendly message. It is under date of December 19, 1842, and is as follows:

The Secretary of State to the agents of the Sandwich Islands.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, December 19, 1842.

GENTLEMEN: I have received the letter which you did me the honor to address to me, under date of the 14th instant, stating that you had been commissioned to represent in the United States the Government of the Hawaiian Islands, inviting the attention of this Government to the relations between the two countries, and intimating a desire for a recognition of the Hawaiian Government by that of the United States.

Your communication has been laid before the President, and by him considered.

The advantages of your country to the navigators in the Pacific, and in particular to the numerous vessels and vast tonnage of the United States frequenting that sea, are fully estimated; and just acknowledgments are due to the Government and inhabitants of the islands for their numerous acts of hospitality to the citizens of the United States.

The United States have regarded the existing authorities in the Sandwich Islands as a Government suited to the condition of the people and resting on their own choice; and the President is of opinion that the interests of all the commercial nations require that that Government should not be interfered with by foreign powers. Of the vessels which visit the islands, it is known that a great majority belong to the United States.

The United States, therefore, are more interested in the fate of the islands, and of their Government, than any other nation can be; and this consideration induces the President to be quite willing to declare, as the sense of the Government of the United States, that the Government of the Sandwich Islands ought to be respected; that no power ought either to take possession of the islands as a conquest, or for the purpose of colonization, and that no power ought to seek for any undue control over the existing Government, or any exclusive privileges or preferences in matters of commerce.

Entertaining these sentiments, the President does not see any present necessity for the negotiation of a formal treaty or the appointment or reception of diplomatic characters. A consul or agent from this Government will continue to reside in the islands. He will receive particular instructions to pay just and careful attention to any claims or complaints which may be brought against the Government or people of the islands by citizens of the United States, and he will also be instructed to receive any complaints which may be made by that Government for acts of individuals (citizens of the United States) on account of which the interference of this Government may be requested, and to transmit such complaint to this Department.

It is not improbable that this correspondence may be made the subject of a communication to Congress, and it will be officially made known to the governments of the principal commercial powers of Europe.

I have the honor to be, gentlemen, your obedient servant.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

Messrs. TIMOTEO HAALILIO and WILLIAM RICHARDS, Washington.

Sir, I will have read what Mr. Webster says in another communication in regard to the position that the United States intended to hold toward those islands. I will send this up to the Secretary, and ask that it may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested. The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. Webster to Mr. Severance.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 14, 1851.

Sir: I have written you a regular official dispatch, setting forth the principles of policy which will be pursued by the Administration here in whatever respects the Government of the Hawaiian Islands.

I now write you a letter of private instructions, made necessary by suggestions contained in your communications by Lieutenant Johnson.

In the first place, I have to say that the war-making power in this Government rests entirely with Congress, and that the President can authorize belligerent operations only in the cases expressly provided for by the Constitution and the laws. By these no power is given to the Executive to oppose an attack by one independent nation on the possessions of another.

We are bound to regard both France and Hawaii as independent states, and equally independent; and though the general policy of the Government might lead it to take part with either in a controversy with the other, still, if this interference be an act of hostile force, it is not within the constitutional power of the President, and still less is it within the power of any subordinate agent of government, civil or military. If the Serissee had attacked Honolulu, and thereupon the Vandalia had fired upon the Serissee, this last act would have been an act of violence against France not to be justified, and, in fact, if not disavowed at Washington, it would have been an act of war. In these cases, where the power of Congress can not be exercised beforehand, all must be left to the redress which that body may subsequently authorize. This you will constantly bear in mind. But, at the same time it is not necessary that you should enter into these explanations with the French commissioner or the French naval commander.

In my official letter of this date I have spoken of what the United States would do in certain contingencies. But in thus speaking of the Government of the United States I do not mean the executive power, but the Government in its general aggregate, and especially that branch of the Government which possesses the war-making power. This distinction you will carefully observe, and you will neither direct, request, nor encourage any naval officer of the United States in committing hostilities on French vessels of war.

Another leading topic in your communication is the proposed contingent surrender by the Government of the Islands of their sovereignty to the United States or their annexation to this country.

This is a very important question, and one which you will readily see rises above any functions with which you are charged. It may, indeed, be very proper for you in this case, as well as in all others, to communicate to your Government whatever the Government to which you are accredited desire to have so communicated; but it is very important that on a question involving such deep interests, both domestic and foreign, you should yourself altogether forbear expressing any opinion whatever to the Hawaiian Government. You will see by my official letter, which you are at liberty to communicate to that Government, the disposition of the United States to maintain its independence; beyond that you will not proceed.

The act of contingent or conditional surrender, which you mention in your letter as having been placed in your hands, you will please to return to the Hawaiian Government. In this case the Government of the United States acts upon principles of general policy; it will protect its own rights. It feels a deep interest in the preservation of Hawaiian independence, and all questions beyond this, should they arise, must be considered and settled here by the competent authorities.

You inform us that many American citizens have gone to settle in the islands; if so, they have ceased to be American citizens. The Government of the United States must, of course, feel an interest in them not extended to foreigners, but by the law of nations they have no right further to demand the protection of this Government. Whatever aid or protection might under any circumstances be given them must be given, not as a matter of right on their part, but in consistency with the general policy and duty of the Government and its relations with friendly powers.

You will therefore not encourage in them, nor, indeed, in any others, any idea or expectation that the islands will become annexed to the United States. All this, I repeat, will be judged of hereafter, as circumstances and events may require, by the Government at Washington.

I do not suppose there is any immediate danger of any new menaces from France; still less of any actual attack on the islands by her naval armament. Nevertheless you will keep us constantly and accurately informed of whatever transpires.

Your account of the prosperity of the islands and the fiscal condition of its Government is interesting, and you can be hardly too full and particular in such statements.

Mr. Allen is at present quite unwell at Boston. As soon as he is able he will return to his post. Lieutenant Johnson will take this dispatch to Panama. If Mr. Allen's illness should continue for any length of time, which we hope may not be the case, Lieutenant Johnson will be directed to return without him.

I have the honor, etc.,

DANIEL WEBSTER.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will the Secretary state to whom that letter was written?

The SECRETARY. To Mr. Severance, under date of July 14, 1851.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, it will be seen from this communication of Mr. Webster to the United States consul at Honolulu that he dwelt upon three topics: First, that the annexation of those islands could not then be entertained; second, that the United States intended to maintain the independence of the Hawaiian Islands, and third, that any American citizen going to Hawaii and making Hawaii his home and domicile could not claim the protection of the United States as an American citizen; that he became a citizen of Hawaii.

It had been well for this country had these precepts of Mr. Webster been followed by Minister Stevens, who was the resident minister of the United States at Honolulu when the Hawaiian Kingdom was overthrown by the revolution of 1893. Mr. Webster's policy was that of a broad statesman. While he expressed sympathy for citizens of the United States who had made their home in Hawaii, he yet claimed they were citizens of Hawaii and must look to Hawaii and not to the United States to protect them in resident citizenship.

Now, Mr. President, we have heard a great deal ever since the Hawaiian question was thrust upon the attention of the United States as to the duty of the United States toward resident Americans in Honolulu. We have been called upon to violate every precedent that has heretofore guided the American Government in the case of resident Americans in Hawaii. We have been called upon to tolerate acts of war and aggression, nay, not only to tolerate but to applaud acts of hostility and war upon the part of American residents of Hawaii against the Kingdom of Hawaii on the ground that they were originally citizens of the United States and had large property interests in Hawaii.

This doctrine did not obtain in Mr. Webster's time. He was one of the greatest men this country ever produced. There was no subject he touched which he did not illuminate with the light of an understanding unequalled not only in our own country, but in any country and in all countries, and he took the proper view of the question of American citizenship in foreign countries.

Sir, while we sympathize with Americans who go abroad to better their fortunes, while we sympathize with their aspirations to establish in their new homes government fashioned after that they left behind, it does not devolve upon us to lend the military arm, this powerful arm, of the Government of the United States to aid American residents of foreign countries to overthrow the government of the country where they have chosen to reside. All these invocations, therefore, in behalf of the American residents of Hawaii for help, for sympathy, for support from the United States ought to go unheeded, Mr. President, so far at least as to prevent us from giving them any material aid to overthrow the Government of the country in which they have established themselves.

If by reason of their own force, if by reason of their own courage—and the force and the courage of an American are not excelled by those of any other race on the globe—they succeed in establishing their republican idea of government in any country, in any isle, wherever they may be, I bid them Godspeed; but do not let them go to the islands of the seas and there intrigue to bring about a cooperation of the military forces of the United States to aid them in the overthrow of the government where they have voluntarily chosen to reside. Such was the case in the revolution that effected the overthrow of the Kingdom of Hawaii in 1893.

Now, Mr. President, Mr. Webster's declaration in what I have just read amounts to a declaration of neutrality on the part of the United States. That is the proper position for the United States to assume. But further than that, sir, I will send to the desk and have read from the same book on page 97, a letter of Mr. Webster to Mr. Rives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Arkansas in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. Webster to Mr. Rives.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 19, 1851.

No. 23.] WILLIAM C. RIVES, Esq., etc.

SIR: In the dispatch from this Department (No. 15) of the 5th of July last, you were instructed with reference to the application of Messrs. G. P. Judd and James Jackson Jarves, special commissioners of the Hawaiian Government, for the mediation of the Government of the United States for the purpose of adjusting the differences between that Government and the Government of France. In your dispatch (No. 40) of the 12th of September, you stated that you would avail yourself of the first suitable occasion toward bringing about an amicable adjustment of the controversy. It is believed, however, that you have not since mentioned the subject.

It appears from the accompanying letters addressed to the Department and to the Rev. Rufus Anderson by Mr. Judd, from Panama, that the French Government declined to accept the mediation of the Government of Great Britain, and dispatched an agent to the Sandwich Islands, whom Mr. Judd met at Panama, waiting for the arrival of an armed force from Callao, with which he intended to proceed to the islands for hostile purposes. The public journals have since announced that he had reached his destination and had entered upon a correspondence with the Hawaiian Government. This intelligence has given the President much pain. It has also alarmed the American Board of Missions, whose corresponding secretary visited this city last autumn, brought with him the letter from Mr. Judd to the Rev. Mr. Anderson above referred to, and made application for vessels of war of the United States to be sent to the islands for the protection of the persons and property of the missionaries there.

Under these circumstances, if you should not already have made the French Government acquainted with the interest we feel in the independence of the islands, you will lose no time in taking that course.

The proceedings of M. Dillon and the French admiral there in 1849, so far as we are informed respecting them, seem, both in their origin and in their nature, to have been incompatible with any just regard for the Hawaiian Government as an independent state. They can not, according to our impressions, be accounted for upon any other hypothesis than a determination on the part of those officers to humble and annihilate that Government for refusing to accede to demands which, if granted, must have been at the expense of all self-respect and substantial sovereignty. The further enforcement of those demands which, it appears, is the object of Mr. Perrin's mission, would be tantamount to a subjugation of the islands to the dominion of France.

A step like this could not fail to be viewed by the Government and people of the United States with a dissatisfaction which would tend seriously to disturb our existing friendly relations with the French Government. This is a result to be deplored. If, therefore, it should not be too late, it is hoped that you will make such representations upon the subject to the minister of foreign affairs of France as will induce that Government to desist from measures incompatible with the sovereignty and independence of the Hawaiian Islands, and to make amends for the acts which the French agents have already committed there in contravention of the law of nations and of the treaty between the Hawaiian Government and France.

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

DANL. WEBSTER.

Mr. CAFFERY. In this communication Mr. Webster distinctly places Hawaii within the grasp of the Monroe doctrine. Upon that doctrine these islands stood until the revolution of 1893. The United States Government declared through its great Secretary of State that the United States would not permit those islands to be taken possession of or destroyed by any foreign power.

That declaration has stood from that day to this. That was a proper declaration. It comes within the meaning and intent of the Monroe doctrine—the doctrine which declares that the United States can intervene to prevent the act of any foreign nation when that act, whatever it may be, may threaten the integrity and safety of the United States. Although those islands are in midocean, 2,100 miles from the United States, they occupy such a position as that their permanent control and possession by any foreign power would materially threaten our western frontier.

Mr. President, this is a clean-cut, statesmanlike declaration, warranted by American precedent, warranted by every law which entitles one nation to protect itself against the aggression of others.

Another great Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine, declared that the policy of the United States toward those islands is one of benevolent neutrality. I will send to the desk and have read a letter from Mr. Blaine to Mr. Comly, found in the same book, page 1157. The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. Blaine to Mr. Comly.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 1, 1891.

No. 112.]

SIR: My late instructions, and especially that of the 19th ultimo, will have shown you the deep interest with which the United States observes the course of events in the Hawaiian Islands. The apparent disposition to extend other influences there in lines parallel to or offsetting our own must be watched with care and met with considerate firmness.

The intelligent and suggestive character of your recent dispatches naturally leads me to a review of the relationship of the Hawaiian Kingdom to the United States at somewhat greater length than was practicable in the limited scope of my instruction of November 19. That dispatch was necessarily confined to a consideration of the immediate question of a possible treaty engagement with Great Britain which would give to that power in Hawaii a degree of extraterritoriality of jurisdiction inconsistent with the relations of the islands to the other powers, and especially to the United States.

With the abandonment of feudal government by King Kamehameha III in 1859, and the inauguration of constitutional methods, the history of the political relation of Hawaii to the world at large may very properly be said to begin. The recognition of independent sovereignty by the great powers took place soon after that act on the part of the United States, dating from 1844. Even at that early day, before the United States had become a power on the Pacific coast, the commercial activity of our people was manifested in their intercourse with the islands of Oceania, of which the Hawaiian group is the northern extremity.

In 1848 the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo confirmed the territorial extension of the United States to the Pacific, and gave to the Union a coast line on that ocean little inferior in extent and superior in natural wealth to the Atlantic seaboard of the original thirteen States. In 1848-49 the discoveries of gold in California laid the foundation for the marvelous development of the western coast, and in that same year the necessities of our altered relationship to the Pacific Ocean found expression in a comprehensive treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation with the sovereign Kingdom of Hawaii.

The material connection between the Hawaiian Islands and the Pacific coast of the Union was natural and inevitable. But lately admitted to the family of separate States, Hawaii was necessarily drawn into close kinship with California, then just entering on a path of prosperity and greatness whose rapidity of development the world has never seen equaled. Hence the movements toward intimate commercial relations between the two countries, which, after the progressive negotiations of 1850, 1857, and 1860, culminated in the existing reciprocity treaty of January 30, 1875, which gave to the United States in Hawaii, and to Hawaii in the United States, trading rights and privileges in terms denied to other countries.

I have spoken of the Pacific coast line given to the American Union by the cession of California in 1848 as little inferior in extent and superior in natural wealth to the Atlantic seaboard of the original Union. Since that time our domain on the Pacific has been vastly increased by the purchase of Alaska. Taking San Francisco as the commercial center on the western slope, a line drawn northward to the Aleutian group marks our Pacific border almost to the confines of Asia. A corresponding line drawn southward from San Francisco to Honolulu marks the natural limit of the ocean belt within which our trade with the oriental countries must flow, and is, moreover, the direct line of communication between the United States and Australasia. Within this belt lies the commercial domain of our Western coast.

I have had recent occasion to set forth the vitally integral importance of our Pacific possessions in a circular letter addressed on the 24th of June last to our representatives in Europe, touching the necessary guaranties of the proposed Panama Canal as a purely American waterway to be treated as part of our own coast line. The extension of commercial empire westward from those States is no less vitally important to their development than is their communication with the eastern coast by the Isthmian channel. And when we survey the stupendous progress made by the western coast during the thirty years of its national life as a part of our dominion, its enormous increase of population, its vast resources of agriculture and mines, and its boundless enterprise, it is not easy to set a limit to its commercial activity or foresee a check to its maritime supremacy in the waters of the Orient, so long as those waters afford, as now, a free and neutral scope for our peaceful trade.

In thirty years the United States has acquired a legitimately dominant influence in the North Pacific, which it can never consent to see decreased by the intrusion therein of any element of influence hostile to its own. The situation of the Hawaiian Islands, giving them the strategic control of the North Pacific, brings their possession within the range of questions of purely American policy, as much so as that of the Isthmus itself. Hence the necessity, as recognized in our existing treaty relations, of drawing the ties of intimate relationship between us and the Hawaiian Islands, so as to make them practically a part of the American system without derogation of their absolute independence.

The reciprocity treaty of 1875 has made of Hawaii the sugar-raising field of the Pacific slope and gives to our manufacturers therein the same freedom as in California and Oregon. That treaty gave to Hawaii its first great impetus in trade and developed that activity of production which has attracted the eager attention of European powers, anxious to share in the prosperity and advantages which the United States have created in midocean. From 1877, the first full year succeeding the conclusion of the reciprocity treaty, to 1890, the imports from Hawaii to the United States nearly doubled, increasing from $2,550,335 in value to $4,000,444, and in this same period the exports from the United States to Hawaii rose from $1,272,949 to $2,020,170.

In a word, Hawaii is, by the wise and beneficent provisions of the treaty, brought within the circle of the domestic trade of the United States, and our interest in its friendly neutrality is akin to that we feel in the guaranteed independence of Panama. On the other hand, the interests of Hawaii must inevitably turn toward the United States in the future, as in the present, as its natural and sole ally in conserving the dominion of both in the Pacific trade. Your own observation, during your residence at Honolulu, has shown you the vitality of the American sentiment which this state of things has irresistibly developed in the islands. I view that sentiment as the logical recognition of the needs of Hawaii as a member of the American system of States rather than as a blind desire for a protectorate or ultimate annexation to the American Union.

This Government has on previous occasions been brought face to face with the question of a protectorate over the Hawaiian group. It has, as often as it arose, been set aside in the interest of such commercial union and such reciprocity of benefits as would give to Hawaii the highest advantages and at the same time strengthen its independent existence as a sovereign State. In this I have summed up the whole disposition of the United States toward Hawaii in its present condition.

The policy of this country with regard to the Pacific is the natural complement to its Atlantic policy. The history of our European relations for fifty years shows the jealous concern with which the United States has guarded its control of the coast from foreign interference, and this without extension of territorial possession beyond the mainland. It has always been its aim to preserve the friendly neutrality of the adjacent states and insular possessions. Its attitude toward Cuba is in point. That rich island, the key to the Gulf of Mexico and the field for our most extended trade in the Western Hemisphere, is, though in the hands of Spain, a part of the American commercial system.

Our relations, present and prospective, toward Cuba have never been more ably set forth than in the remarkable note addressed by my predecessor, Mr. Secretary Everett, to the ministers of Great Britain and France in Washington, on the 1st of December, 1893, in rejection of the suggested tripartite alliance to forever determine the neutrality of the Spanish Antilles. In response to the proposal that the United States, Great Britain, and France should severally and collectively agree to forbid the acquisition of control over Cuba, by any or all of them, Mr. Everett showed that, without forcing or even coveting possession of the island, its condition was essentially an American question; that the renunciation forever by this Government of contingent interest therein would be far broader than the like renunciation by Great Britain or France; that, if ever ceasing to be Spanish, Cuba must necessarily become American, and not fall under any other European domination, and that the ceaseless movement of segregation of American interests from European control and unification in a broader American sphere of independent life could not and should not be checked by any arbitrary agreement.

Nearly thirty years have demonstrated the wisdom of the attitude then maintained by Mr. Everett and have made indispensable its continuance and its extension to all parts of the American Atlantic system where a disturbance of the existing status might be attempted in the interest of foreign powers. The present attitude of this Government toward any European project for the control of an isthmian route is but the logical sequence of the resistance made in 1893 to the attempted pressure of an active foreign influence in the West Indies.

Hawaii, although much farther from the California coast than is Cuba from the Floridian peninsula, holds in the western sea much the same position as Cuba in the Atlantic. It is the key to the maritime dominion of the Pacific States, as Cuba is the key to the Gulf trade. The material possession of Hawaii is not desired by the United States any more than was that of Cuba. But under no circumstances can the United States permit any change in the territorial control of either which would cut it adrift from the American system, whereof they both indispensably belong.

In this aspect of the question it is readily seen with what concern this Government must view any tendency toward introducing into Hawaii new social elements destructive of its necessarily American character. The steady diminution of the native population of the islands, amounting to some 10 per cent between 1872 and 1878, and still continuing, is doubtless a cause of great alarm to the Government of the Kingdom, and it is no wonder that a solution should be sought with eagerness in any seemingly practicable quarter.

The problem, however, is not to be met by a substitution of Mongolian supremacy for native control—as seems at first sight possible through the rapid increase in Chinese immigration to the islands. Neither is a wholesale introduction of the coolie element, professedly Anglo-Indian, likely to afford any more satisfactory outcome to the difficulty. The Hawaiian Islands can not be joined to the Asiatic system. If they drift from their independent station, it must be toward assimilation and identification with the American system, to which they belong by the operation of natural laws and must belong by the operation of political necessity.

I have deemed it necessary to go, with somewhat of detail, into the real nature of our relations toward Hawaii, in order that you may intelligently construe my recent instructions in the light of our true and necessary policy on the Pacific. It may also tend to simplify your intercourse with the native government if you are in a position to disabuse the minds of its statesmen of any belief or impression that our course is selfishly intrusive, or looks merely to the exclusive retention of transient advantages of local commerce, in which other countries seek a share. The United States was one of the first among the great nations of the world to take an active interest in the upbuilding of Hawaiian independence and the creation of a new and potential life for its people. It has consistently endeavored, and with success, to enlarge the material prosperity of Hawaii on such independent basis. It proposes to be equally unremitting in its efforts hereafter to maintain and develop the advantages which have accrued to Hawaii and to draw closer the ties which imperatively unite it to the great body of American Commonwealths.

In this line of action the United States does its simple duty both to Hawaii and itself; and it can not permit such obvious neglect of national interest as would be involved by silent acquiescence in any movement looking to a lessening of those American ties and the substitution of alien and hostile interests. It firmly believes that the position of the Hawaiian Islands as a key to the dominion of the American Pacific demands their benevolent neutrality, to which end it will earnestly cooperate with the native Government. And if, through any cause, the maintenance of such a position of benevolent neutrality should be found by Hawaii to be impracticable, this Government would then unhesitatingly meet the altered situation by seeking an avowedly American solution for the grave issues presented.

The communication to the Hawaiian Government of the views herein expressed is left, both as to manner and extent, to your own discretion. If the treaty relations with Great Britain, of which my last instruction treats, prove to be of such a nature as to require the communication of a formal protest in the premises to the Hawaiian minister of foreign affairs, it would probably be wise for you to give him a copy of this dispatch as a just and temperate exposition of the intentions of this Government, and a succinct explanation of the reasons which have induced such a protest. Even if the formal delivery hereof to the minister should not appear advisable, it would be well for you to reflect this policy in your conversations with the public men at Honolulu, who will, I am sure, find these views in harmony with the true interests of the Hawaiian Kingdom as they are with those of the United States.

I am, etc.,

JAMES G. BLAINE.

Mr. CAFFERY. This letter of Mr. Blaine emphasizes the declaration of Mr. Webster that Hawaii is placed within the operation and application of the Monroe doctrine; that, being the key to the Pacific, no foreign interference of a character to endanger its independence or in any way to control its destinies would be for a moment tolerated by the United States. He further says that the true position of the United States toward these islands is one of benevolent neutrality. He states that whenever the time came that the affairs of those islands would drift toward the East rather than toward the United States there might be then need for a closer alliance between Hawaii and the United States.

But there is nothing of that sort which has ever occurred. It is boasted that the Hawaiian Republic is founded upon a sure and solid rock of security. The conspirators who established it vaunt their strength to hold their own not only against domestic foes but against any ordinary foreign interference.

Now, when a republic, established upon the ruins of the old monarchy it overthrew, sets forth pretensions of such security and strength as the Republic of Hawaii does, the contingency has not occurred when the United States, out of its own self-defense, and not for any protection of Hawaii, would be bound to draw closer the lines that connect the two countries together.

Now, I will introduce, if I can lay my hand upon it—if not, I will ask it to be placed in the RECORD—a convention between France and Great Britain in 1843, or thereabouts, whereby each of the high contracting parties agreed to maintain the independence of those islands. I will introduce this convention in order to disprove the constant assertion that if the United States does not take these islands France or Great Britain or some other power will. After these islands have lain in midocean from the time of their discovery, in 1720, down to date without any foreign power laying its hands upon them, or any foreign power manifesting any disposition to take them, the assertion is constantly made, in order to hurry us into schemes of annexation, that some foreign power covets these islands.

The convention referred to is as follows:

Declaration of Great Britain and France relative to the independence of the Sandwich Islands, London, November 23, 1843.

Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and His Majesty the King of the French, taking into consideration the existence in the Sandwich Islands of a government capable of providing for the regularity of its relations with foreign nations, have thought it right to engage, reciprocally, to consider the Sandwich Islands as an independent state, and never to take possession, either directly or under the title of protectorate, or under any other form, of any part of the territory of which they are composed.

The undersigned, Her Majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, and the ambassador extraordinary of His Majesty the King of the French at the court of London, being furnished with the necessary powers, hereby declare in consequence that their said majesties take reciprocally that engagement.

In witness whereof the undersigned have signed the present declaration, and have affixed thereto the seal of their arms.

Done in duplicate at London, the 28th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1843.

ABERDEEN,
ST. LAULRE.

Mr. CAFFERY. It has been a frequent thing for Senators of the jingo breed—and I do not say that with any disrespect to them, using a common term now that signifies a politician of a kind who wants to stretch out and embrace every portion of God's habitable earth that the United States can lay its hands upon—I say it has been a favorite theme with them whenever they want to urge and precipitate this question of annexation to say that the British Lion is about to commence his land grabbing again; that he is covetous of Hawaii. But, sir, this convention between these two States, Great Britain and France, absolutely disproves any such allegation. No state in Christendom wanted the Hawaiian Islands, no state wants them now, because at any time in the past any of the foreign states, prior to the declaration of the United States in 1843, could have taken them.

After the establishment of a constitutional government in Hawaii by and through the aid of American missionaries that Government went on with a prosperous career. The affairs of the islands were well administered. They are islands of unequalled fertility. The climate appears to be of that character which, while it does not urge and incite to much energy, yet is so equable and mild and temperate as to be courted by those who are in search of a climate of luxurious ease. It does not appear to conduce to the energy of the white man, but it appears to be precisely suited to the character and constitution of the black man.

Down to the time when David Kalakaua ascended the throne of Hawaii that little Kingdom was as prosperous as ordinary communities in this world are, but at the advent of Kalakaua there was a movement put on foot of an insurrectionary character. The Hawaiians became tired, as it were, of the government of the white man, for, as I have before stated, the affairs of those islands were largely controlled and administered by white men, white missionaries or the descendants of missionaries, and a revolution was concocted by the adherents of Queen Emma to oust from the throne David Kalakaua. That revolution was put down largely through the instrumentality of marines landed from United States and British war ships. They were called for by the King, and the landing of the troops immediately dispersed the insurgents and put down the insurrection.

I state these facts in order to show the great effect that the landing of white troops has upon those native Hawaiians. They immediately subside; they immediately discontinue their revolutionary acts or other acts of violence and submit without a murmur. The troops landed at the request of the King preserved order and destroyed the revolution.

Now, that effect was well known to Mr. Stevens, the American minister at Honolulu in 1873. Kalakaua administered the affairs of that island down to the accession of the deposed Queen Liliuokalani. When she came to the throne she found a constitution of government which had been proclaimed by David Kalakaua, proclaimed at the instigation of the whites, proclaimed in the interest of the whites, proclaimed in such way with such provisions as practically to place the affairs of the island in the hands of the white oligarchy and to deny the natives any material share in it. Qualifications were imposed on the electors of the nobles, and the appointment of the nobles by the crown was taken away.

The nobles were elected. Very large qualifications were required for a noble, and large qualifications were required for the electors of a noble. So the Hawaiian native population was practically excluded from any administration in the affairs of the Hawaiian Islands by the constitution proclaimed by David Kalakaua.

Kalakaua did precisely, at the instigation of the whites, what the whites dethroned Queen Liliuokalani for threatening to do. She threatened to proclaim a constitution which restored the rights of the native Hawaiians as they existed before the proclamation of the constitution by David Kalakaua. For that offense she was dethroned, and in order to dethrone her the United States marines were landed from the Boston at the request of the resident minister, Mr. Stevens, on the specious pretext of preserving American life and property.

I have narrated that in the difficulties between the Hawaiian Kingdom and the French and the English, and also in the émeute led by Queen Emma, the Hawaiians were overawed, completely subdued by a display of foreign force, and this expedient was resorted to by Mr. Stevens and the revolutionists in order to overthrow the Kingdom of Queen Liliuokalani.

Now, Mr. President, there is one act of President Cleveland for which the gratitude of the people of the United States is due him. There is one act of his which the impartial historian will hereafter record as one of his chief merits to renown, and that act was the repudiation and the withdrawal of the treaty of annexation sent to the Senate by his predecessor, and in the investigation of the affairs of that island that led up to the destruction of the Kingdom of Hawaii and in his efforts to undo the wrong that had been inflicted upon that Kingdom by and through the instrumentality of the United States forces.

It was a bold act; it was a statesmanlike act; it was a proper act. If the facts demonstrate, as I think they do, and as I have always thought they did, that the dethronement of Queen Liliuokalani was brought about by the use of the United States marines at the request of the United States minister, then I say the United States stands estopped from taking the territory acquired by the Government that overthrew the Kingdom of Hawaii and dethroned its Queen. In good conscience, we ought not and dare not take the territory when a suspicion of fraud and complicity with revolutionary designs and projects is traced home to the United States.

It is true that we can deal with a government as a de facto government without looking into the equities of the title of that government, but when the very Government that proposes to transfer us the sovereignty of the Hawaiian territory was installed and brought into being by and through the illegal use of United States troops, I hold that the United States stands estopped from taking that territory thus tainted with its own illegal act.

On the 14th day of January, 1893, it is said that Queen Liliuokalani from the portico or the front steps of her palace made a speech to her people in which she declared that she would proclaim a constitution of government restoring them to their just share in the administration of their government. The island was in profound peace up to that period. There was not a ripple of revolution. There had been some intrigues whereby it was attempted to vote a want of confidence in the ministry by the legislature, but the effort failed and the ministry retained their places.

But, Mr. President, this act of the Queen was made the pretext of a conspiracy to dethrone her; and what was the Queen doing? In whose behalf was she acting? The Queen was attempting to restore the privilege of participation in the Government of Hawaii to the native Hawaiians. That is what she was trying to do. She was attempting to proclaim a constitution which allowed the Queen to appoint the nobles. It was known that the Queen would appoint the nobles, who constituted the upper house in the legislature, largely out of the native Hawaiian element.

It was a constitution which looked toward reducing the qualification of the electors of nobles, so that the native Hawaiian might vote, and the native Hawaiians were making this demand. They were the people who were attempting to be heard. They constituted the electorate of that Kingdom, or should constitute it. Queen Liliuokalani was their Queen. If the Americans who were there did not like that government they had no right to invoke the aid of the military arm of the United States to effect their purpose to destroy it. That is what they did, and without having done that they would not have succeeded.

There is no use to discuss the de jure or the de facto character of a government. If there is a suspicion that we have unduly dealt with these Hawaiians, if there is a suspicion that the title offered us by the present Republic of Hawaii comes tainted with the illegal and oppressive and unjust act of our own Government, I say in good conscience we can not take any cognizance whatever of the proposition to accept this territory.

Now, Mr. President, I repeat, there is no use to go into any question of dry law on this subject. It is not a question of dry law. The Republic of Hawaii is a de facto government. We can deal with them. If this treaty comes properly before us we can take cognizance of it. If this joint resolution is the proper way of annexing these islands we can do so legally, notwithstanding that there might be some question of the de jure character of that Government. But the question nearly relates to us. Complicity with the revolution that overthrew the Queen and established the present Republic is directly traceable to us, and we must, therefore, look to it and see whether or not these allegations of the President of the United States, Mr. Cleveland, whether or not the findings of fact by Commissioner Blount are true, before we go into the question of accepting the territory thus acquired.

I will ask the Secretary to read partly the message of President Cleveland down to page 10. I will ask that the whole of it be inserted in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Arkansas in the chair). If the Senator from Louisiana will yield a moment, it is manifest to the Chair that there is not a quorum present in the Senate, and the Chair will order the roll to be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen,	Davis,	Jones, Ark.	Platt, N. Y.
Allison,	Elkins,	Kyle,	Pritchard,
Bacon,	Fairbanks,	Lodge,	Proctor,
Baker,	Faulkner,	McBride,	Shoup,
Bate,	Foraker,	Mallory,	Spooner,
Berry,	Frye,	Mason,	Stewart,
Burrows,	Gallinger,	Mills,	Teller,
Butler,	Gear,	Money,	Tillman,
Caffery,	Gorman,	Morgan,	Turley,
Carter,	Hanna,	Morrill,	Warren,
Clark,	Hansbrough,	Pasco,	Wetmore,
Clay,	Harris,	Perkins,	Wilson.
Cockrell,	Hawley,	Pettus,
Cullom,	Heitfeld,	Platt, Conn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There being a quorum present at this moment in the Chamber, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] is entitled to the floor.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 27th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 484) granting an increase of pension to Carlton W. Muzzy;

An act (S. 1475) granting an increase of pension to Elijah N. Parkhurst;

An act (S. 2541) granting a pension to Clara R. Rodgers;

An act (S. 2588) increasing the pension of Corriassanda L. McGuire;

An act (S. 2678) for the relief of Lizzie Hagny, as administratrix of the estate of Frank B. Smith, deceased;

An act (S. 3850) granting an increase of pension to Blanche E. Barlow;

An act (S. 3515) granting an increase of pension to Mary L. Page;

An act (S. 4533) to increase the pension of Lucinda Booth;

An act (S. 4738) to authorize the Kansas, Oklahoma and Gulf Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Chillico Indian Reservation, Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes;

An act (S. 4750) granting right of way through the Pikes Peak Timber Land Reserve and the public lands to the Cripple Creek District Railway Company; and

An act (S. 4759) to authorize the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway Company to straighten and restore the channel of the South Canadian River, in the Indian Territory, at the crossing of said railroad.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

Mr. KYLE. I hold in my hand Senate Document No. 318, relating to the hours of labor for workmen, mechanics, etc., which consists of hearings before the Committee on Education and Labor pro and con. There are numerous calls for this document from manufacturers and members of labor organizations. I therefore ask consent of the Senate for the publication of 1,000 copies for the use of the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will it not be well, I will inquire of the Senator, to have some copies for the other members of the Senate who are not on the Committee on Education and Labor? I have had calls for this document. Why not make the order for 2,000 copies—1,000 for the use of the committee and 1,000 for the Senate?

Mr. KYLE. I will accept the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire and will ask that 1,000 copies of the document be printed for the use of the Senate and 1,000 for the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. GALLINGER. One thousand should be for the document room.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Can the Senator give any intimation as to what the cost of the printing will be?

Mr. KYLE. I think it comes within the proper limits, whatever that may be. I think the cost will be about $60.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then it will come within the rule. The order for the printing will be made, in the absence of objection.

ANNEXATION OF THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 259) to provide for annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States.

Mr. CAFFERY resumed his speech. After having spoken for one hour,

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Iowa? Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on amendments of the Senate numbered 13, 14, 186, 221, 222, and 223 to the bill (H. R. 8428) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

W. B. ALLISON,
EUGENE HALE,
A. P. GORMAN,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. G. CANNON,
WM. A. STONE,
JOSEPH D. SAYERS,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ALLISON. There are only five amendments in disagreement. I move that the Senate still further insist upon its amendments, and ask a further conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference; and Mr. ALLISON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. GORMAN were appointed.

ANNEXATION OF THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 259) to provide for annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States.

Mr. CAFFERY. I ask that the paper which I have sent to the desk may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In my recent annual message to the Congress I briefly referred to our relations with Hawaii and expressed the intention of transmitting further information on the subject when additional advices permitted.

Though I am not able now to report a definite change in the actual situation, I am convinced that the difficulties lately created both here and in Hawaii and now standing in the way of a solution through Executive action of the problem presented, render it proper and expedient that the matter should be referred to the broader authority and discretion of Congress, with a full explanation of the endeavor thus far made to deal with the emergency and a statement of the considerations which have governed my action.

I suppose that right and justice should determine the path to be followed in treating this subject. If national honesty is to be disregarded and a desire for territorial extension, or dissatisfaction with a form of government not our own, ought to regulate our conduct, I have entirely misapprehended the mission and character of our Government and the behavior which the conscience of our people demands of their public servants.

When the present Administration entered upon its duties the Senate had under consideration a treaty providing for the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands to the territory of the United States. Surely under our Constitution and laws the enlargement of our limits is a manifestation of the highest attribute of sovereignty, and if entered upon as an Executive act all things relating to the transaction should be clear and free from suspicion. Additional importance attached to this particular treaty of annexation because it contemplated a departure from unbroken American tradition in providing for the addition to our territory of islands of the sea more than 2,000 miles removed from our nearest coast.

These considerations might not of themselves call for interference with the completion of a treaty entered upon by a previous Administration. But it appeared from the documents accompanying the treaty when submitted to the Senate that the ownership of Hawaii was tendered to us by a provisional government set up to succeed the constitutional ruler of the islands, who had been dethroned, and it did not appear that such provisional government had the sanction of either popular revolution or suffrage. Two other remarkable features of the transaction naturally attracted attention. One was the extraordinary haste—not to say precipitancy—characterizing all the transactions connected with the treaty.

It appeared that a so-called committee of safety, ostensibly the source of the revolt against the constitutional Government of Hawaii, was organized on Saturday, the 14th day of January; that on Monday, the 16th, the United States forces were landed at Honolulu from a naval vessel lying in its harbor; that on the 17th the scheme of a provisional government was perfected, and a proclamation naming its officers was on the same day prepared and read at the Government building; that immediately thereupon the United States minister recognized the provisional government thus created; that two days afterwards, on the 19th day of January, commissioners representing such government sailed for this country in a steamer especially chartered for the occasion, arriving in San Francisco on the 28th day of January, and in Washington on the 3d day of February; that on the next day they had their first interview with the Secretary of State, and another on the 11th, when the treaty of annexation was practically agreed upon, and that on the 14th it was formally concluded and on the 15th transmitted to the Senate. Thus between the initiation of the scheme for a provisional government in Hawaii on the 14th day of January and the submission to the Senate of the treaty of annexation concluded with such government, the entire interval was thirty-two days, fifteen of which were spent by the Hawaiian commissioners in their journey to Washington.

In the next place, upon the face of the papers submitted with the treaty, it clearly appeared that there was open and undetermined an issue of fact of the most vital importance. The message of the President accompanying the treaty declared that "the overthrow of the monarchy was not in any way promoted by this Government," and in a letter to the President from the Secretary of State, also submitted to the Senate with the treaty, the following passage occurs: "At the time the provisional government took possession of the Government buildings no troops or officers of the United States were present or took any part whatever in the proceedings. No public recognition was accorded to the provisional government by the United States minister until after the Queen's abdication and when they were in effective possession of the Government buildings, the archives, the treasury, the barracks, the police station, and all the potential machinery of the Government." But a protest also accompanied said treaty, signed by the Queen and her ministers at the time she made way for the provisional government, which explicitly stated that she yielded to the superior force of the United States, whose minister had caused United States troops to be landed at Honolulu and declared that he would support such provisional government.

The truth or falsity of this protest was surely of the first importance. If true, nothing but the concealment of its truth could induce our Government to negotiate with the semblance of a government thus created, nor could a treaty resulting from the acts stated in the protest have been knowingly deemed worthy of consideration by the Senate. Yet the truth or falsity of the protest had not been investigated.

I conceived it to be my duty, therefore, to withdraw the treaty from the Senate for examination, and meanwhile to cause an accurate, full, and impartial examination to be made of the facts attending the subversion of the constitutional Government of Hawaii, and the installment in its place of the provisional government. I selected for the work of investigation the Hon. James H. Blount, of Georgia, whose service of eighteen years as a member of the House of Representatives, and whose experience as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in that body, and his consequent familiarity with international topics, joined with his high character and honorable reputation, seemed to render him peculiarly fitted for the duties intrusted to him. His report detailing his action under the instructions given to him and the conclusions derived from his investigation accompany this message.

These conclusions do not rest for their acceptance entirely upon Mr. Blount's honesty and ability as a man, nor upon his acumen and impartiality as an investigator. They are accompanied by the evidence upon which they are based, which evidence is also herewith transmitted, and from which it seems to me no other deductions could possibly be reached than those arrived at by the commissioner.

The report with its accompanying proofs, and such other evidence as is now before the Congress or is herewith submitted, justifies in my opinion the statement that when the President was led to submit the treaty to the Senate with the declaration that "the overthrow of the monarchy was not in any way promoted by this Government," and when the Senate was induced to receive and discuss it on that basis, both President and Senate were misled.

The attempt will not be made in this communication to touch upon all the facts which throw light upon the progress and consummation of this scheme of annexation. A very brief and imperfect reference to the facts and evidence at hand will exhibit its character and the incidents in which it had its birth.

It is unnecessary to set forth the reasons which in January, 1893, led a considerable portion of American and other foreign merchants and traders residing at Honolulu to favor the annexation of Hawaii to the United States. It is sufficient to note the fact and to observe that the project was one which was zealously promoted by the minister representing the United States in that country. He evidently had an ardent desire that it should become a fact accomplished by his agency and during his ministry, and was not inconveniently scrupulous as to the means employed to that end.

On the 19th day of November, 1892, nearly two months before the first overt act tending toward the subversion of the Hawaiian Government and the attempted transfer of Hawaiian territory to the United States, he addressed a long letter to the Secretary of State in which the case for annexation was elaborately argued, on moral, political, and economical grounds. He refers to the loss to the Hawaiian sugar interests from the operation of the McKinley bill, and the tendency to still further depreciation of sugar property unless some positive measure of relief is granted. He strongly inveighs against the existing Hawaiian Government and emphatically declares for annexation. He says: "In truth, the monarchy here is an absurd anachronism. It has nothing on which it logically or legitimately stands. The feudal basis on which it once stood no longer existing, the monarchy now is only an impediment to good government—an obstruction to the prosperity and progress of the islands."

He further says: "As a Crown colony of Great Britain or a Territory of the United States, the government modifications could be made readily and good administration of the law secured. Destiny and the vast future interests of the United States in the Pacific clearly indicate who at no distant day must be responsible for the government of these islands. Under a Territorial government they could be as easily governed as any of the existing Territories of the United States. * * * Hawaii has reached the parting of the ways. She must now take the road which leads to Asia, or the other which outlets her in America, gives her an American civilization, and binds her to the care of American destiny." He also declares:

"One of two courses seems to me absolutely necessary to be followed, either bold and vigorous measures for annexation or a 'customs union,' an ocean cable from the Californian coast to Honolulu, Pearl Harbor perpetually ceded to the United States, with an implied but not expressly stipulated American protectorate over the islands. I believe the former to be the better, that which will prove much the more advantageous to the islands and the cheapest and least embarrassing in the end to the United States. If it was wise for the United States through Secretary Marcy thirty-eight years ago to offer to expend $100,000 to secure a treaty of annexation, it certainly cannot be chimerical or unwise to expend $100,000 to secure annexation in the near future. To-day the United States has five times the wealth she possessed in 1854, and the reasons now existing for annexation are much stronger than they were then. I can not refrain from expressing the opinion with emphasis that the golden hour is near at hand."

These declarations certainly show a disposition and condition of mind which may be usefully recalled when interpreting the significance of the minister's conceded acts or when considering the probabilities of such conduct on his part as may not be admitted.

In this view it seems proper to also quote from a letter written by the minister to the Secretary of State on the 8th day of March, 1892, nearly a year prior to the first step taken toward annexation. After stating the possibility that the existing Government of Hawaii might be overturned by an orderly and peaceful revolution, Minister Stevens writes as follows: "Ordinarily, in like circumstances, the rule seems to be to limit the landing and movement of United States forces in foreign waters and dominion exclusively to the protection of the United States legation and of the lives and property of American citizens. But, as the relations of the United States to Hawaii are exceptional, and in former years the United States officials here took somewhat exceptional action in circumstances of disorder, I desire to know how far the present minister and naval commander may deviate from established international rules and precedents in the contingencies indicated in the first part of this dispatch."

To a minister of this temper, full of zeal for annexation, there seemed to arise in January, 1893, the precise opportunity for which he was watchfully waiting—an opportunity which by timely "deviation from established international rules and precedents" might be improved to successfully accomplish the great object in view; and we are quite prepared for the exultant enthusiasm with which, in a letter to the State Department, dated February 1, 1893, he declares: "The Hawaiian pear is now fully ripe and this is the golden hour for the United States to pluck it."

As a further illustration of the activity of this diplomatic representative, attention is called to the fact that on the day the above letter was written, apparently unable longer to restrain his ardor, he issued a proclamation whereby "in the name of the United States" he assumed the protection of the Hawaiian Islands and declared that said action was "taken pending and subject to negotiations at Washington." Of course this assumption of a protectorate was promptly disavowed by our Government, but the American flag remained over the Government building at Honolulu and the forces remained on guard until April, and after Mr. Blount's arrival on the scene, when both were removed.

A brief statement of the occurrences that led to the subversion of the constitutional Government of Hawaii in the interests of annexation to the United States will exhibit the true complexion of that transaction.

On Saturday, January 14, 1893, the Queen of Hawaii, who had been contemplating the proclamation of a new constitution, had, in deference to the wishes and remonstrances of her cabinet, renounced the project, for the present at least. Taking this relinquished purpose as a basis of action, citizens of Honolulu, numbering from fifty to one hundred, mostly resident aliens, met in a private office and selected a so-called committee of safety, composed of 13 persons, 7 of whom were foreign subjects, and consisted of 5 Americans, 1 Englishman, and 1 German. This committee, though its designs were not revealed, had in view nothing less than annexation to the United States, and between Saturday, the 14th, and the following Monday, the 16th of January—though exactly what action was taken may not be clearly disclosed—they were certainly in communication with the United States minister. On Monday morning the Queen and her cabinet made public proclamation, with a notice which was specially served upon the representatives of all foreign governments, that any changes in the constitution would be sought only in the methods provided by that instrument.

Nevertheless, at the call and under the auspices of the committee of safety, a mass meeting of citizens was held on that day to protest against the Queen's alleged illegal and unlawful proceedings and purposes. Even at this meeting the committee of safety continued to disguise their real purpose and contented themselves with procuring the passage of a resolution denouncing the Queen and empowering the committee to devise ways and means "to secure the permanent maintenance of law and order and the protection of life, liberty, and property in Hawaii." This meeting adjourned between 3 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon. On the same day, and immediately after such adjournment, the committee, unwilling to take further steps without the cooperation of the United States minister, addressed him a note, representing that the public safety was menaced and that lives and property were in danger, and concluded as follows:

"We are unable to protect ourselves without aid, and therefore pray for the protection of the United States forces." Whatever may be thought of the other contents of this note, the absolute truth of this latter statement is incontestable. When the note was written and delivered the committee, so far as it appears, had neither a man nor a gun at their command, and after its delivery they became so panic stricken at their position that they sent some of their number to interview the minister and request him not to land the United States forces till the next morning. But he replied that the troops had been ordered, and whether the committee were ready or not, the landing should take place. And so it happened that on the 16th day of January, 1893, between 4 and 5 o'clock in the afternoon, a detachment of marines from the U. S. S. Boston, with two pieces of artillery, landed at Honolulu.

The men, upward of 100 in all, were supplied with double cartridge belts filled with ammunition, and with haversacks and canteens, and were accompanied by a hospital corps with stretchers and medical supplies. This military demonstration upon the soil of Honolulu was of itself an act of war, unless made either with the consent of the Government of Hawaii or for the bona fide purpose of protecting the imperiled lives and property of citizens of the United States. But there is no pretense of any such consent on the part of the Government of the Queen, which at that time was undisputed and was both the de facto and the de jure government. In point of fact the existing government, instead of requesting the presence of an armed force, protested against it.

There is as little basis for the pretense that such forces were landed for the security of American life and property. If so, they would have been stationed in the vicinity of such property and so as to protect it, instead of at a distance so as to command the Hawaiian Government building and palace. Admiral Skerrett, the officer in command of our naval force on the Pacific station, has frankly stated that in his opinion the location of the troops was inadvisable if they were landed for the protection of American citizens whose residences and places of business, as well as the legation and consulate, were in a distant part of the city, but the location selected was a wise one if the forces were landed for the purpose of supporting the provisional government. If any peril to life and property calling for any such martial array had existed, Great Britain and other foreign powers interested would not have been behind the United States in activity to protect their citizens. But they made no sign in that direction.

When these armed men were landed, the city of Honolulu was in its customary orderly and peaceful condition. There was no symptom of riot or disturbance in any quarter. Men, women, and children were about the streets as usual, and nothing varied the ordinary routine or disturbed the ordinary tranquillity, except the landing of the Boston's marines and their march through the town to the quarters assigned them. Indeed, the fact that after having called for the landing of the United States forces on the plea of danger to life and property the committee of safety themselves requested the minister to postpone action, exposed the untruthfulness of their representations of present peril to life and property. The peril they saw was an anticipation growing out of guilty intentions on their part and something which, though not then existing, they knew would certainly follow their attempt to overthrow the Government of the Queen without the aid of the United States forces.

Thus it appears that Hawaii was taken possession of by the United States forces without the consent or wish of the government of the islands, or of anybody else, so far as shown, except the United States minister.

Therefore the military occupation of Honolulu by the United States on the day mentioned was wholly without justification, either as an occupation by consent or as an occupation necessitated by dangers threatening American life and property. It must be accounted for in some other way and on some other ground, and its real motive and purpose are neither obscure nor far to seek.

Mr. CAFFERY. For a masterly grouping of facts, and for a wise and just conclusion from them, this message from which the Secretary has read is a paper of extraordinary merit. The President of the United States could certainly have no animus in this matter. He was acting for the great Republic of which he was the Chief Executive. It could not have entered into his mind to "set down aught in malice" or to extenuate any fact in any particular. He confined himself to the facts as conclusively shown by the examination into them by Commissioner Blount. Those facts have never been successfully rebutted; there has been nothing but general denial, and all along the line of this revolution, from its very inception until its culmination upon the 17th day of January, 1893, we can trace the hand of the minister of the United States acting in conjunction with the conspirators in Honolulu.

The minister seems to have forgotten that he was accredited to a nation as sovereign as that of the United States. He seems to have forgotten that between that nation and the United States existed the most intimate terms of friendship. He seems to have forgotten that the United States had taken special care to safeguard the independence of the island and to protect it against the encroachment of foreign powers. It did not enter into his mind that any encroachment on the part of the United States was to be visited with any kind of resentment or that the complicity of the United States in the aid rendered by it to the revolutionary forces was anything but a commendable act.

Mr. President, the evidence upon which these allegations and charges in the message of the President of the United States are founded is absolutely incontrovertible. Mr. Minister Stevens absented himself from Honolulu for a period prior to the 14th day of January, 1893. He had gone some two or three weeks before to visit a sanitarium in the Island of Hilo for the benefit of the health of some member of his family. He had conversed during that trip about the affairs of the island with the captain of the boat, Captain Wiltse, of the Boston.

When he returned on the 14th, he discovered a commotion in the Island of Oahu, where Honolulu is situated, growing out of the attempt of the Queen, or the threatened attempt of the Queen, to proclaim a new constitution, whereupon he was placed immediately in communication with the revolutionists. He had constant colloquies and constant communication with the leaders in this movement, of whom the chief was Mr. Lorin A. Thurston, who has ever since that period been the active agent of the Hawaiian Government to procure annexation to the United States. From the 14th of January down to the farce of the proclamation of the Republic of Hawaii, in front of Arion Hall, in the city of Honolulu, Mr. Stevens was in constant touch with the revolutionists and nobody else.

Now, sir, all these specifications and charges of the President of the United States in the message read are met by no specific denial, are supported by no specific fact in such way as to induce a rational belief that the President of the United States might have been deceived in his statement of fact. This case depends for its solution, so far as the complicity of the United States in the revolution of 1893 is concerned, upon a fair statement of the facts and a proper deduction from the facts. On the 14th there was a private meeting called to consider the matter of the attempted proclamation by the Queen of a new constitution. That committee appointed a committee of safety. They met frequently, mostly in the private office of a Mr. Smith, from the 14th to the culmination of the revolution.

It was asserted by the witnesses who appeared before Mr. Blount that prominent agents of the revolutionary band had constant communication with Minister Stevens and that they were assured not only of his sympathy, but that he would land troops and would recognize a government the very moment the paper government was announced in a public manner. Knowing as Mr. Stevens did that the presence of the troops would intimidate and overawe the native Hawaiians, would overawe the little guard the Queen had under the command of her marshal, a Mr. Wilson, all that was necessary for the revolutionists to obtain was the promise of the landing of United States marines for the specious pretext of preserving American life.

Mr. President, let us look at that proposition. It has been the uniform practice of the United States, as of all civilized governments, in case of riot or commotion or disturbance in any foreign country, for the United States minister to call upon the United States military arm, if accessible, to protect American life and property against what? Against riot and commotion caused by other than themselves. The only American life that could be threatened in this revolution was the life of the revolutionist; and when the American minister landed his troops to protect American life and preserve order, it was the death knell of the monarchy, and he knew it. He knew there was no use of doing anything more than to land those troops under the specific request of himself and the specific orders given to the marines by the captain commanding. I believe his name was Captain Wiltse. All they desired, all they wanted, was the landing of the troops to protect American life.

Mr. President, we have been buncoed time and time again; but can the American people be deceived by this shallow pretext of landing troops to protect American life, when American life could only be endangered by engaging in an effort to overthrow the very Government to which he was accredited as minister? He knew of the revolution; he says so; he says the air was full of revolution; he says every man, woman, and child in Honolulu knew there was a revolution; that there was no use for the revolutionists to tell him so. He knew it was a common rumor that the Queen was going to be overthrown, overthrown by Americans, and the very Americans engaged in the overthrow were those he was to protect; and yet, under the shallow pretext of preserving order and protecting innocent American life and property, he ordered the landing of the troops, in order to intimidate and overawe the Hawaiians so that the revolutionists could put in their work and effect the overthrow of the Kingdom.

There never has been, and I hope there never will be again so long as this Republic endures, such an act of unparalleled audacity and duplicity. American war ships land at a friendly port, and whenever the American residents of the country choose to overthrow the government, they can call upon the military arm to assist them to overthrow the government; and yet we say it is to protect American life and property. American life can be endangered, American life can be imperiled, in an enterprise that Americans undertake on their own account and for their own behalf; but when they undertake to overthrow a government with which we are at peace, they must rely upon the vigor of their arms and the courage of their own breasts, and not bring in aid the powerful military resources of the United States; and that is just what was done in this particular. That is precisely what was done, Mr. President.

Then, sir, after they had accomplished their purpose, showing their utter weakness, they wrote a note to Minister Stevens that they were weak and powerless and wanted the flag of the United States to be raised, and he raised it, and in order to clinch the revolution, in order to keep up the intimidation of these weak islanders, the flag of the United States floated over those islands for three or four months, until hauled down, ordered to be hauled down, properly ordered to be hauled down by Mr. Blount.

Sir, partisan rancor never went further than in the attacks upon Mr. Cleveland and the attacks upon Mr. Blount for attempting to undo a wrong of a character that makes me blush to acknowledge that an American committed it. It was simply because Cleveland was the President of the United States, elected by the Democratic party, that this rancorous political attack was made upon his nonpartisan, his statesmanlike, his courageous, his bold, his commendable act in attempting to undo the wrong perpetrated upon that island by Minister Stevens and a band of revolutionists associated with him.

Mr. President, this question ought to be looked at from a nonpartisan standpoint. The subject ought to be handled by us as American statesmen and not as American politicians belonging to this, that, or the other party. I am sorry to see that it is largely a political question like the admission of Texas was made a political question. I do hope to live to see the day when questions of this character, great, broad, comprehensive, out of the pale of politics, will not be voted on and decided by men's predilections for one party or the other, but will be voted on and decided according to their intrinsic worth and their real merit.

I have always esteemed this act of Minister Stevens in lending the aid of the United States marines to the band of revolutionists which overthrew the Kingdom of Hawaii as a foul blot and a disgrace to the American Republic. That is my deliberate opinion, from reading over this testimony. It was a blow delivered by a powerful nation against a weak, powerless nation. It was a blow delivered almost to a child of the Republic. Whatever that Kingdom was, whatever those people were, it was their kingdom, it was their government; they had a right to it. The white men who went there either had to remove if they did not like it, or by their own arms and their own strength have overturned it and established a white man's government.

I believe in the supremacy of the white race over all other races. I believe that in time they will dominate every race upon the globe. The dusky nations of the earth are bound by a decree of Providence, written upon their faces, to be subordinate to the dominating, aggressive Aryans; but, sir, do not let that dominance be accompanied with irresistible power invoked in an illegitimate way and used for an illegitimate purpose.

If these islands had by a natural revolution or a forced revolution thrown off their allegiance to this dusky Queen, and had come with proper credentials and asked admission into the United States, it would then be time to consider the policy of admitting her, the legality of admitting her; but right here at the threshold we are met with a consideration that must appeal to the sense of justice and honor and equity of the American people. If it be true that these islands were taken from their legitimate governor and the government established by the revolutionary force was so established by and through the aid and participation of the United States, I invoke equity and honor itself to say that the United States is estopped to take title of any such territory. It comes with a taint upon it. The foul blot upon it will not out. It will not be obscured by the passage of a joint resolution or any other measure by Congress admitting these islands.

Mr. President, there were some participants in the revolution who testified before Mr. Commissioner Blount; and while I am on that point I will say that the record itself, in every line and syllable of it, establishes not only the purity and integrity but the capability and efficiency of Mr. Commissioner Blount. He is an honest man. He was upon an errand of great delicacy. He acquitted the task with equal ability and with equal integrity, and the work of his hands is before us in a report which for absence of any egotism or self-praise or self-consciousness upon the part of its author is one of the best that I have seen.

With painstaking industry, in an unobtrusive way, in that quiet, gentlemanly spirit which marks the true Southern gentleman, he approached his task and he completed it. There is no charge upon him of partiality. When he first went to the islands he was waited upon by the sugar oligarchy with coaches and the trappings of luxury and wealth. Like a simple, honest gentleman, he declined the invitation to be the recipient of their hospitality and took his lodgings at the common hotel where everybody went. Quietly he went about the streets of Honolulu, and all those he thought knew anything about the question he approached. He took their testimony, and it was put in this record, and that testimony is absolutely condemnatory of the manner in which the Republic of Hawaii was made. It condemns it in every particular. I wish to read the testimony of some of these gentlemen, but before I do so I will go on with a little further narration of the facts attending this case.

After the United States troops were landed and placed in a position to command the palace, they remained there from the 17th of January until some time late in April, all the time for the counterfeit purpose of protecting American life and property, threatened by a lot of Kanakas, who were intimidated and overawed by the bristling guns that commanded Arion Hall and the approaches to the Queen's palace. Then, Mr. President, after landing the troops, a few men, one man with a gun at the start, by indirect roads, to escape observation, got into Arion Hall. Some gentleman—I think his name was Cooper—read a proclamation of government. There were perhaps twenty-five or thirty people present when he commenced to read. They gathered in one by one, two and three, and four and five, until it is said about three hundred assembled. They made a paper government. They were not in command of the military forces or the barracks at the period of their recognition.

The minister of the United States had sent an aide-de-camp to advise him of the proceedings of these gentlemen in this delicate task of making a government. He came back and reported that the government was made. Good Lord, Mr. President, was government ever made so easy? There is but one other governor, either in history or in fiction, who ever was elevated so high with so little effort, and that was Sancho Panza when he was made governor of the Island of Barataria. In less than a half hour after that proclamation was read at Arion Hall to this motley crew Minister Stevens acknowledged that the people of Hawaii had overthrown the prevailing Government of Hawaii.

Hawaii is composed of seven islands, the principal one of which is that upon which Honolulu is situated. They are separated from each other by 10, 15, or 25 miles of water. It was not possible for him to know whether this revolutionary movement had any hold in the people or not. International law requires that before you acknowledge a de facto government it must be established by the consent of the people with force enough to maintain itself against all comers. That is a de facto government. What sort of a thing was that which Minister Stevens recognized?

A paper formation, so weak that in less than ten hours afterwards its very originators wrote that they were too weak to support themselves and demanded a protectorate at the hands of the United States. That is the kind of government they made in Hawaii. That is the kind of government Minister Stevens recognized—a government not based upon the consent of the governed, for they dare not now in the Senate accept the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Georgia, asking a vote of the people of Hawaii upon the question of annexation; and without the government being founded upon the apparent assent of the people, sustained by the people, with military and civil jurisdiction sufficient to constitute a government, can you say that a government exists? And yet Minister Stevens recognized this paper declaration as a government.

Sir, that transcends the ingenuity of the ancient carpetbagger. He could make a government very easily, but this government was made easier than any government I ever heard of. No man, living or dead, ever heard of a government being made quite so easily, I imagine. Here is a government starting on the 14th of January, completely consolidated and formed on the 17th day of January, and in three days afterwards the formers of this government take ship and come to the United States with a treaty of annexation in their pockets, the flag of the United States flying over the Island of Hawaii under the protectorate of the United States. That is the independent government proclaimed by Mr. Cooper or some gentleman of similar name on the 17th of January, 1893, and the title from which we are now asked to consider in the session of the Islands of Hawaii.

Mr. President, there are a great many facts surrounding this matter. I propose to look into some of them. A gentleman by the name of Damon, a member of the committee on public safety, one of the men who waited upon the Queen, who advised her to surrender to superior force, is the gentleman whose testimony I propose to have partly read. I will state in this connection that Mr. Damon and somebody else went to the Queen on the 17th of January, 1893, and advised that, in view of the landing of troops and the display of military force, it would be better for her to resign and abdicate and transfer her claim to the United States for adjudication, knowing that that had been done theretofore by one of the kings of the Kamehameha dynasty, when he offered to transfer the sovereignty of the island to the United States.

When he advised this act, he thought as a matter of course that full justice would be done in the premises between the United States and the Hawaiian Kingdom. Although he was one of the original members of the committee on public safety, he appears to be quite an impartial man, and his character is attested, I believe, to be good even by his political enemies in Hawaii. This gentleman was the vice-president of the provisional government. I will ask the Secretary to read down to and including the larger portion of page 41, where it is marked, from page 30 of Executive Document No. 47, Fifty-third Congress, first session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

INTERVIEW BETWEEN MR. DAMON AND MR. BLOUNT.

HONOLULU, April 29, 1893.

MR. BLOUNT. How long have you lived here?

MR. DAMON. I was born here in 1845. I have been away several times—perhaps to the extent of three or four years in that time.

Q. Where were you on the 14th of January, 1893, at the time the proclamation dethroning the Queen and establishing the provisional government was read?

A. I was at Honolulu. I was one of the members of that body who went up.

Q. The paper was read by Mr. Cooper?

A. By Judge Cooper.

Q. How many of you were there in that body which went up—about?

A. The whole body. There would be four of the executive and fourteen of the advisory.

Q. Please look at this paper and see if they are the persons (Senate Ex. Doc. No. 70, Fifty-second Congress, second session).

A. Thurston was not present, and I do not think Wilhelm was there.

Q. Where did you start from?

A. From W. O. Smith's office on Fort street.

Q. And what street did you take going from there?

A. We walked up directly to the Government house on Merchant street. It was suggested that a part should go by the way of Queen street, but a majority of us went by way of Merchant street.

Q. What was the idea of dividing the committee?

A. So that it should not attract so much attention, and it would be safer perhaps to have it divided than going in mass.

Q. Was it because it occurred to them that it might invite attack if they went in mass?

A. That was partly the idea—that it was more prudent. I think we, most of us, walked together—not compactly, but together.

Q. Any crowd following you?

A. No; the crowd was attracted to the corner of Fort and King streets, owing to the shot that was fired by Mr. Good at a policeman. In fact, the crowd cleared from the Government house and was attracted there. From all directions they centered at the corner of Hall's store.

Q. You found, then, scarcely anyone at the Government house when the committee arrived?

A. Scarcely anyone there except porters. After Mr. Cooper began to read the proclamation—then different ones came out of the offices—clerks and officials—while the proclamation was being read.

Q. Some of the provisional government troops, or rather troops raised at the direction of the committee of safety, came on the ground before the reading of the proclamation was finished?

A. When we arrived there was but one man with a rifle on the premises, Mr. Oscar White; but some little time later they commenced to come in from the armory, troops that were under the supervision of Colonel Soper.

Q. Was that before or during the reading of the proclamation?

A. During the reading. Toward the end of it.

Q. How many troops came in? Do you have any knowledge of the number you had enlisted?

A. There were enough came in to make us feel more decidedly at ease than before they arrived.

Q. You could not say how many there were?

A. No; they kept coming in right along. They got to be quite a body.

Q. After the reading of the proclamation the late ministers were sent for?

A. After the reading of the proclamation we adjourned to the office of the minister of the interior, and then we commenced to formulate our plans and get ourselves into working order. Mr. Dole was at the head. While we were there in consultation Mr. Cornwell and Mr. Parker came up there from the station house and held a conference with us.

Q. What was the purport of that conference?

A. The result of that conference was that Mr. Bolte and myself were requested to return with Mr. Cornwell and Mr. Parker to the station house and recommend and urge upon the parties in power at the police station to surrender to the provisional government. We had a conference with the ministers in the room occupied generally by the deputy marshal. There were present Messrs. Peterson, Colburn, Parker, Cornwell, Bolte, and later Mr. Neumann, who was asked to come in. After consultation of the matter of their yielding up their power to the provisional government they asked to be let alone for a few moments, and I went into one of the rear cells in the corridor with Marshal Wilson and urged him very strongly to give up any hope or any thought of making any attack, or resistance, more properly.

Q. What reason did you give him?

A. I can not remember at the present moment giving him a reason, but I remember distinctly saying to him: "Now, if you will cooperate with us, if in future I can be of service to you, I will do so."

Q. Was there any suggestion of sympathy on the part of the United States minister in your movement?

A. While I was in the station house a man by the name of Bowler said to me: "We are all prepared, but I will never fight against the American flag."

Q. Was there anything in the conversation between you and him in which any intimation, direct or indirect, that the United States minister was in sympathy with you or the United States troops and officers?

A. I can not remember any definite thing, but from Mr. Bowler's remark they must have thought that the United States troops were here for some purpose.

Q. Was Mr. Bowler with the Queen's party?

A. He was. He was part of the force in the Station House.

Q. Did you say anything at all indicating an opinion that there was any sympathy on the part of Mr. Stevens or Captain Wiltse with the movement for the new government?

A. I can not remember. I may possibly have said so.

Q. Did you think so at that time?

A. I may have had an impression, but I know nothing about it.

Q. What was your impression?

A. My impression was, seeing the troops landed here in this time of excitement and turmoil, that—well, I suppose I might say that they could not stand it any longer—the Americans could not stand it any longer.

Q. Your impression, then, was that the American minister and Captain Wiltse and the troops were in sympathy with the movement of the white residents here in the pending controversy between them and the Queen?

A. While we were in the Government building and during the reading of the proclamation, and while we were all extremely nervous as to our personal safety, I asked one of the men with me there, "Will not the American troops support us?" Finally I asked one of the men to go over and ask Lieutenant Swinburne if he was not going to send some one over to protect us? The man returned and said to me, "Captain Wiltse's orders are, 'I remain passive.'" That is all I know of what passed between us.

Q. You speak of your impression. That relates to a particular conversation between two or three persons; but what was your impression as to the matter of whether or not the American minister and the American naval officers were in sympathy with the movement?

A. I was perfectly nonplussed by not receiving any support. I could not imagine why we were there without being supported by American troops, prior to the troops coming from the armory. We were not supported in any way.

Q. You had not been in council with the Committee of Public Safety up to that time?

A. No.

Q. Well, the troops were—how far off from the reading of the proclamation?

A. They were over in that yard known as Gilson yard, in the rear of the music hall. They were quartered there.

Q. Any artillery?

A. I think they had a small gun—gatling gun and howitzer.

Q. Where were they pointed—in what direction?

A. I can not tell you.

Q. You were surprised that they did not come into the grounds while the proclamation was being read. Is that what you mean by not supporting you?

A. I had no definite information what the movement was, as I told you before in a private interview, but knowing that they were on shore, I supposed that they would support us, and when they did not support us and we were there for fifteen or twenty minutes, I was perfectly astonished that we were in that position without any support.

Q. How far would you say, in yards, it was from where the proclamation was being read to where the nearest troops were?

A. I think about 75 yards.

Q. Was there a piece of artillery in the street between the building the troops were stationed in and the Government building?

A. The only piece of firearms of any kind in that street was Oscar White's rifle. We met him as we came around the corner.

Q. Did you have occasion to look there to see?

A. We stopped before turning into the side gate to converse with Oscar White, before proceeding into the Government building.

Q. Are you sure there was not a piece of artillery in that street before the reading of the proclamation?

A. I can not tell you; but the only gun I could see was Oscar White's. I remarked: "Oscar, this is not so very prudent for you to be here with only one rifle in this street."

Q. Where did you see the troops first?

A. I came up from Monolalua by a back street and turned into Nuunana street, one house above Mr. Stevens's, and as I turned the corner I saw the American troops marching up toward Mr. Stevens's house, and directly in front of his house.

Q. Did you meet Mr. Henry Waterhouse?

A. I met him there at that time.

Q. What conversation passed between you?

A. I think I said, "Henry, what does all this mean?" If I remember rightly now, he said, "It is all up."

Q. And what did you understand by the expression "It is all up"?

A. I understand from that that the American troops had taken possession of the island. That was my impression.

Q. And was that favorable to the Queen or favorable to the other side, as you understood it?

A. That was distinctly favorable to the foreign element here.

Q. You mean the movement for a provisional government?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you see Mr. Stevens that day?

A. No; I did not see him that day.

Q. What is Mr. Waterhouse doing now?

A. Henry? He is a member of the council.

Q. Was he a member of the committee of public safety?

A. If I remember right, he was.

Q. Is that his signature [exhibiting letter of committee of public safety to Mr. Stevens]?

The letter is as follows:

HAWAIIAN ISLANDS, Honolulu, January 16, 1898.

SIR: We, the undersigned, citizens and residents of Honolulu, respectfully represent that in view of recent public events in this Kingdom, culminating in the revolutionary acts of Queen Liliuokalani on Saturday last, the public safety is menaced, and lives and property are in peril, and we appeal to you and to the United States forces at your command for assistance.

The Queen, with the aid of armed force and accompanied by threats of violence and bloodshed from those with whom she was acting, attempted to proclaim a new constitution, and while prevented for the time from accomplishing her object, declared publicly that she would only defer her action.

This conduct and action was upon an occasion and under circumstances which have created general alarm and terror.

We are unable to protect ourselves without aid, and therefore pray for the protection of the United States forces.

J. A. MCCANDLESS,
Citizens' Committee of Safety.

His Excellency, JOHN L. STEVENS,
American Minister Resident.

A. Yes, it is.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, this record is so full of these statements from reliable witnesses that I shall not take the time of the Senate to read all of them. There are certain portions of them that I think very material, and material for the presentation of this case. I shall trespass upon the time and patience of the Senate in having some more of them read or reading them myself.

I will comment upon this testimony to the effect that here is a witness who was present upon the occasion of the proclamation of the existing Government, who testifies that there was no armed force there of a character to overthrow a government of any kind. Mr. Damon saw but one man who had a gun, whereupon he asked that man whether it was not a little dangerous for him to come there with only one gun. This gentleman was vice-president of the provisional government before the time that he delivered his testimony.

There is the testimony of a gentleman by the name of Bolte, who was one of the committee of safety, and who addressed a letter to Minister Stevens to protect them and the people of the island, as they were unable to protect themselves. Here is a confession right here in this demand for the landing of the troops that completely disproves the charge or statement iterated and reiterated by Mr. Stevens, by Mr. Thurston, and by all the revolutionists, to the effect that they were perfectly able to overthrow the Government themselves without the aid of the American marines. They say they are not even able to protect themselves in the winding up of this statement:

We are unable to protect ourselves without aid, and therefore pray for the protection of the United States forces.

The gentlemen who proposed to take that island, to dethrone the Queen, and establish another government; who said that they were perfectly able to do so, in their written request to Minister Stevens confess that they were unable to do so, and therefore negative any statement that they have made to the contrary.

Mr. President, I propose to show the peculiar farcical side of this revolution, or it has a farcical side, a kind of fustian revolution; it was an opera-bouffe revolution. The only substance behind it was the United States marines. This gentleman by the name of Bolte gives a very succinct account of how they accomplished the results there. The statement is very long and I shall have to read a great deal of it. After stating that the business men down town came together and talked matters over on Saturday evening, January 14, he was asked this question:

Q. At what place?

A. W. O. Smith's office. They came to the conclusion that if the Queen can alter the constitution to suit herself she might as well alter any other law to suit herself. Anyway, through altering the constitution alone she would get perfect control of the affairs of the country, because in this constitution it says—as Minister Colburn told us at this meeting—that she intended to appoint the nobles, which is one-half of the legislative body. We decided to let things go on for a while to see how it would end up. At 4 o'clock we had another meeting, which was largely attended.

Q. At the same place?

A. At the same place. It was then stated by Minister Colburn and Minister Peterson that she had not proclaimed a new constitution; had told the people to go home, abide their time, be of good cheer, and she would give them a new constitution anyhow. At the first meeting Paul Neumann was present and said the Queen was going to proclaim a new constitution. At this last meeting it was decided that the people who were there could not be satisfied with the Queen just withdrawing from this as if nothing had happened, and they came to the conclusion that the people must have guarantees for the future, and appointed a committee of thirteen people, of which I was a member, to devise ways and means by which such guarantees could be gotten.

The committee of safety appears to have been constituted, according to this witness, simply to devise ways and means by which a guaranty could be secured from the Queen that she would not proclaim a constitution, and the committee of safety was not therefore organized for the purposes of revolution. Indeed, it will appear from the speeches and resolutions at the public meeting, the mass meeting, in Honolulu, which took place, I think, on the 16th of January, that they did not contemplate, so far as the resolution showed, any revolutionary movement, but simply called a meeting to denounce the illegal and unconstitutional acts of the Queen.

If there was ever any motive or intention to destroy the Queen's government, it was not made apparent by the resolutions adopted at the mass meeting on the 16th of January. I will continue to read the testimony:

This committee met several times at various places and decided that the only perfect safeguard against future occurrences of this kind would lie in annexation to the United States, or in a protectorate, or in anything of that kind, but that we could not go on with the form of government as it was then. They decided to call a mass meeting of citizens on Monday afternoon at 2 o'clock, and see what people there would say about it. At this meeting were various speakers, some of the committee of thirteen and also others. The people were asked by the speakers if they were satisfied with the promises the Queen had made and let the matter drop—let everything go on as it was before—or if they wanted a change and guarantees for the future. They desired guarantees for the future and appointed the committee of thirteen—or rather continued the committee—to take such further steps as might be necessary.

I will say right here that in the resolutions adopted at this mass meeting, held on Monday, the 16th of January, 1893, there was nothing whatever, either in the resolutions or in the speeches, that they desired guarantees for the future. All that the resolutions contained was a denunciation of the Queen. They did not require any other guarantees that she would not proclaim a constitution in the near future.

Q. Let me ask you what you meant and what people meant by saying they wanted guarantees?

A. I meant a change of government. What the people meant I can not say, but I am fully convinced that they meant the same, as it has been very often spoken of during the last few years.

Q. What has been spoken of so often?

A. Annexation to the United States has been advocated publicly in the papers—I meant change of government.

It is pretty hard to tell what this witness does mean. He gets annexation mixed up with guarantees for the future and the changes of Government, but the whole prevailing bent of his mind was that he wanted annexation, and he thought everybody else did.

Q. Why didn't you use language that conveyed distinctly the idea—dethronement of the Queen and annexation to the United States?

A. The Hawaiian Government, as it was then, was still in existence, and in stating there publicly we wanted to dethrone the Queen and have a government of our own, with an intention of being annexed to the United States, might be going a little too far.

Q. You mean making you liable to interference on the part of the local authorities?

A. Yes.

Q. And that you were trying to avoid at that time?

A. Yes; especially for this reason: We did not know whether the action of the committee would be indorsed by this large majority of the people at the mass meeting. We thought it would.

Q. Was there any expression in that meeting asking for guarantees for the future in a shape of a vote?

A. Yes; the resolution was all prepared.

Q. It was a resolution indorsing the report of the committee of safety?

A. Yes; the meeting dispersed and the committee of safety went back to W. O. Smith's office to talk matters over.

The real purpose of the mass meeting is contained in this answer of the witness. When he was asked why he did not incorporate the demand for guarantees or a change of government in the resolutions, he said:

A. The Hawaiian Government, as it was then, was still in existence, and in stating there publicly we wanted to dethrone the Queen and have a government of our own with an intention of being annexed to the United States, might be going a little too far.

Q. You mean making you liable to interference on the part of the local authorities?

A. Yes.

Here is this vaunted revolution, that was said to be so strong as to be able to withstand the assault of the Hawaiian army, such as it was, to overthrow it, to destroy it, and to wipe the monarchy and the Queen out of existence, and yet it did not have the hardihood, did not have the courage, to declare what its purposes were at the mass meeting. The whole purpose of this thing was to get the United States troops to overthrow the government, to start with. Their ulterior purpose was annexation, and it had been so from the start.

They wanted annexation at that period particularly, because they were under the operation of the McKinley law. The McKinley law let in raw sugar from Hawaii free. Under the reign of Kalakaua, from 1874 to the accession of Queen Liliuokalani, the Hawaiian Government had the protection of over 2 cents a pound upon raw sugar imposed by the act of 1883. That was a great bonanza to the Hawaiians. Under the act of 1890 their sugar of course came in free; but all other raw sugars came in free, and they therefore did not enjoy the protection that they had enjoyed prior to that period. "Hence these tears"—sugar in it, Mr. President, sugar and annexation in it.

All these conspirators were sugar men; and in the face of the fact that this scheme of annexation had its origin in the sugar interest, that it is pushed now by the sugar interests, that the sugar trust of Hawaii is not opposed, if it is not favored, by the great American sugar trust, certain journals of the United States, some of them in this city, are attempting to inflame public prejudice against the opponents of this resolution by constantly charging and constantly iterating and reiterating the charge that the opposition to this resolution springs from the American Sugar Refining Company.

In the course of my remarks, Mr. President, I shall attempt to show hereafter that the interest of the American Sugar Refining Company is better subserved by having Hawaii annexed than by having Hawaii as it is. I intend to show, if I can, that the American Sugar Refining Company depresses the price of sugar here at home, made in my own State, and the sugar trust of the United States has no interest to oppose, but has some to favor, the scheme of annexation.

The interests of the sugar trust are better subserved by Hawaii being a part of the United States than they would be by Hawaii being independent and free. These papers that cry "Wolf!" "Wolf!" are trying to hide their own tracks. But I will go on with the reading of this testimony:

Q. And that you were trying to avoid at that time?

A. Yes, especially for this reason. We did not know whether the action of the committee would be indorsed by this large majority of the people at the mass meeting. We thought it would.

Local interference had a great deal to do with it, you can see. This witness could see that, but nobody else could.

Q. Was there any expression in that meeting asking for guarantees for the future in a shape of a vote?

A. Yes; the resolution was all prepared.

Q. It was a resolution indorsing the report of the committee of safety?

A. Yes. The meeting dispersed, and the committee of safety went back to W. O. Smith's office to talk matters over.

Q. What time in the day was that?

A. About half past 3. After talking matters over and seeing that the Queen had concentrated her forces—meaning the soldiers who were all in the barracks—the police barricaded with sand bags and the station house barricaded—

Q. How about the Government house?

A. I didn't notice anything going on there. The station house has always been considered the stronghold of the Government. It looked as if there might be trouble. So we came to the conclusion to ask Mr. Stevens if he would protect the life and property of the citizens by sending some soldiers ashore, stating that we considered the situation very grave—even dangerous. After a short while Mr. Stevens sent his answer that he would.

This witness was a member of the committee on public safety, a very great revolutionist, and he lets the cat out of the bag here. He never thought to send for troops, or that they were necessary, rather, until he saw these fortifications upon the part of the Queen to resist their attempt at revolution.

Mr. President, all through this testimony, in every line of it, it crops out that sending for troops was not to protect American life and property, but that it was to destroy the power of the Queen to resist. When they saw the preparations to resist them—sand bags, barricades, Government buildings, and barracks—they sent for American troops.

Mr. FAULKNER. May I interrupt the Senator to ask him a question?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. FAULKNER. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana to give us the information, if he has it, how many native Hawaiians were in that conference which established the Republic of Hawaii by indorsing the report of the committee of safety?

Mr. CAFFERY. Not a single one.

Mr. FAULKNER. Then it was American or European citizens calling upon the United States forces to help them against the native population to establish a different form of government?

Mr. CAFFERY. Precisely.

Mr. FAULKNER. And to overthrow the established form of government?

Mr. CAFFERY. That is just what it was, sir. The original committee was composed of thirteen members. Their names are attached to the document contained in the testimony of Mr. Damon, which the Secretary has just read.

Mr. FAULKNER. My question would cover more than simply the members of that committee. I refer to the assembly of people who declared in favor of the report of this committee of safety. Was there a native Hawaiian in that meeting so far as the evidence shows; and, if so, to what extent were the native Hawaiians represented there?

Mr. CAFFERY. There was no Hawaiian so far as the record discloses present at the mass meeting on Monday, the 16th of January, 1893, but in the same town, about the same hour, and about a half mile distant, was a large mass meeting of the native Hawaiians indorsing the Queen's action.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Let me ask the Senator if at this public meeting of conspirators anything whatever was said about changing the Government or about revolution?

Mr. CAFFERY. Nothing whatever. I was commenting on that before the Senator came in; and I further commented upon the fact that they did not even insist in the resolution adopted at that mass meeting, or in what was said, that they would demand a guaranty of the Queen that she would not go back upon her promise not to proclaim a government.

Q. How about the Government house?

A. I didn't notice anything going on there. The station house has always been considered the stronghold of the Government. It looked as if there might be trouble. So we came to the conclusion to ask Mr. Stevens if he would protect the life and property of the citizens by sending some soldiers ashore, stating that we considered the situation very grave—even dangerous. After a short while Mr. Stevens sent his answer that he would.

Q. Sent it to the meeting?

A. Yes; sent it to the meeting, and then at 5 o'clock the soldiers came ashore. They were quartered at various places. That same evening, Monday, January 16, the committee of safety had another meeting.

Q. Where?

A. At Mr. Henry Waterhouse's house—

He was another member of this revolutionary junta—

They called in, besides the committee of safety, a few other gentlemen.

Q. Who were they?

A. Mr. Young, Fred Wundenburg, Cecil Brown, and John H. Soper. We talked matters over to see what would be best to do, and came to the conclusion we would form a provisional government—

These gentlemen were taking things very easy; it was no trouble at all to form a government—and ask Mr. Dole if he would be the president, and that this provisional government should try to get annexation with the United States, because, so far as we could make out at that time, that was the only solid basis on which we could safely rely. Mr. Dole was not at the meeting. I had my horse with me. I was detailed to speak to Mr. Dole. I arrived at his house about half past 8, I think.

I told him what decision we had come to, and asked him if he would accept such an office. He was utterly surprised at it. He had had nothing to do with the affair before, only had been at second meeting at W. O. Smith's. He said he could not then quite see that the view we had was quite correct, but still he had not given the matter much consideration. After a lengthy discussion I induced him to go along to the meeting, so that he could hear what they had to say. After everything at the meeting had been thoroughly explained to him and discussed with him he said that he felt it was his duty, as well as the duty of any other citizen of these islands, to do all they could to get pure and stable government, but he was not quite convinced then that it was necessary to take so radical a step as to overthrow the old Government. Later on, at about 12 o'clock that night, he had come to the conclusion we could not go on the way we were, but whether he would become president or not he would not say until 10 o'clock the next morning.

The next morning at 10 o'clock we met at W. O. Smith's office, and he said he had resigned his position as judge and would do what he was requested to do by us. We then proceeded to form the government. It took us up to about 12 o'clock.

Nobody knew anything about it. This occurred in a private office of a lawyer.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will ask the Senator how many participated in the election of these distinguished officers from president down?

Mr. CAFFERY. I can not answer that. There were some 30 or 40 people in the office of W. O. Smith.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Only 13.

Mr. CAFFERY. Very well. The office was only a little back office. I suppose these gentlemen all participated, because they were pretty nearly all officers of the government.

Mr. PETTIGREW. They appointed each other.

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes.

At the Government house there was nobody, no armed men, supporters of the Queen, except Charles McCarthy, who was doing some clerical work for the lately adjourned legislature. He said he was waiting for somebody to come to help him defend the Government house.

Q. To you?

A. No.

Q. You don't know that he said it?

A. Only from friends who told me.

Q. Who did he tell?

A. I think Andrew Brown.

Q. What does he do?

A. He is a coppersmith. He worked in the Honolulu Iron Works. Lately became superintendent of the waterworks. At 2 o'clock when we arrived at the Government house there came our supporters—brought their rifles and pistols with them.

Q. Do you mean at the same time, or do you mean that they got there a little before or a little after you?

A. There was preconcerted action. We told them we would go to the Government house at 2 o'clock.

That is a very rapid piece of business. They met at 10 o'clock at W. O. Smith's office; in two hours they had perfected a government. They adjourned until half past 1 o'clock, and at 2 o'clock they go to the public building; and there is nobody there. Then they waited a while. The solitary rifleman spoken of by Mr. Damon must have bristled on the scene some short time after this. He constituted the revolutionary army at the critical period of bringing the new government into being.

Q. Had you commenced to read the proclamation before your troops got on the ground?

A. I do not recollect distinctly. They were there before we finished reading the proclamation. The chief clerks at the different departments were called in to confer with the newly appointed ministers among them Mr. Hassenger and Mr. Hastings. They were told to go right on with their work. Letters were written at once to the representatives of foreign countries, informing them that the provisional government was now the Government of the Hawaiian Islands. After a short time they answered, recognizing this Government.

Q. That same day?

A. Mostly the same day. When we arrived at the Government house the ministers were not there. Mr. Hassenger, chief clerk of the interior department, said he believed they had gone over to the palace. He telephoned for them, but he got no answer; or they answered they were not there. Later on in the afternoon—I should think about 4 o'clock—Deputy Marshal Mherston came to the Government house to ask some question of Mr. Dole. I forget now what the question was. He then said, incidentally, that the ministers were at the station house, and he was handed a copy of the proclamation to give it to the old ministers. They had not been officially informed of anything, because we could not find them. Also a verbal invitation was sent to them to come over to the Government house to talk. Sam Parker came over to the Government house. He said in effect this: "You have possession now. We can not do anything." He was asked to get his colleagues. He said they did not like to come, but would some of us come to the station house and talk there?

Q. Had you then been recognized by the United States minister?

A. No. We had not been recognized by anybody at that time. Sam Damon and I were appointed, and we went there to talk with them.

Q. To try to induce them to give up?

A. Yes.

Q. What reason did you give them?

A. That we had possession of the Government house now, and that it would be useless shedding of blood if we got into a fight over this thing.

Q. Did you give any other reason?

A. No; only just stuck to facts.

Q. Any mention of United States troops on your part or the part of anybody during that conversation?

A. No; I did not say anything about it.

Q. Did anybody?

A. I can not say whether Sam Damon said anything.

Q. Did they say anything to anybody in your presence?

A. No.

Q. How did they answer you? Did you have no discussion?

A. Not there. We invited them to come to the Government house and talk with Mr. Dole.

Q. Did they make any agreement with you, or did they postpone it and go to the Government house?

A. Peterson said if we would guarantee him his liberty—

Q. Safe conduct?

A. Yes. We promised him that and all went together to the Government house.

Q. What time of day was this?

A. About 5 o'clock.

Q. What time is it dark at that season of the year?

A. Between 6 and 6.30. At the station house was Ned Macfarlane. He said to me that he thought the old Government would give up or the Queen would give up if we would accept a protest of her. He said, "I know such a protest does not amount to anything, but still she wants it and so you had better accept it." I told him that so far as I was concerned in the matter they could put all the protests they wanted.

Q. Was this conversation at the barracks or Government house?

A. At the station house. The four ministers, Sam Damon, and I took two hacks and went to the Government house. All said about the same thing, that they would have to give up, but they wanted to enter a protest. Then Sam Damon went with the ministers to the Queen. He reported after he came back that the Queen had said in substance the same thing.

Mr. President, I will skip a part of the testimony at this point, resuming at page 256:

Q. Of course you made some estimate of your arms. How many men do you think you had and how many guns do you think you had?

A. I can say what I thought myself. My own opinion was that we could have three or four hundred easily.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will ask the Senator, if he will permit me, whether the evidence states how many of these three or four hundred troops were Hawaiians and how many were foreign citizens?

Mr. CAFFERY. Those troops, as I understand—called troops; I think they were of the imagination; I do not think they ever existed—were said to have been gathered up from some old organizations that had existed at the period of the revolution of 1887, when there was an attempt made on the part of the supporters of Queen Emma, I believe, to oust Kalakaua.

The so-called troops, which they could have, but which they had not, were none of them Hawaiians. The Hawaiians took no part in this episode.

Q. You appointed a committee to wait on Mr. Stevens and ask that troops be brought on shore?

A. Yes.

Q. Who carried that communication to Mr. Stevens?
 A. I am not sure. I think Thurston and Waterhouse. I am not sure. It may have been somebody entirely different.
 Q. Did you see Mr. Stevens that day?
 A. No.
 Q. Who reported Mr. Stevens's reply about troops?
 A. The same committee.
 Q. What did they say?
 A. They said that Mr. Stevens had heard their request and conversed with them about matters, and he considered that the situation was sufficiently dangerous to send troops ashore.
 Q. Was he informed of the purposes of the mass meeting?
 A. He did know about it. Everybody in town knew.
 Q. And knew of the purposes of the movement?
 A. I can not say.
 Q. You say everybody in town knew?
 A. That we desired annexation had not been said by us at the mass meeting. We said we wanted stable government. The committee was to devise ways and means to get stable government.
 Q. Was it known that one of the methods of getting it was to get rid of the Queen? Was that the impression of the meeting?
 A. Yes.
 Q. That meeting was composed of a large class of whites, and it is a fair inference that the white people here knew what it meant?
 A. Yes; I think so.
 Q. The meeting that called for troops—they determined then and there to dethrone the Queen—the meeting after the mass meeting?
 A. After the mass meeting we said "We have to decide what to do about this, and the first thing we have to do is to get things into safety."

After the mass meeting they got things safe. Undertaking a revolution to get things safe!—

and it was only in the evening on Monday, the 16th of January, at Henry Waterhouse's house, that we definitely made up our minds which course to pursue.

They definitely made up their minds to pursue a safe course. His idea was to get the thing safe, and they did not make up their minds until Monday afternoon, at Henry Waterhouse's house, when the troops had been ordered ashore, that things were quite safe enough to suit.

Q. What course?
 A. The course we have pursued—dethroning the Queen and forming the provisional government.
 Q. Your committee that met after the mass meeting were all in favor individually of dethroning the Queen?
 A. Yes, individually.
 Q. Why did not you determine to do it then instead of postponing it until night?
 A. Because we wanted to go home to get our dinner and come back after dinner.

Mr. President, was ever a contented and well-fed set of revolutionists like this seen before? Not ordinarily are men fond of meals revolutionists. Caesar did not like the lean and hungry Cassius. Such men, he said, thought too much. The thin and hungry fellows sometimes have an idea of risking their lives; but these gentlemen who would not miss a meal, who would go to their dinner first, got things perfectly safe. They put their revolution on a safe basis, and then they went to their dinner. Shades of the Revolutionary fathers! Think of it. If they had known how easy it was to have acquired American independence by making things perfectly safe at the start, how much scant fare would they have missed! How many good, square meals would they have eaten!

But they had something more to do, these revolutionary sires of ours, than to make things safe. They made things very dangerous to start with, and they declared their purpose in their Declaration of Independence. They did not hide their purpose, as these Hawaiian revolutionists did, for fear of local interference from a band of Hawaiians, whom they said they utterly despised, and whom they could sweep out of their path without the slightest trouble.

Q. Then the night meeting was a continuation of the discussion which began after the mass meeting, and concluded with the determination to dethrone the Queen and establish the provisional government?
 A. The night meeting was an adjourned meeting of the 3 o'clock meeting.
 Q. What did you do at the 3 o'clock meeting?
 A. We said we are a committee of safety. We must get things safe first. We will appoint a committee to wait upon Mr. Stevens and ask him to send soldiers ashore.

That was about as safe a performance as they could have undertaken. Immediately it occurred to them that the only way to make things safe for them was to get the United States unarmies ashore to do their fighting for them if any fighting was to be done. And they got the marines. Things were safe.

Q. And having done that, you adjourned?
 A. We waited until the committee came back. The committee said Mr. Stevens was willing—the soldiers would come ashore at 5 o'clock. Then we adjourned to meet in the evening.
 Q. Was there any communication between any of the gentlemen who met at Mr. Waterhouse's house that night and Mr. Stevens?
 A. None to my knowledge.
 Q. No committee went to see him?
 A. No.
 Q. Why did you want the troops to come on shore? What was the idea of the committee?
 A. The idea of the committee was this: The natives were armed—at least the soldiers and friends of the Queen were all armed—that evening. We didn't have any armed forces in readiness. Each individual had his own arms, but we had no organized forces; so in case of a row we would not be able to resist anything.

Q. Suppose they had made an attack on the committee of safety, what would you have done?
 A. We could not have done anything. They would simply have caught us. We had our men out watching. We were afraid of an attack.
 Q. By the Government troops?
 A. No, by the natives, because there were some among the natives who had been preaching for them to set houses on fire.
 Q. You wanted troops to keep them from setting houses on fire?
 A. Yes; as soon as the natives in this country know that there is a strong force anywhere which they can not subdue or will show real fight it is then their character to be very quiet and keep still.
 Q. If the troops had not been landed you would not have been safe?
 A. We would not have considered ourselves safe.
 Q. If you had not gotten a favorable answer from Mr. Stevens about the landing of the troops, what would you have done then?
 A. That is impossible to answer, because we had not made any plans.
 Q. You were not willing to do anything until you got the answer?
 A. That is a question I can not give an answer to. We did not decide about it.
 Q. You said you met to do one thing—to ask for troops and to stay there until you got Mr. Stevens's answer, and then you adjourned. Is that correct?
 A. Yes.
 Q. Having gotten that answer and the troops on shore, you assembled at night, and at that night session you determined to dethrone the Queen and establish the provisional government?
 A. Yes.
 Q. You never took up that subject until you got the troops on shore?
 A. At previous meetings. Saturday afternoon we were appointed. Sunday we had a meeting. At this meeting we talked over matters. The general feeling was that annexation to the United States would be the best solution of the whole question, and this, of course, would necessitate the overthrow of the Queen's government.
 Q. That was known at Saturday's meeting and at Sunday's meeting?
 A. Yes.
 Q. Did you have any meeting before the mass meeting on Monday?
 A. We had another meeting on Monday morning.

Mr. President, there is a great deal of this testimony in the same line and pretty much to the same effect. I will not read it all. But this testimony from a member of the committee of safety establishes beyond doubt the character and kind of revolution that overthrew the government of Queen Liliuokalani. Here is this witness deliberately testifying that if they had commenced their revolutionary attack, an overt act, before the landing of the troops from the Boston, they would have been caught, "because," he says, "there was no armed force on our side to resist."

It is manifest that he tries to cover to some extent the fatal statements he makes. An afterthought occurred to him to set up that the troops might be sent there to put out fires, and he testified that it was the habit of those people, when they could not meet openly a foe, to resort to arson; but he forgot that he had testified that the foe, as contemptible as it was, was armed and sufficient in numbers and equipment to capture the whole revolutionary band; and therefore it was this afterthought about fires, which had been made an excuse for the landing of the troops, was absolutely without weight. This witness acknowledges that they had no troops; he says there were two or three hundred. I am told by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] that they had only 60, but they had no organization of any kind.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will state that the Senator will find that 60 is the largest number Mr. Damon, who is now the minister of finance of this revolutionary Government, claims ever appeared there.

Mr. CAFFERY. That is true. I remember that in Mr. Damon's testimony, but it is not material. The material point is that they had no organization of such a character as to resist the armed forces of the Queen—be it 60 or 300 men does not make any difference—and that they had to proceed upon a safe basis, and that safe basis was the procuring of the presence of United States troops.

Mr. President, the whole revolution is disclosed in the testimony of this man. There is no contradicting it, because the surrounding circumstances and other witnesses bear him out. It is true that the revolutionists say that without the presence of the United States troops the revolution would have succeeded; but prophecy does not outweigh facts. What Mr. Thurston's opinion is in that regard is a matter of no moment at all. The whole question before the Senate, in my mind, as bearing upon the pending joint resolution is whether or not the United States had such part in the revolution as to taint the title of the Hawaiian Islands with fraud and with illegality, with unlawful, unjust conduct. If the United States had connived through its superior functionaries at this unlawful and cowardly use of its troops, it would have been such a blot that all the islands in the Pacific, with all the water surrounding them, would never have washed it out.

There is some other testimony in this regard which comes from the memorandum kept by the revolutionary junta that assembled in the office of W. O. Smith, bearing pertinently upon the question of the complicity of the United States troops in this matter, the aid of the United States troops, and the result of the landing of the United States troops, and I will read some of it. I will read from the same record, page 495. It is a statement of Mr. W. O. Smith of events prior to January 17, 1893. It is written in a kind of colloquial style, representing statements made by and among Messrs. Smith, Cooper, and Castle, all active participants in the revolution, Mr. Cooper being the gentleman who, from the steps or the portico of Arion Hall, read the proclamation proclaiming the Government.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Colburn overtook Mr. Thurston and myself returning to my office and told us the situation, how the Queen, in great anger, had stated to the people who were assembled that she had been unable to carry out her wishes and the desire of many; that it was her wish to promulgate a new constitution, but that she had been prevented, but she would shortly do it; and that we heard from various sources of the violent speeches of William White, representative from Lahaina, and others, threatening bloodshed and generally of a most violent character, and we returned and reported this to the meeting. My offices were crowded with people, so that it was with difficulty that we could get into the room at all, and Mr. Colburn worked his way in. Mr. Peterson appeared about that time or a little later, and Mr. Colburn made this statement briefly. What occurred was about as has been published, and it was generally known. There were a few short speeches made by different persons present. I made some remarks, and one or two others, finally Mr. Thurston spoke very briefly, and then on Mr. Thurston's motion those present organized themselves into a meeting. Mr. H. E. Cooper was chosen chairman and W. O. Smith secretary.

I will ask the Secretary to continue the reading of the extract. The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. COOPER. Then the motion was to appoint a committee of nine, the first motion was, and then it was afterwards made thirteen, and then by a vote of the meeting it was made a member of the committee.

Mr. SMITH. It was voted that a committee of thirteen be appointed to form plans for action and call meetings, report any time, at their discretion, and be called a committee of safety. At that time there was some serious apprehension, we could not tell what that disorder might follow; what steps might be taken next; whether the constitution might not be promulgated that very afternoon or the next morning, or at any time; there was simply an intense feeling of uncertainty and a feeling that danger to the community was very imminent. She had practically promised it in a few days. The remarks and action were very short—right to the point; intense feeling and determination was manifested, and meanwhile from those present the following committee of thirteen was appointed: L. A. Thurston, W. R. Castle, C. Bolte, W. C. Wilder, W. O. Smith, J. A. McCandless, H. F. Glade, A. S. Wilcox, T. F. Lansing, H. Waterhouse, Andrew Brown, F. W. McChesney, and, by special vote, H. E. Cooper. Mr. Glade was not present, but was communicated with—asked if he would be willing to serve.

Mr. COOPER. After the committee was formed the other gentlemen were requested to retire. Then a message was sent for Mr. Glade and Mr. Wilder and they came.

Mr. SMITH. And they signified their willingness to serve on the committee. After further delay, almost immediately the others present were requested to retire and the committee held a meeting. The situation was briefly discussed—the imminence of danger and the safety of the city; what action should be taken for protection was the main subject of discussion. And in view of the fact that at the station house there was a large armed force and at the barracks, and that nearly all of the arms were in possession of the supporters of the Queen, and there was no organization at the time outside of those forces, and it was simply unknown how many arms were available, the question was at once discussed whether a protectorate should not be sought from the United States steamship of war Boston; that question was, of course, first raised, whether the United States would render assistance, or what their attitude would be, and then a special committee consisting of L. A. Thurston, W. C. Wilder, and H. F. Glade were appointed to wait upon Mr. J. L. Stevens, United States minister, and inform him of the situation and ascertain from him what, if any, protection or assistance could be afforded by the United States forces for the protection of life and property, the unanimous sentiment and feeling being that life and property were in imminent danger. By that time it was so dark that I lighted the electric light. We had to have light before we concluded our meeting and deliberations.

Mr. COOPER. My first acquaintance with the affair was when I met Hartwell on the street. I met him coming out of his office.

When this question came up as to whether or not what assistance the United States troops might give, I made the following statement to the committee: That I had gone, at Mr. Hartwell's request, to see the captain of the Boston, Captain Wiltse, about half past 11, and I informed him of the situation, and he immediately sent for Commander Swinburne, who, in turn, sent for the officer of the deck, and all necessary preliminary preparations were made, and that was Captain Wiltse's first news of it. He didn't know anything about it before I came there. And Captain Wiltse said that he was there for the purpose of protecting life and property of American citizens, and if called upon he would do it. I afterwards came ashore and met Mr. Smith and Mr. Neumann and retired to Mr. Smith's office.

Mr. SMITH. During this meeting of the committee of thirteen and the discussion of the situation, it was made manifest to us, from what had transpired during the day and the action of the Queen, that she was in a condition of revolution; that is, her act was entirely revolutionary; that there was a feeling of perfect uncertainty of what would take place or how great the danger was, but we were simply convinced that established government was at an end, that we were in a state of revolution, and with the forces in her command, and the utter disregard for the constitution and laws, that we as citizens had simply got to look to ourselves for safety and protection, that the intelligent part of the community had got to take matters in their own hands and establish law and order. The probabilities of what the Queen would do were discussed; there was no certainty in regard to that, excepting that she would undoubtedly persist in her revolutionary intentions; what would be done, how soon martial law might be declared or any other course would be taken, what steps would be taken, we simply could not tell, and after discussion Mr. Thurston made the following motion: "That steps be taken at once to form and declare a provisional government."

The seriousness of the step was considered, but it was deemed, decided unanimously by the committee, that some such steps had got to be taken for protection of life and property, and it was then and after Mr. Cooper's statement in regard to his visit to the Boston that the committee consisting of Thurston, Wilder, and Glade were appointed to meet the American minister, and were instructed to report the next morning at 9 o'clock, at a meeting to be called at the residence of W. R. Castle.

I went home about dark or a little after, and just had dinner when Mr. Thurston called at my house on his way home, asking me to meet the committee and one or two others at his house at 8 o'clock. I went there and found Mr. Thurston, W. R. Castle, F. W. Wundenburg, A. S. Hartwell, S. B. Dole, and C. L. Carter. Mr. Thurston stated that the committee had waited upon the American minister, and that he had said that the United States troops on board the Boston would be ready to land any moment to prevent the destruction of American life and property, and in regard to the matter of establishing a provisional government they of course would recognize the existing government, whatever it might be.

Mr. Thurston stated to Mr. Stevens the proposition that was under consideration of establishing a provisional government, and in case those steps were taken, he asked Mr. Stevens what his attitude would be, and Mr. Stevens had told him whatever government was established and was actually in possession of the Government building, the executive departments and archives, and in possession of the city, that was a de facto government proclaiming itself as a government, would necessarily have to be recognized. Everything had culminated in a few hours, we were laboring under intense feeling, and it was arranged that different ones of those present should begin drafting papers. Mr. W. R. Castle undertook to draft something in the nature of a brief historical statement, which would be for a preamble to the declaration. Mr. Thurston was to work upon the matter of the form of the provisional government. Judge Dole quietly stated that he was not prepared to take part in the movement, but that he would assist, at Mr. Thurston's request, in drafting the declaration. I was requested to draft papers to be submitted to the American minister requesting the landing of the troops in case it became necessary. At a late hour we retired, and the next morning at 9 o'clock the committee of thirteen met at W. R. Castle's residence.

The meeting continued until noon. The committee appointed to wait on the American minister made a report to the committee similar to the report made to us the night before. Among the various propositions and matters discussed was a matter of calling a public mass meeting, and it was decided to call a meeting at 2 o'clock in the afternoon of the next day, Monday, to be held, if possible, at the old rifle armory on Beretania street, near the corner of Punchbowl street. Mr. Andrew Brown was appointed a committee to procure the armory, make the arrangements for the meeting, and to see to the publication of the notice, which notice was prepared there during the meeting, and a committee of three, consisting of L. A. Thurston, W. R. Castle, and W. O. Smith, were appointed to arrange a programme for the public meeting and secure the speakers. During this meeting Mr. A. S. Wilcox stated that as he had deemed it important for him to return to Kaula that he thought it was his duty to resign from the committee.

While he was in perfect sympathy with the movement, he felt that in the excitement which might be created it was very important for those who had their homes on the other islands to return and endeavor to maintain peace and quietness in the other islands. His resignation was accepted, and Mr. J. Emmelhuth was elected to take his place. Mr. Glade stated that owing to his position as German consul he deemed under his instructions that it would be improper for him to continue a member of the committee and tendered his resignation, which was accepted, and Mr. Ed. Suhr was appointed to fill his place. At this meeting Mr. L. A. Thurston was appointed to draw the resolution to be presented at the mass meeting and the report of the committee.

Mr. COOPER. That was just after Glade and Wilcox had resigned. Just when we were going to break up it was suggested as to whether we should not go on and perfect the organization of the provisional government and the form that it should take. Mr. Castle presented his historical preamble, which was not read, but Mr. Thurston had stated the general plan that he had in mind as to the form the provisional government should take, stating that it should consist of an executive council and an advisory council. The mention of names was suggested by the meeting, that Mr. Thurston should be the leader and the head of the government. Mr. Thurston questioned the wisdom of that on two grounds: First, he had business arrangements which might call him away, and on the further ground that he was considered such a radical mover that he believed it was wise to have some one who was more conservative. That was dropped right there. Mr. Dole's name was not mentioned at that meeting.

Mr. SMITH. At that meeting and the previous and subsequent meetings most meager minutes were kept, because of the possible danger of our being arrested and of these records being used against us. The night before Mr. Thurston requested Mr. Wundenburg to ascertain, as far as he could, what arms were available and how many men with arms could be depended upon. Just at the close of the meeting on Sunday, about noon, at W. R. Castle's, Mr. Wundenburg came with Mr. Soper, and they reported that the prospect of obtaining arms was very discouraging, but that after making a thorough search of the town only about sixty stand of arms were found that were not in possession of the Government.

After we adjourned Mr. Thurston and I called upon the American minister again and informed him of what was being done. Among other things we talked over with him what had better be done in case of our being arrested or extreme or violent measures being taken by the monarchy in regard to us. We did not know what steps would be taken, and there was a feeling of great unrest and sense of danger in the community. Mr. Stevens gave assurances of his earnest purpose to afford all the protection that was in his power to protect life and property; he emphasized the fact that while he would call for the United States troops to protect life and property, he could not recognize any government until actually established. He repeated that the troops when landed would not take sides with either party, but would protect American life and property. Thurston and I began to arrange in regard to the speakers, who to see. Thurston said that he would see quite a number; among them was Mr. Swansy, T. R. Walker, Cecil Brown, and some others. I rode down town and found James F. Morgan and asked him to be one of the speakers. He consented to be. And I saw two or three others and then went to the printing office and hastened up the matter of the publishing of the posters.

At the meeting at Mr. Castle's there was considerable discussion in regard to when to have the mass meeting; some were in favor of having it on Sunday; a feeling, too, had been expressed at the meeting on Saturday afternoon that there should be a mass meeting called right off on Sunday, and at the meeting some thought better to have the meeting early Monday morning, there being such a feeling of absolute uncertainty in regard to what course the Queen would pursue, whether she would proclaim the constitution and disorder and riot precipitated. It was finally concluded, however, that the meeting should be held at 2 o'clock and that all business houses be requested to close.

Sunday evening several of us met again at Mr. Thurston's. Mr. Thurston did not return from his interview with Cecil Brown and others until about 8 o'clock in the evening. Meanwhile a message had been left at my house by Colburn that the ministers would like to meet a committee of five from the committee of thirteen. We were also informed that the ministers had had a meeting some time during the day of Sunday, in which several of the citizens were present—Mr. F. A. Schaefer, Mr. S. M. Damon, and Mr. J. O. Carter, and one or two others. At this meeting in the evening the work was further arranged, the different parts of it assigned, and at a late hour we returned home.

The next morning, Monday, January 16, the meeting was held of the whole committee of thirteen at the office of L. A. Thurston over Bishop's Bank, corner of Merchant and Kaahumanu streets. Mr. Thurston was ill, suffering much at times. The meeting lasted nearly all the forenoon, subject to a number of interruptions, one interruption being that of the marshal, C. B. Wilson, who called Thurston out into Mr. W. F. Allen's office and protested against the holding of a mass meeting in the afternoon. This meeting at Mr. Thurston's office during the forenoon was held under great difficulties, there being many interruptions, and different ones having to withdraw at various times for various matters pertaining to the business in hand. The condition of Mr. Thurston's health caused us a good deal of anxiety. He had been suffering before that with a severe cold upon his lungs, and from loss of sleep and mental strain he was weak and was attacked with dysentery.

At that meeting it was decided that he should be one of the speakers at the public meeting. He had objected to it, not desiring to take so prominent a part, fearing that it might produce unnecessary antagonism; more than that, his physical condition was such that he hardly felt able. It was deemed very important that he should speak, and the order of business at the meeting was decided upon. Mr. W. C. Wilder reluctantly consented to act as chairman, and the matter of a request of the ministers that a committee of five be sent to wait upon them was considered, and a committee was appointed consisting of C. Bolte, J. A. McCandless, W. C. Wilder, F. W. McChesney, and H. Waterhouse to meet the ministers. They retired, and during their absence other general matters were discussed. Information was being received in regard to public matters generally.

Mr. CASTLE. Was Wilson's action there simply a protest? It went out that he had warned them not to have it.

Mr. SMITH. Thurston reported it as a protest against this meeting being held. Thurston asked him why, and he said that it would provoke disorder. At this meeting we were informed of the fact that another mass meeting had been called for the same hour, 2 o'clock in the afternoon, to be held at Palace Square, the junction of Richard and King streets, signed by the committee on law and order, and that many of those posters had been placed over our posters, and that there was evidently an attempt to prevent our meeting or create confusion and to mislead. Mr. Thurston had, on his own authority, before the meeting, prepared a poster, and it was in the process of being printed, exposing the fraud, and he had a copy of it then and submitted it to the meeting, but it was of a nature which we considered inflammatory, and on the whole we decided not to have it posted.

The committee of five returned and reported that they had met the four ministers, and the ministers stated to them that they had no communication to make, and wanted to know what the committee wanted. They talked over the situation and showed our committee a proclamation signed by the Queen and the ministers stating that she would never again attempt to force a new constitution. Before the meeting broke up the form of the request to the American minister in regard to the landing of the troops was adopted and signed by the committee of thirteen, requesting the American minister to land troops, and this request was signed by the committee of thirteen, and decided to be delivered to the minister to be held by him, but not to be acted upon until a further request was received from the committee.

After the adjournment of the meeting fifteen or sixteen different copies of the request were typewritten and attached with five or six blank pages to each copy, and these were distributed among several members of the committee before proceeding to the meeting, and the request of Mr. Stevens was delivered to him before the meeting was held. By 1 o'clock business began to be closed. Before 2 o'clock a large number of people had assembled at the armory, and by 2 o'clock a very large number was there. After Mr. Thurston had finished speaking at the mass meeting, and while others were speaking, the members of the committee discussed very earnestly what to do in regard to this petition.

If it was to be circulated for signatures, some notice to that effect would have to be given before the meeting dispersed; and we were in very great doubt, some being very earnestly of the opinion that they should be signed as universally as possible, the opinion being that they would be signed by nearly all of the 1,200 present, but it did not seem opportune and we waited. The meeting was finally adjourned, as it seemed to some of us sooner than we expected, and nothing was done about the signing of the petition and the committee felt somewhat at a loss what to do, but word was passed around among us at once to meet at my office again, and within twenty minutes after the adjournment of the meeting the committee met.

Mr. SMITH. There was a short and earnest discussion of what was to be done; it was then nearly 4; our plans had not been perfected, papers had not been completed, and after a hasty discussion, the time being very short, it was decided that it was impossible for us to take the necessary steps, and we should request that the troops be not landed until next morning, the hour in the morning being immaterial, whether it was 9 or 8 or 6 o'clock in the morning, but we must have further time to prevent bloodshed, and Mr. Thurston and I were appointed to proceed at once to the American minister and inform him of our decision. We proceeded at once to Mr. Stevens's house, the United States legation, stated the case to him, and he said that as a precautionary measure, and to protect American life and property, he had ordered the troops to be landed at 5 o'clock, and that they would come. It was then decided to adjourn to meet at the house of Henry Waterhouse at 8 o'clock in the evening. The meeting broke up, and some of us went down to see the troops landed. Thurston gave up—sick. He had to go to bed.

At 8 o'clock in the evening we met at Mr. Henry Waterhouse's. All of the members of the committee were present except Thurston, Castle, and Wilder, they all being ill. Mr. James B. Castle was present, taking the place of W. R. Castle, and C. L. Carter taking the place of Thurston. There were also present by invitation Alexander Young, J. H. Soper, Cecil Brown, H. P. Baldwin, and F. W. Wundenburg.

Previous to this meeting, beginning with the meeting on Saturday afternoon, the suggestion of sending the Claudine to San Francisco with dispatches to the United States Government was discussed, and at this meeting Monday evening it was moved that she be sent at once to San Francisco. The motion was amended that action be deferred until after the establishment of the provisional government. Amendment carried.

A committee of two, consisting of C. Bolte and C. L. Carter, was appointed to make a list to form an executive council of five members and an advisory council of eight members. Before this it had been suggested that Judge Dole be chosen to act as the head of the Government. After some discussion Mr. Bolte was appointed a committee to wait upon Judge Dole and to invite his attendance at the meeting, and after an absence of some length Mr. Bolte returned with Judge Dole. And Judge Dole was not willing to consent at that time, stating that he did not favor fully the idea of annexation at this time, and asked if it would not be better to have a regent here and Kaimiani declared the Queen. But after discussion he consented to take the matter under further consideration and let us know his decision the next day at 12 o'clock, the committee endeavoring to persuade him. He recognized that the logical events and manifest destiny of the island was annexation, but he did not know whether it was the wisest step now. There is no doubt that the Queen has vacated the throne.

He said that if he did decide to join us he would first resign as judge of the supreme court. P. C. Jones, S. M. Damon, Cecil Brown, J. A. King, and W. O. Smith were suggested to serve on the executive council, which was contemplated as five. Mr. Cecil Brown refused. Mr. Soper was requested to take the place of commander of the military forces, and he accepted conditionally. A finance committee of three was appointed, consisting of McCandless, McChesney, and J. B. Castle, to collect the lists of arms and ammunition and buy or otherwise procure the same.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Louisiana has been speaking most impressively for a long time, and I ask him if he is willing to yield that I may call up the general deficiency appropriation bill and have the Senate consider that measure for the rest of the day.

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1035) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

The message also announced that the House had passed with amendments the bill (S. 4571) to extend Rhode Island avenue; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 5887) for the prevention of smoke in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 10474) for the extension of Eleventh street NW.; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 136) for the relief of farmers, gardeners, and truckmen selling produce of their own raising on the south side of B street, between Seventh and Thirteenth streets, in the city of Washington, D. C.

EXTENSION OF RHODE ISLAND AVENUE.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4571) to extend Rhode Island avenue.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4571) to extend Rhode Island avenue.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I move that the Senate nonconcur in the amendments of the House of Representatives and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. HANSBROUGH, Mr. McMILLAN, and Mr. MARTIN were appointed.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. Without displacing the unfinished business, I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10691) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the amendments of the committee be considered as they are reached.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and that course will be pursued.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Department of State," on page 2, after line 1, to strike out:

That the title "Eleven clerks of class 4," Department of State, provided for in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1895, is hereby amended to read: "One chief of bureau of appointments, $2,100; ten clerks of class 4."

Mr. PETTUS. I wish to understand about amendments before the amendments are adopted—that is, I want to know whether amendments will be in order hereafter, although they might conflict with those already adopted.

Mr. HALE. After the committee amendments have been disposed of amendments presented by any Senator will be considered. No Senator is cut off by this arrangement.

Mr. PETTUS. That has heretofore been the understanding with reference to such bills, and I wanted to have it understood in this case.

Mr. HALE. That is the invariable practice on appropriation bills.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That will be the order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 23, in the item for the Nicaragua Canal Commission, after the date "1899," to insert:

Said commission is authorized to rent, upon approval by the Secretary of State, office rooms in Washington, D. C., for such time as is necessary for the completion of its work, and to pay to the two members of the Geological Survey assigned to the commission for duty such amount, not to exceed $500 in each case, in addition to their regular salary, as in the opinion of the Secretary of State is a just compensation for their expert services.

So as to make the clause read:

Nicaragua Canal Commission: To continue the surveys and examinations authorized by the act approved March 2, 1895, entitled "An act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890, and for other purposes," into the proper route, the feasibility, and cost of construction of the Nicaragua Canal, with the view of making complete plans for the entire work of construction of such canal as therein provided, $50,000; to continue available during the fiscal year 1899 Said commission is authorized to rent, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 6, to insert:

International Conference on a Catalogue of Scientific Literature: For expenses of delegates to the International Conference on a Catalogue of Scientific Literature to be held at London during the present year, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 11, to strike out the following:

Canadian Commission: For the expense on the part of the United States of a joint commission to be appointed for the adjustment of differences between the United States and Great Britain in respect to the Dominion of Canada, including the compensation of the commissioners representing the United States, the pay of expert service for preparation of papers, for the portion of joint expenses chargeable to the United States, for printing and all other incidental expenses, to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of State, $50,000, to remain available during the fiscal year 1890.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, after line 23, to insert:

Foreign intercourse: To enable the Secretary of State to pay Ramon O. Williams, late consul-general at Havana, the amounts necessarily expended by him for clerk hire in excess of his allowances between July 1, 1892, and June 5, 1896, $2,222.08.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 4, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of State to pay Joseph A. Springer, vice-consul-general at Havana, the amounts necessarily expended by him for clerk hire in excess of his allowances between October, 1892, and June 30, 1895, $300.54.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 10, to insert:

Contingent expenses, foreign missions: To pay amounts found due by the accounting officers of the Treasury on account of the appropriation for "Contingent expenses, foreign missions," fiscal year 1897, $10,701.68.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 16, to insert:

Contingent expenses, United States consulates: To pay amounts found due by the accounting officers of the Treasury on account of the appropriation for "Contingent expenses, United States consulates," fiscal year 1897, $5,938.84.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 22, to insert:

Salaries, marshals for consular courts: To pay amounts found due by the accounting officers of the Treasury on account of the appropriation for "Salaries, marshals for consular courts," fiscal year 1897, $300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Treasury Department," on page 6, after line 3, to strike out:

To make the salary of the Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue $3,500 per annum from the date of the passage of this act to June 30, 1890, $350, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, after line 23, to insert:

To pay amounts found due by the accounting officers of the Treasury on account of the appropriation "Contingent expenses, Treasury Department: Freight, telegrams, etc.," for the fiscal year 1897, $1,717.13.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 3, to insert:

To pay amounts found due by the accounting officers of the Treasury on account of the appropriation "Contingent expenses, Treasury Department: Freight, telegrams, etc.," $1,322.60.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 10, after the word "dollars," to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That no recording clocks used for recording time of clerks or other employees shall be purchased for use in any of the Executive Departments at Washington, D. C., except from moneys specifically appropriated therefor.

Mr. GORMAN. I trust the amendment of the committee will not be agreed to. I call the attention of the Senator from Maine to this proviso.

Mr. HALE. If there is to be any question—

Mr. GORMAN. I trust the Senator from Maine in charge of the bill will not insist on striking out this provision as it comes from the House.

Mr. HALE. If there is to be any controversy about it, let it be passed over.

Mr. GORMAN. I trust we shall dispose of it now, if we can. It seems to me the case is so clear that there ought not to be any hesitation about agreeing that the provision as it comes from the House shall remain in the bill.

Mr. HALE. Very well; I have no objection to that course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the committee will be disagreed to, unless there is objection. The Chair hears none, and the amendment is rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 14, to insert:

For the maintenance of the automatic fire-alarm system now in the Treasury and Winder buildings during the fiscal year 1899, $2,035.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 10, to increase the appropriation for pay of assistant custodians and janitors for the fiscal year 1896 from $20.40 to $42.65.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask the Senator from Maine to consent to return to page 6 to an amendment which was passed without my noticing it. It is the proposition to strike out the appropriation for the salary of the Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which is provided for in the bill at $3,500. The Committee on Finance this morning by unanimous vote adopted a recommendation that this salary should remain at $3,500. The increased duties of this officer under the new revenue law which has recently been passed has led the Secretary of the Treasury to recommend that there shall be no reduction in his salary at this time, when the duties are very much greater than they have been at other times; and I think the Senate ought to agree to let that provision stand.

Mr. HALE. I think this question had better go into conference. There are several cases of increases of salary in the bill, and there can be no discrimination made in those cases. The committee have adopted one rule, and that is to strike them all out. There are some cases where amendments will be offered which are pertinent and proper covering increases of salaries; but it is better, I think, that all of them should go into conference. If the Senate restores the provision I shall certainly make a similar motion in all the other cases, because they are all meritorious cases. This year the Committee on Appropriations thought it was better not to increase salaries.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. But this is a proposition to decrease a salary, as I understand.

Mr. HALE. I have never heard of any case of decreasing a salary.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That was my impression about this provision.

Mr. ALLISON. The statutory salary for this officer is $3,200, and the amount appropriated for the current year is $2,250, and that has been the sum appropriated for some years past.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. This simply restores the statutory salary to what it has been all along.

Mr. HALE. But it is an increase over what this officer is getting now.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I shall leave it with the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I think we had better put this into conference, and consider all these cases together.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Very well.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 10, after line 5, to insert:

Refund of fine, British steamship Costa Rican: To refund to the collector of customs at New Orleans, La., for repayment by him to the person or persons entitled to receive the same the sum of $114.91, being that portion of a fine of $130.91 imposed in the case of the British steamer Costa Rican for violation of section 2800 of the Revised Statutes, since remitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, the original sum having been covered into the Treasury prior to the said remission.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 7, to insert:

To pay amounts found due by the accounting officers of the Treasury on account of the appropriation "Quarantine service," for the fiscal year 1897, $80.43.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 19, to insert:

Revenue-Cutter Service: To pay amounts found due by the accounting officers of the Treasury on account of the appropriation "Expenses of Revenue-Cutter Service," for the fiscal year 1896, $27.78.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, after line 11, to insert:

Credit in accounts of certain officers, Corps of Engineers: Authority is hereby granted to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to allow and credit in the accounts of certain officers of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army amounts standing against them on the books of the Treasury as follows: Capt. Edward Burr, $135.33; Maj. D. W. Lockwood, $250; Maj. Thomas H. Handbury, $735.68; Capt. H. F. Hodges, $283.80; Capt. H. M. Chittenden, $15.18; Maj. W. H. Heuer, $54.24; Capt. C. McD. Townsend, $44.57; Capt. W. L. Flak, $12.95; Lieut. Col. Amos Stickney, $47.50, and Lieut. Col. W. H. H. Bonyard, $49.76; in all, $1,684.04.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, after line 5, to insert:

Payment to the Venable Construction Company: The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to the Venable Construction Company the amount of the duty paid on Portland cement used by it in the construction of gun emplacements at Tybee Island, Georgia, not to exceed the sum of $3,688; and the amount required for such payment is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, after line 14, to insert:

Payment to Owen N. Denny: To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay Owen N. Denny, formerly consul-general at Shanghai, China, amount of

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 44.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to print 2,000 copies of volume 2 of the Commercial Directory of the American Republics in cloth binding corresponding to that of volume 1; of which 100 copies are to be for the use of the Senate, 500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,400 copies are to be distributed by the Bureau of the American Republics to the Presidents of the Republics composing the International Union of American Republics, to the executive departments of the various Republics of the union, to the newspaper press, and for such other public uses as may be deemed advisable. The Public Printer is also authorized and directed to print 10,000 copies of each issue of the Monthly Bulletin of the Bureau of the American Republics during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, for the distribution by the Bureau of the American Republics upon requisition from members of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The message also announced that the Senate has passed bill and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. R. 139. Joint resolution authorizing the Librarian of Congress to accept the collection of engravings proposed to be donated to the Library of Congress by Mrs. Gertrude M. Hubbard; and

S. 4757. An act to grant the right of way through the Indian Territory to the Gulf, Chickasaw and Kansas Railway Company for the purpose of constructing a railway, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 10585. An act designating Titusville, Crawford County, Pa., a port of delivery in the customs collection district of Erie, Pa.;

H. R. 1004. An act for the relief of Theodore F. Swayze, administrator de bonis non of the estate of John S. P. Wheeler, deceased;

H. R. 369. An act for the relief of Benjamin S. Barnes;

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6896) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes, and had further insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. COCKRELL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill and resolutions of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 4757. An act to grant the right of way through the Indian Territory to the Gulf, Chickasaw and Kansas Railway Company for the purpose of constructing a railway, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. R. 139. Joint resolution authorizing the Librarian of Congress to accept the collection of engravings proposed to be donated to the Library of Congress by Mrs. Gertrude M. Hubbard—to the Committee on the Library.

Senate Con. Res. No. 44. Concurrent resolution relative to printing copies of the Commercial Directory of the American Republics—to the Committee on Printing.

BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. HENDERSON. I present a privileged report, the report of the committee of conference on the bankruptcy bill.

The report of the committee, as published in the Senate proceedings of June 24, was read.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask that the statement accompanying the conference report be read.

The statement was read, as follows:

Statement of conferees on the part of the House to accompany conference report on the bill (S. 1035) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

The conferees on the part of the Senate, Senators GEORGE F. HOAR, WILLIAM LINDSAY, KNUTE NELSON, and the conferees on the part of the House, Representatives D. B. HENDERSON, GEORGE W. RAY, and WILLIAM L. TERRY, after full and free conference agreed on the report filed herewith that the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment which strikes out the amendment of the House and inserts in lieu thereof Exhibit A, attached to said report.

This was the most convenient form of reporting the agreement of the conference, and which report is signed by all of the conferees excepting Hon. WILLIAM L. TERRY.

In substance and effect, with a few changes to which attention will be called, the House bill, which was substituted for the Senate bill as an amendment thereto, is agreed to by the conference committee, and attention will be here called to the changes in the bill as it passed the House and the effect of the same.

I. In the House amendment to the Senate bill definitions were included in the chapter headed "Bankrupts." In the bill, as finally agreed upon, Chapter I is headed "Definitions" and devoted to that subject.

II. In the House amendment to the Senate bill Chapter II was devoted to "Courts," and the jurisdiction of courts of bankruptcy was included under that head. In the bill as agreed upon Chapter II is devoted to "Creation of courts of bankruptcy and their jurisdiction" solely, and that subject is brought forward and precedes in the bill the definition of acts of bankruptcy.

III. In the bill as agreed upon Chapter III is headed "Bankrupts" and devoted to acts of bankruptcy, and matters treated in the House bill in Chapter I, except as now transferred to other chapters.

IV. In the bill as agreed upon "Courts and procedure therein" are treated under Chapter IV, and this chapter includes all the subjects treated of in the House amendment to the Senate bill in Chapter II under the head "Courts" excepting "Jurisdiction of courts of bankruptcy."

V. In the bill as agreed upon by the conference Chapter V is devoted to "Officers, their duties and compensation" and treats of the same subjects contained in Chapter III of the House amendment to the Senate bill.

VI. In the bill as agreed upon Chapter VI is devoted to "Creditors" and treats of the same subject as did Chapter IV in the House amendment to the Senate bill.

VII. In the bill as agreed upon Chapter VII is devoted to "Estates" and treats of the same subjects contained in Chapter V of the House amendment to the Senate bill.

VIII. It will be noted that all these changes relate to matters of form and arrangement and that the chapters are increased from five to seven.

IX. "Definitions" in the House amendment to the Senate bill are the same as "Definitions" in the bill as agreed upon, with the exception that in the bill as finally agreed upon the word "creditor" may include the agent, attorney, or proxy, whereas in the House amendment to the Senate bill the definition stated that the word should include the agent, attorney, or proxy.

The definition of "defeat" is stricken out as unnecessary, the bill as agreed upon using the words "hinder, delay, or defraud" throughout the bill.

The definition of the word "insolvent" is changed so as to be in harmony with section 3, which describes acts of bankruptcy, and is enlarged in its meaning so as to prevent a fraudulent debtor showing himself solvent when proceeded against by counting or including property he had previously concealed or removed for the purpose of defrauding creditors.

The definition of the word "transfer" in the bill as agreed upon is the same as in the House amendment to the Senate bill, with the exception that the words "and the creation of a lien on property by any means other than by compulsory process prosecuted in good faith" are stricken out as unnecessary. Ample provision has been inserted in the bill to take care of and declare void in proper cases all liens.

The other changes are slight and relate to form rather than substance.

"Remove" and "suppress" are eliminated from the definition of "conceal."

X. The House amendment to the Senate bill contained no provision creating courts of bankruptcy except in the section devoted to definitions. The bill as agreed upon designates the courts of bankruptcy and declares certain courts to be such, and then defines the jurisdiction of courts of bankruptcy the same as did the House amendment to the Senate bill with the important change that, whereas under the House amendment to the Senate bill a person might be adjudged a bankrupt in any district where he had done business, under the bill as agreed upon a person can only be adjudged a bankrupt and proceeded against in the district where he has had his principal place of business or resided for the time required. The bill as agreed upon also limits the power of the courts in taking charge of the property of bankrupts after the filing of the petition and before adjudication to cases where the court finds it absolutely necessary so to do for the preservation of the estate. The bill as agreed upon adds a provision giving the court power to close estates and reopen them in certain cases. This is a wise and a necessary provision. Otherwise the bill as agreed upon and the House amendment to the original Senate bill so far as they relate to the jurisdiction of courts of bankruptcy are substantially identical.

XI. The House amendment to the Senate bill, in declaring acts of bankruptcy, specified eight different acts. That bill made it an act of bankruptcy for a debtor to conceal himself, depart or remain away from his place of business, residence, or domicile, with intent to avoid the service of civil process and to defeat his creditors. The bill as agreed upon does not make these acts of themselves acts of bankruptcy, but the subject is covered by the bill as agreed upon in this way: Whenever an insolvent person has concealed himself, departed or remained away and proceedings are taken against him, and any of his property is attached or seized by a creditor, the failure of the debtor to pay or release the property five days before it is sold or disposed of is declared an act of bankruptcy, and hence, under the bill as agreed upon, no creditor can be injured by the acts above specified and made acts of bankruptcy by the House amendment to the Senate bill. In substantial effect, such acts, committed by a person who is insolvent when a petition is filed, are made acts of bankruptcy.

Under the laws of the several States (if there is an exception we are not aware of it) when a debtor absconds or conceals himself to avoid the service of process and hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, a suit may be commenced, the property of the debtor attached and held, and eventually sold. Hence, in all cases, so long as the absconding debtor is solvent, the creditors may secure their debts by legal proceedings under State laws. In case the property is insufficient to cover all claims made and satisfy all attachments issued, or one creditor is gaining a preference over another by such proceedings, if such attachments, or any one of them, are not released at least five days before a sale of the property attached, a petition in involuntary bankruptcy may be filed and the creditor adjudged a bankrupt. In such case the attachments so levied, or liens of any nature gained by legal proceedings, are, by subsequent provisions, vacated and declared null and void.

The result is that in such cases there is no danger that the one creditor will obtain an advantage over the others. The main objection is that the more diligent creditor, who is put to the expense of attaching and holding property in such a case, may be compelled to release or surrender it and so lose the full benefit of his superior activity. If the absconding or concealed debtor leaves sufficient property to pay all his debts, all creditors will be satisfied and no great injury done. The main contention of the Senate conferees was that no person, however great the frauds committed by him, should be forced into involuntary bankruptcy unless actually insolvent at the date of the filing of a petition against him. While reluctant to yield on this point, it is well to state that but few cases will arise where an absconding or concealed debtor may not be safely proceeded against at once. Solvent persons do not abscond or conceal themselves to avoid service of civil process and defeat their creditors. If such a person does so abscond or conceal himself and a proceeding to adjudge him a bankrupt is commenced, he must disclose the fact that he has sufficient property to satisfy all his creditors or else he is adjudged a bankrupt. One of the main objections to our last national bankruptcy law was that it was harsh and extremely drastic in many of its provisions.

In framing the House amendment to the Senate act, and in agreeing on the bill as now reported by the conferees, great care has been taken to eliminate or modify every provision of this nature, and it is confidently asserted that no honest man need fear that wrong can be done him under the operation of the law. The conferees have studiously avoided provisions that are not essential to a wise and comprehensive uniform system of bankruptcy. They have not sought to enact a collection law or one that can be used as an engine of oppression. The conferees have sought to afford every honest insolvent debtor an opportunity, on surrendering all his property not exempt by the law of his domicile from levy and sale on execution, to secure a discharge from all his debts and commence life anew. At the same time it has been necessary to guard the bill by reasonable involuntary provisions that will prevent debtors from running in debt, wasting the property obtained on credit, or applying it all to the payment of one or more special creditors, to the exclusion of others equally deserving of protection.

The House amendment to the Senate bill also declared that it should be an act of bankruptcy for a person to suffer while insolvent an execution from a court of record for $500 or over, or a number of executions aggregating that amount, to be returned "no property found," unless such judgments should be paid before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy. This is eliminated from the bill as finally agreed upon; still the act is really declared to be an act of bankruptcy, for the bill as agreed upon provides that if the debtor, while insolvent, suffers or permits any creditor to obtain a preference through legal proceedings and shall not remove or discharge such preference five days before a sale or a disposition of the property to satisfy such lien or preference, it is an act of bankruptcy.

The principal difference in the two propositions is that in the bill as agreed upon property must have been seized and be in danger of sale, while under the House bill the mere return of an execution unsatisfied made the debtor liable to be adjudged a bankrupt, even though he was perfectly solvent and had an abundance of property to pay all of his debts situate in some other jurisdiction. The return of an execution "no property found" may be prima facie evidence of insolvency, but under the bill as agreed upon it is not an act of bankruptcy, and before the debtor can be adjudged a bankrupt in such a case it must appear that he is insolvent and that he has property.

Under the House amendment to the Senate bill a debtor might be thrown into bankruptcy against his will who possessed no property whatever. Such a proceeding is impossible under the bill as finally agreed upon unless the debtor admits in writing his inability to pay his debts and his willingness to be adjudged a bankrupt. It must be understood that this statement is made with the understanding that the debtor has been honest in all his business transactions.

In other respects all acts declared to be acts of bankruptcy by the House amendment to the Senate bill are made acts of bankruptcy by the bill as agreed upon.

Under the bill as agreed upon a debtor who conveys, transfers, conceals or removes, or permits to be concealed or removed any part of his property with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, commits an act of bankruptcy, provided he is insolvent when a petition is filed against him; and the bill provides that if the debtor is shown to have committed any of these acts, the burden is on him to prove that he is solvent when he proceeded against and that the acts have not, therefore, injured a creditor.

The bill as agreed upon also provides that if an insolvent debtor transfers any of his property with intent to prefer a creditor, or while insolvent permits a creditor to obtain a preference and does not five days before a sale discharge such preference, he is guilty of an act of bankruptcy. The making of a general assignment for the benefit of creditors is also declared to be an act of bankruptcy.

In case of such a transfer or the giving or permitting of such a preference through legal proceedings, it is made the duty of the debtor, in case a petition is filed against him, to appear in court with his books and papers and submit to an examination and give evidence as to all matters tending to establish solvency or insolvency, and in case a debtor fails to do this the burden of proving solvency at the time the petition is filed is thrown upon such debtor.

It will be observed that under the provisions of the bill as finally agreed upon no person can be adjudged an involuntary bankrupt unless he is insolvent at the time a petition is filed, but in certain cases the burden is on the debtor to show solvency, and in other cases he is compelled to appear and submit to a rigorous examination on this subject. This provision is just, for the debtor has full information on this subject, and the creditor should not have the burden of showing that his debtor is insolvent when proven guilty of the acts to which attention has been called or when he has permitted a preference through legal proceedings or has transferred property with intent to prefer the one creditor over another.

It is believed that the provisions of the bill as agreed upon are sufficiently rigorous to protect the great manufacturing and commercial interests of the country who give credit.

The provision compelling the petitioner in involuntary bankruptcy proceedings to give a bond has been somewhat modified, and under the provisions of the bill as agreed upon the petitioner is not compelled to give a bond unless it is proposed to interfere with the property of the alleged bankrupt before the final adjudication on the petition. It is certainly unjust to compel a creditor to give a bond before proceeding in bankruptcy where the property or business of the debtor is not to be interfered with, and the proceeding can not be instituted unless the debtor is insolvent and has committed acts of actual fraud, or has permitted one creditor to obtain a legal preference over another. No such provision has ever been incorporated into any statute in any State where an honest creditor is proceeding against a fraudulent debtor or one who is insolvent and is permitting his property to be taken by one creditor to the exclusion of others.

XII. A change has been made in the bill as agreed upon as to who may be adjudged involuntary bankrupts by including an unincorporated company and corporations engaged principally in manufacturing, trading, printing, publishing, or mercantile pursuits. It is believed that such corporations should be subject to the involuntary provisions of this bill. In these times the formation of corporations for these purposes is very common. The great railroad and transportation companies and banks incorporated under any law are left to be dealt with by the laws of the State creating them. It would lead to much confusion and hardship and many complications should we undertake to subject the great railroad and transportation corporations to the provisions of this act. It is believed that they can be better dealt with under other laws.

XIII. The House amendment to the Senate bill provided that the bankrupt should attend meetings of creditors when notified so to do by any creditor. The bill as agreed upon provides that he shall so attend when required by the court; that he shall not attend at a place more than 150 miles distant from his home or principal place of business unless directed so to do by the court, and that his actual expenses shall be paid from the estate when required to attend at a place other than his home. This provision is just and wise, as the bankrupt will, in most cases, be without means to defray his own expenses.

XIV. The phraseology of the section providing for the detention and protection of bankrupts has been altered, but the true meaning and effect has not been substantially changed. It is made clear that a court of bankruptcy can not arrest the bankrupt on a debt. He may be arrested for disobedience of its orders, for contempt, and on process issued from a State court on judgments not affected by bankruptcy proceedings when such arrest is permitted by the laws of the State where issued.

The provision providing for the arrest and detention of a bankrupt when he is about to leave to avoid an examination, and thereby defeat the proceedings, is so limited that proceedings for such examination must be instituted within one month after the trustee is chosen and qualified and that the bankrupt can not be detained more than ten days. This affords reasonable time for such an examination, but will not permit persecution of the bankrupt or detention for an unreasonable time. The provision that the bankrupt shall not be imprisoned is retained.

XV. Considerable change has been made in the form of the section relating to "Discharges, when granted." The House amendment to the Senate bill provided that the bankrupt might apply for his discharge two months after the adjudication and within the next four months. The bill as agreed upon fixes these dates at one and twelve months, respectively.

The House amendment to the Senate bill provided that a bankrupt should not receive a discharge from any of his debts if he had within four months of the adjudication given a preference not surrendered to the trustee, obtained property by false statements or representations, made a fraudulent transfer of property, transferred property in contemplation of bankruptcy otherwise than in the ordinary course of his business and in contemplation of bankruptcy. These provisions are stricken out, but in the bill as agreed upon the general discharge of the bankrupt will not release him from any debt created by or judgment obtained and based on any of the acts referred to.

Failing to disclose the fact that some alleged creditor has proved or attempted to prove a false claim against the estate is not made a ground for refusing a discharge. Making a false account or valuation of his property is stricken out of the list of causes for refusing a discharge, but by the bill as agreed upon such acts are made offenses punishable by imprisonment, and a general provision is inserted that the bankrupt shall not be discharged when he has been guilty of any of the offenses specified in the bill. In this respect the bill as agreed upon is as effective as the House bill, for conviction of the offense is not necessary as a foundation for refusing the discharge. In substantial effect discharges are to be refused when the bankrupt has committed an offense against the act and when he has fraudulently failed to keep or has destroyed or concealed books of account. Discharges from debts created by wrongs, frauds, etc., can not be granted.

XVI. The powers of and procedure in courts are left substantially unchanged as fixed by the House amendment to the Senate bill, except in the matter of appeals where the procedure is made more definite and certain and appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States are limited. This is in the interest of a speedy determination of controversies and settlement of the estates of bankrupts. It is highly proper that the settlement and distribution of the estates of bankrupts shall not be delayed by vexatious, expensive, experimental, and dilatory appeals profitable only to the attorneys who advise and promote them. Creditors should reap the benefits of bankruptcy proceedings at the earliest possible moment. Our circuit courts of appeal are to be the courts of last resort except in extreme and particular cases. A general supervisory power over proceedings in bankruptcy is vested in the circuit courts of appeal, and its exercise will expedite the proceedings and promote justice.

XVII. Some changes are made in section 23, which relates to "offenses."

The obtaining of goods by false pretenses prior to being adjudged a bankrupt is not an offense punishable by imprisonment under the provisions of the bill as finally agreed upon. The State laws will properly and severely deal with such an offense. Under the provisions of the House amendment to the Senate bill, falsely accounting for or failing to account for property after being adjudicated a bankrupt was made an offense. While these words are stricken out, the bill as agreed upon makes it an offense to "make a false account," so that, in effect, no substantial change is made.

The bill is so changed that the mere "offering" of a false claim for proof is not an offense. The provision relating to the giving or offering to give money as a consideration for unlawfully acting or forbearing to act in bankruptcy proceedings is changed in form but not in effect, except that the mere paying of money for such a purpose is not an offense punishable by imprisonment. Refusing to permit the inspection of books, etc., is not an offense unless such inspection was ordered by the court. If an inspection is denied by the referee or trustee, it is assumed that the refusal will be based on some good ground. The court can in a proper case direct such inspection in all cases.

XVIII. Section 60, while changed in form, has substantially the same effect as the House bill. An insolvent person who procures or suffers a judgment against himself, or who transfers any of his property by sale, mortgage, gift or pledge, etc., is deemed to have given a preference if its enforcement will enable one creditor to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than another of the same class. Payments to an attorney by a person in contemplation of bankruptcy for services to be rendered are subjected to the supervision of the court, but under the bill as agreed upon payments made in good faith for services actually rendered are not to be overhauled. This is simply a reasonable modification of the House amendment to the Senate bill.

XIX. By an addition to section 67, which relates to liens, the bill has been materially strengthened. All liens, judgments, attachments, and other liens obtained through legal proceedings against a person who is insolvent within the four months before a petition is filed, are declared null and void in case he is adjudged a bankrupt. Bona fide purchasers for value on a sale under such a lien, etc., are fully protected. In effect, liens of any description obtained upon the property of a bankrupt within four months of the adjudication are made null and void, except when given for a new and fair consideration to a person who has no notice of the insolvency or no reasonable cause for inquiry.

XX. The bill as agreed upon changes the time when the act shall become operative. It goes into full force and effect immediately, except that voluntary petitions can not be filed until thirty days and involuntary petitions until four months after the passage of the act. Voluntary bankrupts will have its benefits almost immediately, and creditors will not run the risk of having its provisions evaded by dishonest debtors who might give preferences and make fraudulent conveyances or other disposition of their property in defiance of the act and thereby defeat its operation as to them, were the time when it is to take effect postponed.

D. B. HENDERSON,
GEO. W. RAY,

Managers on the part of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Arkansas, Judge TERRY, one of the managers on the part of the House, who does not concur in this report, has agreed with myself, subject, of course, to the approval of the House, that this question be debated for forty-five minutes on each side. Will the Chair submit that question to the judgment of the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all debate on this question be closed after forty-five minutes have been occupied on each side, the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Arkansas. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, the statement just read is very full and enters carefully into an explanation of the changes which have been made by the conferees. As that will appear in the RECORD, the fullest information will there be found in regard to those changes.

It may be well to state the general history or status of the bill in this Congress. At the extraordinary session last year the Senate passed a bankruptcy bill. On the 19th of February of the present year the House passed a bill as a substitute for the Senate bill and asked for a conference. The Senate disagreed to the amendment or substitute of the House and agreed to the conference. For fully three months and a half the conferees on the part of the two Houses have been steadily at work—I say steadily in the sense of working as continuously as the circumstances would possibly admit—trying to reach an agreement. We finally, a few days ago, reached an agreement.

In justice to my associates on the conference committee, Mr. Speaker, I desire here to make public acknowledgment of the untiring energy and able services of my colleague from the State of New York [Mr. RAY]. We appointed, from the conference committee, a subcommittee, consisting of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], one of the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Judge RAY, of New York, to take into consideration the matters involved and in dispute in connection with the bill now before the House.

This subcommittee was appointed after many gatherings of the full conference and a pretty thorough consideration of the main issues. The work of the subcommittee was, of course, to be tentative and to be submitted to their conferees before anything was considered as having been agreed to by the subcommittee. The patriotism, the faithful, painstaking, and constant industry, and the energy of these two gentlemen on the subcommittee I feel it to be my duty here and now to acknowledge in justice to them and for the information of the country.

Finally, after they had gone over the various parts of the bill and had come to the part where they thought there could be an agreement, they respectively referred the questions at issue to their co-conferees, and after consideration, with some suggestions, modifications, and changes, to make a long story short, their associates agreed to the recommendations submitted by the subcommittee. We then met again in full conference, fully discussed the various items at issue, and with some slight additional changes in the conference, reached a complete agreement, which is now submitted to the House for its action.

The Senate, Mr. Speaker, have already agreed to the conference report, as, under the rules, that body was first to consider it, and by a vote of 43 to 18 they have ratified the action of the conference committee without the change of a word.

We have just made, on behalf of the House, as its managers, our report, which is the same as that submitted to and ratified by the Senate. If this is approved without change, the matter goes to the President for his signature without delay.

In this connection I want to say another word, personally, as to one of the other conferees on the part of the House, the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas, Judge TERRY. I feel warranted in saying that he is opposed to any kind of a bankruptcy bill and made his position in reference to the matter clearly known not only in the House, but in the committee. But it is my duty and pleasure here to testify that during all of these three months' labor that gentleman has ever shown himself in this work to be a faithful legislator and a gentleman who would scorn to resort to any of the tricks of the politician.

In matters involving technical legal knowledge he has given us the full benefit of his large learning and wide experience as a lawyer and helped us to perfect the bill from the standpoint of the true lawmaker, not withstanding his opposition to the measure generally, and I can not fail here, in justice to myself and to him, to recognize his courteous treatment and faithful services which were given to us at all times in perfecting the bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the House could have heard our printed statement, just read from the desk, and which was prepared by my distinguished colleague, Judge RAY, of New York, who went over every detail of the bill and to whom I give the fullest credit, they would know exactly what we have done and why we have done it. I want to say in brief that this bill as presented modifies or amends twenty-two of the seventy sections that were in the bill originally as it passed the House.

Forty-eight sections in the House bill remain untouched. There are really but eight sections of the House bill that have been fully considered and that have received thorough treatment and amendment, and there were but three general themes that were the battlefield, I may say, of the conference on the part of the two Houses: First, the grounds for involuntary bankruptcy. Five conferences were held by the committee, with many propositions offered by each side, without result, although at the fifth meeting I thought, from what I had seen and heard, that an agreement between the two Houses was possible. Then we appointed the subcommittee to which I have referred, and the work went on.

The grounds of involuntary bankruptcy amounted, I think, to seven or eight in the original bill.

Mr. RAY of New York. Eight.

Mr. HENDERSON. My colleague says there were eight grounds for involuntary bankruptcy. Under the conference bill there are numerically five, although these five contain substantially, as we believe, all the grounds of the House bill with the single exception of the first, which was:

For concealing one's self or running away to avoid the service of civil process and to defeat his creditors.

Under the proposed bill fraudulent transfers, conveyances, or concealments with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, transfers while insolvent to prefer one creditor to another, preferences given through legal proceedings, general assignments under State laws, and a written admission that a debtor is unable to pay his debts and his willingness to be adjudged a bankrupt, are the grounds for involuntary proceedings and would seem to cover very fully the necessities of a good bankruptcy law.

In the matter of discharges we made concessions to the Senate, so that some clauses formerly in the bill concerning the securing of discharges are removed to a certain extent; yet we have left thorough barriers to discharges on account of dishonesty or fraud on the part of debtors. The other questions at issue were the offenses. Some concessions were made by the House, but there still remains thorough protection against scoundrels, and punishment is provided for those who would seek to destroy the just operation of the proposed law.

The following are the sections amended by the conference, namely: Nos. 1, 2, 3, 6, 8, 13, 14, 16, 18, 19, 21, 24, 25, 29, 39, 41, 44, 48, 55, 60, 67, 70; in all, twenty-two. But the substantial amendments were made only to the following: No. 2, acts of bankruptcy; No. 3, who may become bankrupts; No. 5, duties of bankrupts; No. 8, detection and detention of bankrupts; No. 13, discharges, when granted; No. 25, appeals and writs of error; No. 29, offenses; No. 67, liens.

The sections of the House bill not amended are as follows: Nos. 4, 5, 7, 9, 10, 11, 12, 15, 17, 20, 22, 23, 26, 27, 28, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 40, 42, 43, 45, 46, 47, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 56, 57, 58, 59, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 68, 69.

The original Senate bill was not pressed in conference, but a substitute to that bill was brought in by the Senate conferees, but never seriously pressed. The House bill was then taken up and considered as I have just shown in my remarks. We make the bill operative in thirty days, or in four months for involuntary bankruptcy.

I want the House to understand that in my judgment we submit to you a bankruptcy bill which should find the approval of every member of this body unless he is opposed to any bankruptcy law at all.

Experience will doubtless show imperfections in the proposed bill, but I believe it to be the best that has ever been tendered to the country. It will bring blessings to hundreds of thousands of those who can never get from under a hopeless load of debt and will thoroughly protect honest men in preserving their rights against dishonest debtors and secure a fair distribution of the estates of insolvents. Time and experience will enable Congress to improve where improvement is needed and make a law that I believe will be retained upon the statute books of our country.

And with these observations, Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has occupied eleven minutes.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I desire in the beginning to express my sincere thanks to my distinguished colleague on the committee [Mr. HENDERSON] for the very kind things he has been pleased to say with reference to my services on the Judiciary Committee and on the conference committee in the consideration of this conference bill. I very highly appreciate his graceful courtesy in that behalf.

I believed from the very beginning, Mr. Speaker, that this Congress would in all probability pass a bankruptcy bill, and I have labored earnestly to remove objectionable or obnoxious features from such bill as far as I could, so that in case it did become a law it might not bear too heavily upon the debtor class of this country, who, unfortunately, are a very large class; and I feel that it is but just that I should now state that very many of the objectionable features have been removed from the bill, compared to what it was when originally proposed.

Others have been greatly modified; but still, Mr. Speaker, it is not such a measure as I can conscientiously support. It is still in effect a Federal attachment law. It still gives an extended jurisdiction to the United States courts that may be used oppressively. It still has the involuntary features that I have always opposed. It deprives an honest debtor of the right to prefer one creditor to another. I have always believed that there was a difference in the matter of debts; that some debts should be preferred to others.

I will not, on this occasion, enter into any extended argument to show that. I think every man's experience will show that some debts are of a higher obligation than others. It was always a common-law right for a debtor to prefer one creditor to another. It is a right that has been denied in quite a number of the States of this Union, but it is a right that has always been recognized in my State; and taking the involuntary features of this bill, the destruction of the right of a debtor to prefer one creditor to another, the fact that this bill is in effect a Federal attachment law, the fact that it opens wide the door of jurisdiction to the Federal courts in the matter of collection of debts, in many cases where they have no such jurisdiction now—those considerations, Mr. Speaker, are the main ones upon which I ground my opposition to the present bill.

I have spoken several times in this House against bankruptcy bills, and I do not care to take up any more of the time of the House than merely to make the brief statement that I have with regard to this bill.

I ask my committee colleague on the other side [Mr. HENDERSON] if there is anyone over there who desires to use any time? If so, will he please use it now.

Mr. HENDERSON. What is the remark of the gentleman?

Mr. TERRY. If you have anyone over there who desires to submit any remarks in behalf of the bill, I should be glad to have him do so, and then I will yield to one of my colleagues on the committee.

Mr. HENDERSON. How much time has the gentleman from Arkansas occupied?

The SPEAKER. Six minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should prefer to have my friend go ahead.

Mr. TERRY. Will there be anybody else over there to speak?

Mr. HENDERSON. I can not tell yet. There is one gentleman who desires to speak.

Mr. TERRY. Well, I do not suppose it makes very much difference. I yield to my colleague on the committee [Mr. DE ARMOND] such time as he may desire, and I will then reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I have not the time and shall not make the effort to compare and contrast this bill as reported by the conference committee with the Senate bill or with the bill which passed the House. To my mind the main objections to the bill as it left this House may still be lodged against it as it comes back to the House from the conference committee.

A proposition for bankruptcy legislation along the lines followed in this report was made to this House and to this country years and years ago. Its origin was with the great credit-holding, credit-collecting organizations of this country. The original bill, known as the Torrey bill, was drafted by a skillful lawyer employed by the wholesalers of the country and was designed to afford an additional and, from their point of view, a very effective means of collecting debts.

Of course it was presented to the Congress and to the country as a measure designed to relieve insolvent debtors. If it had been presented in its true light, as a measure concocted by creditors for the benefit of creditors, it might have met some objections which it has escaped in the course of the discussion in Congress. Nevertheless it is such a measure. No man can read a page of it without finding upon that page indisputable evidence that the bill originated with those who have debts to collect, and to obtain new means for their collection, rather than with those who are overwhelmed with debt and are seeking an avenue of escape from the hopeless burdens which they can not otherwise lift. The bill is stringent in guarding the avenues of escape and release for the debtor. The bill is precise and minute and strict with the debtor, in providing how the creditor may secure from him, how he must yield to the creditor, all that the creditor demands.

Scarcely can the insolvent get through under this law and with this machinery if those who take the other side—the creditors—choose to bar the exit and deny him a discharge. No longer will the creditor need to resort to the State courts that have been provided for the protection of debtor and creditor. Here are provided for him new and extraordinary Federal tribunals to which he may force the debtor at will. A man once assailed under this law, whether or not he be a bankrupt at the commencement of the proceedings, certainly will be a bankrupt in the end. Assailed as a bankrupt, thrown into court as a bankrupt, there is no escape for him from bankruptcy in fact. His credit destroyed, his property seized, his business broken up, however hopeful the outlook before the proceedings begin, after they are begun all will be dark, except for one possible ray of light—the hope that through the bankruptcy court he may secure a discharge from his debt.

The provision for the arrest of the hunted debtor when bankruptcy proceedings are on foot, notwithstanding it was pared down a little in this committee of conference, still is unjust, harsh, and unnecessarily severe. The unfortunate bankrupt is regarded as a criminal from start to finish. The person for whom this legislation is said to be, but is not, designed is the object and subject of suspicion from beginning to end. The real design is to make a bankrupt of him of whom a creditor would have a bankrupt made.

Another great objection to this bill, an objection that ought to be fatal to it anywhere and at any time, is that it is framed to establish permanently in this country a system which at best ought to be temporary. A bankrupt law designed for the relief of those who could not otherwise be relieved, a bankrupt law conceived in mercy and to be executed in justice, ought not to be perpetual.

It ought to be made to apply only to the exigencies of hard times, ought to be designed only to set men again upon their feet and then leave them to walk the various paths of life as best they may. If this bankruptcy law were a hundred times as good as it is, if 99 per cent of the objectionable features of it were eliminated, still it ought not to be passed unless circumscribed and limited in its operations within a reasonable period of time. If there be need for this measure now, if it should pass now, why ought it to become a permanent feature of the jurisprudence of the country? Why not provide for the evils which at present exist? Why not deal only with the ills to be cured?

Why would it not be enough to provide that for one or two years a bankruptcy law shall prevail, so that those desiring to take advantage of it may do so; and then, at the end of that time, all proceedings shall be wound up and no new proceedings shall be begun? Would not that be better and safer for the masses of the people than to establish a new, enduring system for collecting debts, with the power of the creditor to throw the debtor into the Federal instead of the State courts? Can such legislation be in the interest of the masses of the American people? Is it in the interest of the debtors themselves? Is it not rather designed to transfer from the State courts to the Federal courts jurisdiction which now resides alone in the State courts, and which is ample, certainly, for all ordinary times, and even for all general purposes in time of depression as well as in time of prosperity?

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES. Has the State court jurisdiction to enforce a Federal bankrupt law?

Mr. DE ARMOND. No.

Mr. GAINES. How are you going to cure it, then?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I am not making a bill here. I have not time to do so if I could, and perhaps it would not be adopted if I did. The real objection, be it small or large, goes to the system, and is that it changes permanently in the American statute books the methods of doing business in this country between debtor and creditor, and takes away from the State courts a jurisdiction which now resides there, and which, under our system of government, ought to reside there.

It transfers to the Federal courts jurisdiction which does not now belong to them, and which should not reside there permanently, if it should reside there at all. The result will be to multiply greatly the numbers of those employed and those hereafter to be employed in the judicial service of the United States. Almost before the ink of the Presidential signature to this bill is dry, a cry will be raised for the creation of new courts, the appointment of new judges, for enduring additions to the machinery of the Federal courts, made necessary, it will be said, by this new and extensive jurisdiction conferred upon them.

There has been enough passing away and drawing away of jurisdiction from the home tribunals of the people to the Federal courts. The people of this country—not those who propose and those who father and those who put through Congress such bills as this, but those without influence here to voice their feeble hopes and growing fears—seek not the enlargement of the jurisdiction of the Federal courts. They desire rather the enlargement of the way of the local courts over which they have more direct control, where they feel that justice will be meted out to them with a more even hand than in the distant, lofty courts under the Federal judges holding office for life.

The whole matter is this: In order to facilitate the collection of debts, because the creditor class of the nation have pleaded and schemed for it for years and years, there is now to be passed a bill in their interest, one that will bear hardly, in many instances cruelly, on the debtor class of the country, because they would rather go into the Federal court, where their power will be greater and where the victims will be more powerless than in meeting the debtors and the creditors of the land face to face in the courts of the vicinage. This law is to be passed. This legislation is to be adopted not as a temporary expedient for temporary ills, but as a permanent feature of the jurisprudence of this country for the creditor class, who urge its passage.

In making these remarks, in trying to express myself strongly on this subject, because my convictions upon it are firm and unshaken, I impute nothing of evil to the gentlemen who have carried the involuntary bankruptcy bill through the House. I have no strictures, no criticisms, for the gentlemen who served upon the conference committee. It is at the legislation that I strike; it is the legislation that I oppose. While realizing fully that the power which has pressed this bill, substantially in the same form, with little changes here and there, for years and years, is finally to have its triumph, is finally to carry the measure into the law, I am one of those who desire, in discharging my duty to my constituents, in discharging my duty, as I believe, to the plain people of this country, in behalf of fairness, to endeavor to characterize this bill as I believe it ought to be characterized—as a creditor's measure, for the creditor's benefit, as an exaltation and enlargement of the Federal power for the sake of getting the courts farther away from the people. Instead of being a benefit, a boon, to the poor and helpless of the country, it is a greater menace to them, a greater danger to them, and a deadlier stroke at them than many may suppose.

I do not go much into this business of prediction. Predictions often are worthless. But unless I greatly mistake, the time will come, and come speedily, when corruption of the worst kind will grow up around this law and be sheltered by it; when oppression there will find one of its citadels; when the power of the mightily rich will be magnified greatly by such legislation, and the weakness of the defenseless poor will be made manifest in the same proportion. There is a taking from the people of their home courts and of the opportunity to have their affairs adjudicated in their own vicinage. There is a carrying of the helpless of the land far away to the distant and mighty courts, where the wealthy have power and where the poor are comparatively defenseless. There is a multiplying of the officials of this land. There is an increase of the pay rolls. There is at once temptation to the dishonest would-be bankrupt and danger of denial of relief to the real bankrupt who is honest and helpless.

Here is a power for the mighty, when there is no need for it, to make bankrupts of those who otherwise would not become bankrupt. Here is power for the wealthy at will to tarnish forever the names of the honest and hopeful and, comparatively speaking, prosperous men who are indebted to them. Here is the power to strike down at will, and here is the power also to deny relief after the stricken debtor lies prone, his fortune gone, his business reputation scattered to the winds, and nothing but the relief of a discharge in bankruptcy in prospect before him. Here is a threat of the arrest of every man who does not dance attendance on the Federal court and help the creditors to make him more securely and more hopelessly bankrupt.

Trial by jury is vouchsafed if he asks for it speedily. Many a man will be thrown into bankruptcy and the time will expire for demanding the right of trial by jury before he learns that he has such a right. It is one that must be demanded quickly if it is to be enjoyed. The provisions in this bill are such that the purpose is not to give, but to deny, a trial by jury in most instances.

The man thrown into bankruptcy is compelled to attend the meeting of the creditors—their servant, their lackey, their slave—there at their bidding, as an abject creature owned by them. Yet this will be heralded abroad to the country as a supreme effort at legislative relief to those now bowed down with the burden of debt. The country may be mistaken about it now, but soon, I apprehend, it will ascertain and by bitter experience know what this measure is. The people will know what has passed from them, and they will know to what point it has passed.

This bill ought to have been limited in time. It will take the power of legislation to get rid of it. The whole history of bankruptcy legislation has shown that these laws have become odious; that the robbers have gathered around the places where they have been administered; that the buzzards have preyed upon the carcasses of those who have been slain by them. And yet it has been difficult to get rid of the other bad laws; and it will be difficult to get rid of this one. There will be powerful agencies to hold it upon the statute book long after the people of the United States, learning its character and effect, are urging its removal and pleading for the relief which that removal would bring. Why not put upon this bill a limitation of two or three or four years, or, better still, one year? Then, if it should prove a benefit or boon, with reasonable promise of continuing so indefinitely, as it will not, a very small amendment would continue it in force. But it is to be fastened upon the people for all time, so far as its projectors are concerned. The people may get rid of it when they can and as they can. [Applause.]

Mr. HENDERSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, at all stages of the legislation on this bill up to the present time I have voted against it. My reason for doing so has been that I have always been opposed to an involuntary bankruptcy bill and in favor of only a purely voluntary bill. I agree thoroughly with my colleague on the committee that if I had the writing of a bill I would make it a voluntary bill and limit its force to one, two, or three years' duration, and then have it wiped from the statute book. But I came here to legislate for what I may conceive to be the best interests of the people I represent. I can not always get such legislation as I believe to be perfect legislation. I must adopt for my constituents that legislation that I believe comes nearest to filling the end that they desire.

Now, the conference committee in the consideration of this bill had eliminated almost all the features which were objectionable to me. As I have said, if I could prepare the bill myself I would prefer a purely voluntary bill. But when the question was before this House several months ago I voted for the Nelson bill as a substitute for the Henderson bill. The present bill in its involuntary features is substantially what the Nelson bill was at that time. In other words, it substantially limits the questions of involuntary bankruptcy to cases where the bankrupt has committed a fraud or where he has given a preference. Now, I do not believe that an insolvent man should prefer any of his creditors. So far as my own State is concerned, we allow no preferences. And when you come to a question of fraud, I say that the man who attempts to defraud his creditors carries himself beyond the pale that entitles him to the protection of the law.

Therefore, although the bill does not fully meet my views on these questions, I think it a bill that is nearer to what my constituents want than any that they will have an opportunity to get in this House. And when I realize that on account of the depression of values in this country, on account of the great shrinkage of the property of this country in the last six or seven years, hundreds of men in my district and in your district have been made bankrupts through no fault of their own—men who with the shackles of debt hanging on them are unable to do anything further for their own benefit or the benefit of their families, men who have the capacity, the vigor, and the business principles which, if you would but strike these shackles from them, would enable them once more to make a living for themselves and their families and become live factors in the communities in which they live and good citizens of this Republic—when I realize that this is to be accomplished by the passage of a bankruptcy bill with the involuntary features in it, then I say that, with my duty to my constituents before me, realizing the evils on the one side and the benefits on the other, I am bound to take this opportunity to give relief to this class of people who have been crying at the doors of Congress for relief for the last ten years without getting it. For this reason I shall cast my vote in favor of the bill as it is now presented to the House. [Applause.]

Mr. TERRY. I yield to my colleague [Mr. McRAE] such time as he may desire.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, as is known perhaps to all the membership of this House, I am opposed to all Federal bankrupt legislation. I indorse what the gentleman from Missouri, Judge DE ARMOND, has said against this bill, and for want of time I shall not undertake to point out at length the very many objections that might be fairly urged against it. From beginning to end it magnifies the Federal courts, and absolutely nullifies the collection and insolvent laws of the States. Let me read section 2 in order to call attention to the very many powers conferred by it upon the courts of bankruptcy:

SEC. 2. That the courts of bankruptcy as hereinbefore defined, viz, the district courts of the United States in the several States, the supreme court of the District of Columbia, the district courts of the several Territories, and the United States courts in the Indian Territory and the District of Alaska, are hereby made courts of bankruptcy, and are hereby invested, within their respective territorial limits as now established, or as they may be hereafter changed, with such jurisdiction at law and in equity as will enable them to exercise original jurisdiction in bankruptcy proceedings, in vacation in chambers and during their respective terms, as they are now or may be hereafter held, to (1) adjudge persons bankrupt who have had their principal place of business, resided, or had their domicile within their respective territorial jurisdictions for the preceding six months, or the greater portion thereof, or who do not have their principal place of business, reside, or have their domicile within the United States, but have property within their jurisdictions, or who have been adjudged bankrupts by courts of competent jurisdiction without the United States and have property within their jurisdictions; (2) allow claims, disallow claims, reconsider allowed or disallowed claims, and allow or disallow them against bankrupt estates; (3) appoint receivers or the marshals, upon application of parties in interest, in case the courts shall find it absolutely necessary, for the preservation of estates, to take charge of the property of bankrupts after the filing of the petition and until it is dismissed or the trustee is qualified; (4) arraign, try, and punish bankrupts, officers, and other persons, and the agents, officers, members of the board of directors or trustees, or other similar controlling bodies, of corporations for violations of this act, in accordance with the laws of procedure of the United States now in force, or such as may be hereafter enacted, regulating trials for the alleged violation of laws of the United States; (5) authorize the business of bankrupts to be conducted for limited periods by receivers, the marshals, or trustees, if necessary, in the best interests of the estates; (6) bring in and substitute additional persons or parties in proceedings in bankruptcy when necessary for the complete determination of a matter in controversy; (7) cause the estates of bankrupts to be collected, reduced to money, and distributed, and determine controversies in relation thereto, except as herein otherwise provided; (8) close estates, whenever it appears that they have been fully administered, by approving the final accounts and discharging the trustees, and reopen them whenever it appears they were closed before being fully administered; (9) confirm or reject compositions between debtors and their creditors, and set aside compositions and reinstate the cases; (10) consider and confirm, modify or overrule, or return, with instructions for further proceedings, records and findings certified to them by referees; (11) determine all claims of bankrupts to their exemptions; (12) discharge or refuse to discharge bankrupts and set aside discharges and reinstate the cases; (13) enforce obedience by bankrupts, officers, and other persons to all lawful orders, by fine or imprisonment or fine and imprisonment; (14) extradite bankrupts from their respective districts to other districts; (15) make such orders, issue such process, and enter such judgments in addition to those specifically provided for as may be necessary for the enforcement of the provisions of this act; (16) punish persons for contempt committed before referees; (17) pursuant to the recommendation of creditors, or when they neglect to recommend the appointment of trustees, appoint trustees, and upon complaints of creditors, remove trustees for cause upon hearings and after notices to them; (18) tax costs, whenever they are allowed by law, and render judgments therefor against the unsuccessful party, or the successful party for cause, or in part against each of the parties, and against estates, in proceedings in bankruptcy; and (19) transfer cases to other courts of bankruptcy.

Nothing in this section contained shall be construed to deprive a court of bankruptcy of any power it would possess were certain specific powers not herein enumerated.

These and many other things, Mr. Speaker, may be determined by the judges in vacation. The bill confers extraordinary and dangerous powers upon the Federal courts over the estates of debtors, and fairly bristles with penalties against those who may become subject to their jurisdiction. I predict, sir, that within less than six months after this bill goes into operation you will find that the honest trader will have no credit at home because this bill will not allow him to prefer or protect his home creditors, and the honest debtors throughout the country will be driven into bankruptcy by the nonresident creditors. It means absolute ruin to small traders who operate on borrowed capital.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Let me ask the gentleman from Arkansas a question.

Mr. McRAE. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Do you construe the provision to which you refer as creating bankruptcy courts and, as such, courts distinct from the ordinary Federal courts already provided for by law?

Mr. McRAE. Not at all. The bill declares what Federal courts shall become courts of bankruptcy and gives them the power to appoint referees in each county.

I am struck with the political cunning of our friends on the other side of the House which is exhibited in the last section of this bill, which provides that "no petition for involuntary bankruptcy shall be filed within four months of the passage thereof." It is strange, when so much has been said, here and elsewhere, about its fairness, liberality, virtues, and advantages—it is strange that the operation of its involuntary features should be postponed for a period of four months after it becomes a law. If it is such a good thing, why delay it four months? The only way I can account for this is that those on the other side are unwilling to meet the wrath, the just wrath, of the people that is sure to be aroused by such an act until after the next November election. They have taken the precaution to say that the bill shall not go into effect for four months, and yet during this period acts of bankruptcy may be committed. It operates on the business of the debtor, but the courts can not act until November.

Now, if the bill is what gentlemen claim for it, and if the people are demanding it throughout the whole country, as they insist, why do they close the courts against the practical operation until next November? They know, as well as I know, and as well as can be known, that when the greedy creditors, aided by all of these courts and their army of officers and all the vast powers granted, shall commence to move against the millions of honest debtors; when the dishonest debtors begin to use this act to rob honest people and get relief from just debts; when the exemptions allowed by State laws to the people of the States are to be construed, and allowed or disallowed, by these Federal judges far removed from the people; when all of the attachment, assignment, and collection laws come to be administered by Federal officers; when all of the property rights of our people in relation to trade and business is taken from the State courts; when Federal courts have been given the power to set aside honest assignments and stand in the way of fair arrangements which would permit debtors to continue their business—when the people begin to realize fully what this means and what they must submit to and endure under this law; when they learn what is true, that this is nothing less than a national collection law, there will arise a storm of indignation that will demand its repeal and the rebuke of the men who have made such things possible. The people have but little left, and I trust they will be allowed to enjoy that without the interference of the Federal courts. Mr. Speaker, in the light of history and in the light of experience arising from the bankruptcy act of 1867, passed by Congress, our friends on the other side have acted wisely in protecting themselves against the next elections, which come in November, but I hope that is not the only election we will have in this country. I now yield to my friend from Texas [Mr. BURKE], who has indicated a desire to ask me a question.

Mr. BURKE. The gentleman from Arkansas seems to fear greatly the present powers which are conferred by the bill on the Federal courts and judges.

Mr. McRAE. I do.

Mr. BURKE. Now, frankly, I would ask the gentleman if the powers conferred by the bill are not the inherent powers in all courts—the right, for instance, to punish for contempt of court or contempt of its orders, the right to appoint receivers or assignees to take charge of estates, and things of that kind? In view of this fact, I ask if the gentleman from Arkansas is not complaining of the authority proposed to be conferred by the bill on the Federal courts which is now an inherent power of the court? Why should we draw the line on this particular bill?

Mr. McRAE. The powers to which my friend from Texas refers may properly belong to any court that is given such bankruptcy jurisdiction. But what I object to, if the gentleman will bear with me a moment, is that Federal courts, presided over by judges not elected by the people, but appointed for life, should be given full and complete jurisdiction over the property of the people. This is not a temporary statute. On the contrary, it is intended to be permanent. That may do for a monarchy, but it is not suited to a dual government like ours. When such power as that is given, there should be some responsibility to the people of whose estates these officials are made the trustees and administrators. All such matters, in my opinion, should be left to the State courts and you can safely trust the States to enforce the collection of debts humanely, fairly, and cheaply.

Mr. BURKE. Will the gentleman allow another question?

Mr. McRAE. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE. Does the gentleman from Arkansas include in his complaint the action of the Federal judge in his own district, Judge Rogers?

Mr. McRAE. I make no complaint against any particular judge. The judge of the district in which I reside is an able, upright, honorable, incorruptible judge, and I would risk him as far as I would any judge so far removed from the people. He is my personal friend, and I think our people quite fortunate in having him to administer this law if it passes; but that will not in the least prevent me from protesting against the wrongs and judicial tyranny made possible by the bill now proposed. [Applause.]

I have a very high personal regard for many of the Federal judges, but I know they can not settle these matters as well as if they lived among the people. It is not a question of the political affiliations of the judge with me. It is a question involving the rights of the people which we should consider. I am opposed to giving such power to any Federal judge, whether he be a Democrat, a Gold Democrat, or a Republican. I warn our friends in the House against the dangerous powers which you propose to give these courts over the estates of our people who may have become involved in debt. An honest debt is no crime, and we should be careful not to injure those who may be in debt.

Mr. Speaker, Congress should not strike the struggling trader by providing new and extreme methods to harass and vex him. On the other hand, let us elevate the standard of commercial integrity, which is the strongest and most potent influence for good in this growing country. You can not promote honorable dealing among the people by granting discharges in bankruptcy. The merchants and business men of our country who are fighting against hard times want to be left free to continue as heretofore. There is more pride taken in their commercial integrity and more credit extended upon it than in the possession of their property. This bill destroys such credit. You can not expect by law to make men honest, and you should not punish the innocent in a foolish effort to catch bad men. We can safely leave these matters with the parties and the State courts.

If a man honestly confesses his inability to pay his debts and makes a general assignment for the benefit of his creditors without preference under a State law, by this bill it is possible to take his estate from the State court into the Federal court and have it administered. In other words, you will not let him do in the State court just what you say he must do in the Federal court. An honest, worthy act on the part of the debtor who finds himself unable to meet his obligations is made an act of bankruptcy, and he must forever after bear the stigma of being a bankrupt, and his property wasted in cost. Again, you make it possible for a debtor to conspire with some friendly creditor, who may be his child, his father, his uncle, or his aunt, to be put into bankruptcy.

All that is necessary is for him to write a letter saying that he is unable to pay his debts and that he is willing to be put into bankruptcy, and the bankruptcy proceedings can be instituted, although he may have borrowed thousands of dollars from his neighbors.

Mr. RAY of New York. Will my friend permit me?

Mr. McRAE. Certainly.

Mr. RAY of New York. You are altogether mistaken.

Mr. McRAE. I wish I was, but I am certain that I am not.

Mr. RAY of New York. Certainly you are. The possibility that what you have just mentioned might occur was pointed out and urged upon the conference committee. So, if you will look at the bill as finally agreed upon, you will find it provides that a man may be adjudged an involuntary bankrupt when he makes a written statement that he is unable to pay his debts, and in the statement also says that he is willing to be adjudged a bankrupt on that ground. It must be a voluntary act on his part.

Mr. McRAE. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. RAY of New York. What you said, as I understood it, was that if a man wrote a letter to his friend, saying that he could not pay his debts, that he could be adjudged a bankrupt.

Mr. McRAE. I said if he stated in that letter that he was unable to pay his debts and was willing to be adjudged a bankrupt, all he has got to do in order to relieve himself of initiating the proceeding is to write this letter and say that he is unable to pay his debts and that he is willing to be adjudged a bankrupt, and straightway his friend, his cousin, his uncle, or his aunt may proceed against him, and his estate will be administered and honest creditors will be robbed.

This is an easy way for a debtor to voluntarily select some one to put him into involuntary bankruptcy, and it is full of danger. I have endeavored during the whole time that this bill has been pending—and it has been here for ten years—to look somewhat to the interests of the people to whom the bankrupt is in debt, as far as I could. I do not want the courts made the instruments by which deserving and confiding men and women are robbed. I do not want to make it possible for the dishonest debtor to defeat the honest debts that he owes; and if the history of bankrupt laws is worth anything, it stands out in living letters and ought to be a warning to every man who intends to vote for this bankruptcy bill. The act of 1867 furnished the machinery by which more honest debts were wiped out and dishonest men set afloat as commercial pirates than any other law that has ever been passed.

There are features in this bill that demand our closest attention. It will, I believe, be the means by which the dishonest debtor will be relieved and permitted to repeat his thieving indefinitely. The best thing we can do for the dishonest debtor is to say to him, "You must get rid of your debts as you made them—by contract, compromise, or otherwise." When you let him understand that there are only two ways to get rid of an honest debt—to pay it or to compromise it—he will be careful about making it, and then you will have commercial integrity and personal honor. That, as a general thing, is what the merchants of this country ought to do and stand for. That is what we all want, but we will never get it by putting the Federal courts of this country to issuing discharges and by giving them this immense jurisdiction and the dangers that necessarily go with it. The honest men in business will be ruined and the dishonest men who are in debt will be relieved of their debts. You make it possible to break one to give another who has failed another chance. I am opposed to that policy.

I yield back to my colleague the time which remains.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, on a former day of this session I voted for the bill which was originally presented and passed in this House. I voted for it because I believed that bankruptcy legislation was absolutely necessary for the best interests of a large portion of the citizenship of this country.

Mr. KING. May I ask my friend a question?

Mr. BURKE. Yes.

Mr. KING. Does not my friend know that instead of a large number of the citizens of this country pressing this legislation it has been persistently pressed for years by a strong lobby representing the creditor interests of the United States?

Mr. BURKE. I will answer the gentleman from Utah by saying that according to the report presented in this House by the Judiciary Committee, accompanying this bill, approximately 400,000 debtors were suffering and absolutely standing in need of some beneficial legislation in this direction when this bill was presented. I think I am not mistaken in the number.

Mr. RAY of New York. Will my friend and colleague permit me right there to say that it is true that the clamor for bankruptcy legislation does not come from the great creditor classes of this country, as you term them—that is, the great manufacturing and commercial interests that give credit. The strongest commercial houses in the United States, those who give the largest credits throughout the United States, have opposed this bill and this legislation from first to last.

Mr. BURKE. I thank the gentleman from New York for the suggestion.

Mr. KING. May I ask the gentleman from New York, though I do not like to take the gentleman's time, why do you so strongly insist on the involuntary feature if my friend inferred—and it is a reasonable inference from his statement—that it is the debtor class that want this legislation?

Mr. RAY of New York. I will answer in a few moments, if my colleague will permit me to do so right here.

Mr. BURKE. Let the gentleman from New York go ahead, though not to come out of my time.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, the gentleman does not appreciate the people of the United States; does not seem to understand them. We have really three classes. One, those who are so very rich that they live simply on the interest of their money. They invest in stocks and Government bonds; they do not give credit; they do not ask credit. We have another class, so very lazy and criminal that they do not get credit. They do not work, they do not ask credit, and they do not expect it; some steal, some beg, and some sponge. These two classes do not care anything about this bankruptcy legislation. Then we have the great mass of our people, rich people and poor people, manufacturing people, mercantile people, farmers, and laboring people; people of all classes that have money and property or who work and earn money and who invest it in business.

Some have money, some do not have much money, but they labor, they work, and they have money or its equivalent coming to them. They give credit. The day laborer gives credit; he belongs to the creditor class. He waits until the end of the week for his pay; so that his employer becomes his debtor. The great mass of the people belong to the debtor and creditor class alike. They are both debtors and creditors; and these, the masses of the people, are almost unitedly asking for this legislation, because when one of them fails or when his property is not sufficient to pay his debts and he is pressed and can not get out he wants to be relieved from the great burden of debt that is pressing down upon him. This law will help this class. In giving relief to that class of men we must be careful that we do not open the door to fraud; that is, for men who get in debt who proceed on the idea that they will get all the goods or property or money or labor out of workmen that they can on credit, then run away and cheat their creditors or use it all to prefer a few. We must guard all classes when we seek to benefit either. Hence it is that both voluntary and involuntary provisions are absolutely necessary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BURKE. Now I ask the gentleman from Iowa to yield me five minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will give you five minutes, but you must take care of it.

Mr. BURKE. I will do so. I hope I will not be interrupted any more.

Mr. Speaker, I can only speak advisedly for one class of people, and that is my own people; and I know, sir, that there is no measure that proffers greater benefit for the people of my State to-day than the enactment of a just and wise bankrupt law; and, according to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY], a member of the conference committee, he frankly states to the House that many, if not all, of the most objectionable features contained in this bill when it originally passed the House have been eliminated from it by this conference committee.

Mr. TERRY. The gentleman is stating my language a little too broadly.

Mr. BURKE. I will permit the gentleman to correct it in the RECORD. I do not wish to do my friend an injustice, even in quoting him. But let me make another suggestion. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND]—and I always listen to him with pleasure and usually with much profit, because what he says is usually to the point—seems to stand in great dread of the Federal courts of this country and the jurisdiction that attaches to those courts. Why, Mr. Speaker, that jurisdiction is constitutional. Why should the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] or the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] get up here and decry to such an extent about the jurisdiction of the Federal courts of this country? No bankruptcy legislation can be had except by Congress, and Federal courts must construe and enforce such legislation.

I say, Mr. Speaker, in a spirit of candor and of frankness, that I do not stand in dread of the Federal courts to such an extent as the gentlemen to whom I referred. They are courts of my country, and I have never yet seen the time when I was afraid to trust the courts of my country. Let them be Federal or State, I have no fears of them. Why, Mr. Speaker, in my own State to-day, if you will pardon the digression, there presides over the circuit and district courts two gentlemen, one a Republican and the other a Democrat, and I venture the assertion upon the floor of this House that there is not a member of the House from Texas who would not be willing to trust his life and his fortune in the keeping of those incorruptible judges.

I have no fears of the Federal judges of Texas. I do not know how my friend from Missouri and my friend from Arkansas regard those in their respective States. Much has been said upon the floor of this House about the harsh creditor and the poor debtor. I suggest to you, sir, that the Congress of the United States can not afford to legislate in the interest of the debtor class to the exclusion of the creditor class. Creditors have rights in this country as well as debtors, and Congress should see to it that those rights are protected at least equally with the rights of the debtor class. At a former day in the House, at this session, when this bill was up for discussion, I attempted in my feeble way to point out to the House that in two-thirds of the States of the Union to-day more grounds exist for the issuance of writs of attachment than exist for involuntary bankruptcy under the provisions of this bill. The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], says that two of the grounds formerly in the bill have been eliminated by the conferees, leaving now only six grounds for involuntary bankruptcy as contained in the conferees' report, less than there are now in three-fourths of the States as a cause for seizing a man's property under writs of attachment, and yet we hear the distinguished gentlemen say nothing here about the issuance of writs of attachment or the attachment laws of the respective States—not a word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DALZELL). The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the gentleman from Arkansas use the remainder of his time now?

Mr. TERRY. There was a gentleman that I wanted to yield some time to, but he is not now present.

Mr. HENDERSON. We have nineteen minutes remaining, I believe.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will yield eighteen minutes of that to my colleague [Mr. RAY of New York].

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, in the brief time I have I can not fully answer the objections that have been raised to the enactment of this bill into law, but I desire briefly to call attention to some of them. The gentleman inadvertently gave the impression to the House that we are creating new and additional courts and additional officers, which, of course, the gentleman did not mean to say. We simply confer certain jurisdiction upon certain of the United States courts. We do not confer jurisdiction so much as we declare jurisdiction. No new powers are created, excepting as necessary to administer the law, and almost every power specified in the bill is inherent in the courts, if they are given jurisdiction of bankruptcy cases.

Now, the gentleman raised the further objection that the judges who preside in our United States courts are to be feared, and gave the impression that every bankrupt is to be tried before a judge, and that a judge appointed for life and not answerable to the people is to pass upon the merits of his case. Not so. We have provided throughout this bill that whenever a person is accused of a crime, or charged with having committed acts of bankruptcy, he shall be entitled to a jury trial upon all the issues involved. On the question of whether or not he is insolvent he is entitled to a jury trial.

Mr. LOVE. Does he have a trial at home or must he go to a Federal court?

Mr. RAY of New York. In some cases he is entitled to a trial near home and in other cases he has to go to a Federal court. But there will be very few cases where an issue is raised. I desire to call attention to the acts of bankruptcy as finally agreed upon by the conferees.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman from New York allow me a question?

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes; but please do not take much of my time.

Mr. BARTLETT. Why was it you struck out of the bill the right of the jury to assess damages for a malicious attempt to put a man into bankruptcy? You do not allow the jury to assess the damages.

Mr. RAY of New York. Certainly, the jury may assess the damages.

Mr. TERRY. If the gentleman will allow me, I think in the conferees' report it says the damages shall be assessed by the court.

Mr. RAY of New York. They may be assessed by the court, unless one of the parties demands a jury trial; and if he does, he is, I think, entitled to a jury trial.

The gentleman says that we have provided that this bill shall go into effect immediately. Who can complain of that, Mr. Speaker? The great and pressing demand for bankruptcy legislation has come not from the East, not from the Northern States, so called, but mainly from the far West and from the great South, and the members of this House who are most urgent for the enactment into law of the bankrupt bill are those from the South and from the far West.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes; if you will not take up too much of my time.

Mr. GAINES. When and under what circumstances do parties have the right to demand a jury trial?

Mr. RAY of New York. Whenever an issue of fact is raised as to whether or not a man has committed an offense, whenever an issue of fact is raised whether or not he is guilty of an act of bankruptcy, or whenever an issue of fact is raised on any other important question material to the administration of this law a man may file his written request for a jury trial, and he is entitled to it. This is one of the best provisions of the bill.

Mr. GAINES. He is not entitled to it on a question of damages?

Mr. RAY of New York. Can not you have an issue of fact on a question of damages? I never appeared in a court where the claim of damages was made on the one side and allegations of no damage on the other but what it was held that a question of fact was raised, and it is usual to submit to the jury to say whether or not the damage had been incurred, and if so, the amount of the damages.

Now, we have brought the enforcement of this act to the very doors of all persons affected by it. Only two new offices are provided for, one is the referee and the other is the trustee. The referee, appointed by the court, must live in the county where the parties in interest, the bankrupts, reside, and the trustees in all cases are elected by the creditors themselves, and the fees and charges for the administration of the affairs of the bankrupt estate are very light indeed. The court may appoint a trustee if the creditors fail to elect.

Now, it is stated that we have had trouble with former bankruptcy acts. That is true, and the great objection to the last one was its severity. We have had the experience of more than one hundred and twenty-five years, and as a result of that experience, during a portion of which time we have had a bankruptcy law, but during the greater portion of which we have not had one, we have so grown in wisdom that to-day we think we can avoid the pitfalls into which our predecessors fell and can frame a wise, expedient, and just law. And I assert here, Mr. Speaker, that under the provisions of this bill it will be absolutely impossible to do a substantial wrong or an injustice to any man.

No State can pass a law to discharge a man from debts contracted before the enactment of that law. The United States, in the exercise of its constitutional power, can do so. And owing to circumstances not within the control of man, we have to-day throughout the length and breadth of the country a great army of formerly good, strong business men, who find themselves saddled with debt, and therefore powerless to do business. Every good citizen of the United States desires to see these men given a chance to get rid of this load of debt and start life anew.

In doing this it is absolutely essential that we guard against frauds and so frame our law that dishonest men shall not have the benefits of it. Therefore it is that in the bill as finally agreed upon we have said that men who have transferred, concealed, or removed their property with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors may be adjudged involuntary bankrupts if such acts have worked injury to their creditors. And who will complain of that? No man, except he be dishonest, can be reached by this provision.

Mr. BERRY. Can not that be done under State laws just as well in nearly every State of the Union?

Mr. RAY of New York. You can attach the debtor's property under the State law, but you can not secure an equal division of his property, and you can not discharge him from his debts, which is absolutely essential.

Mr. BERRY. Under the laws of my State you can discharge a man from his debts by taking his property.

Mr. RAY of New York. From all his debts?

Mr. BERRY. Not absolutely all.

Mr. RAY of New York. I thought not, because it has been adjudged a dozen times by the highest court in the land, as I just stated, that no State can pass a law that will discharge a debtor from all his debts, only those contracted after the enactment of the State law, and then the discharge applies only within the particular State.

Mr. BERRY. In my State a man's property may be sequestered or taken charge of and his debts paid, but he does not get a discharge in bankruptcy as he would under the laws of the United States.

I understand the gentleman is asserting here that it is the people who are in debt who are seeking the passage of a bankrupt act. I understand it is the men who have claims who are seeking the passage of such a bill as this.

Mr. RAY of New York. The gentleman does not understand correctly.

Mr. BERRY. Well, I heard the gentleman from New York state just now that in the South and West there is an almost universal demand for the passage of this bill. When he says that I think he does not know the sentiment of those people.

Mr. RAY of New York. But I do.

Mr. BERRY. I should like to know how the gentleman can know the sentiment of my people better than I do.

Mr. RAY of New York. I know that I know the sentiment of the section of which I spoke, for the reason that representatives from the State of Texas have urged before the Judiciary Committee, and have also appealed to me in private, that we hurry up the passage of this bankruptcy bill, because it is absolutely essential to the welfare of the people of the great State of Texas. The best men of the delegation of the State of Mississippi have made the same appeal. Men from all over the South have made the same appeal.

Mr. BERRY. The gentleman may know more about the sentiment of the State of Texas than I do, but he does not know more about the sentiment of the State of Kentucky. I know that the masses of the people there do not want any bankruptcy law.

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, Kentucky may be an exception; but I know that there are a great many men in that State who desire a bankruptcy law. Senator LINDSAY, one of the conferees on this bill, a Democrat, has urged the bill and favors its enactment.

Mr. BERRY. Those are people who have claims against poor men whom they want to crowd to the wall.

Mr. RAY of New York. My dear friend, you are mistaken; because, as I have already said, the great mercantile class—the strongest mercantile houses in the United States—are opposed to this bill. And why? Simply because under the State laws they can operate to better advantage. When they see their debtor going to the wall they have their attorneys on hand ready to use the attachment laws of the State and to secure all the property of the failing debtor, to the exclusion of the great mass of the creditors.

Mr. BERRY rose.

Mr. RAY of New York. I can not give the gentleman any more of my time.

Now, we have provided further that if a man who is insolvent gives a preference to any one creditor over another, he may be thrown into bankruptcy; and we have provided here that no man can be adjudicated an involuntary bankrupt unless he is insolvent at the time such action is taken against him. Therefore any honest man will be perfectly safe under the law, and no solvent man need have any fear of the operations of the bill. When men begin to cheat or defraud or give preferences, and are insolvent, it is time that proceedings are taken to protect all creditors.

Reference is also made, Mr. Speaker, to the offenses created by the bill, and they are held up as terrors and objected to under the claim that honest men will suffer or be prosecuted unjustly. Now, we provide in section 29 of the bill for the punishment of embezzlement by a trustee in a bankruptcy case. We provide as follows:

SEC. 29. Offenses.—a A person shall be punished, by imprisonment for a period not to exceed five years, upon conviction of the offense of having knowingly and fraudulently appropriated to his own use, embezzled, spent, or unlawfully transferred any property or secreted or destroyed any document belonging to a bankrupt estate which came into his charge as trustee.

b A person shall be punished by imprisonment for a period not to exceed two years, upon conviction of the offense of having knowingly and fraudulently (1) concealed while a bankrupt, or after his discharge, from his trustee any of the property belonging to his estate in bankruptcy; or (2) made a false oath or account in, or in relation to, any proceeding in bankruptcy; (3) presented under oath any false claim for proof against the estate of a bankrupt; or used any such claim in composition personally or by agent, proxy, or attorney; or as agent, proxy, or attorney; or (4) received any material amount of property from a bankrupt after the filing of the petition with intent to defeat this act; or (5) extorted or attempted to extort any money or property from any person as a consideration for acting or forbearing to act in bankruptcy proceedings.

c A person shall be punished by fine, not to exceed $500, and forfeit his office, and the same shall thereupon become vacant, upon conviction of the offense of having knowingly (1) acted as a referee in a case in which he is directly or indirectly interested; (2) purchased, while a referee, directly or indirectly, any property of the estate in bankruptcy of which he is referee; or (3) refused, while a referee or trustee, to permit a reasonable opportunity for the inspection of the accounts relating to the affairs of, and the papers and records of, estates in his charge by parties in interest when directed by the court so to do.

d A person shall not be prosecuted for any offense arising under this act unless the indictment is found or the information is filed in court within one year after the commission of the offense.

We have also declared it to be a crime to embezzle or to extort, or attempt to extort, any money or other property of any person as a consideration for action or failure to act in bankruptcy proceedings. This last provision does not hit the bankrupt; and there are only a few criminal acts that pertain to the bankrupt himself.

This, Mr. Speaker, taking it in all, is in my opinion the most just and equitable bankrupt law that was ever framed; and it is a law that will operate most advantageously to that debtor class of our people whose circumstances are so reduced that they will need to take advantage of it. It is not a collection law—is not framed or intended as such. We have reduced the cost of proceedings in bankruptcy—the charges and expenses—to the very lowest possible point, and the law has been made just and equitable on that subject, so that no extraordinary or unusual charges shall be made against an estate in bankruptcy. The estate can not be eaten up either by lawyers or officers. Liberal provision is made for discharges.

The judges to whom the applications for discharge are made may refuse the discharge from bankruptcy on the following grounds: If the bankrupt has committed an offense punishable by imprisonment as is provided in the bill, or if with fraudulent intent to conceal his true financial condition, and in contemplation of bankruptcy, he has destroyed, concealed, or failed to keep books of account or records from which his true condition might be ascertained. That is a fraudulent act and one that ought to prevent a discharge. A debtor will not be discharged from the following:

SEC. 17. Debts not affected by a discharge.—A discharge in bankruptcy shall release a bankrupt from all of his provable debts, except such as (1) are due as a tax levied by the United States, the State, county, district, or municipality in which he resides; (2) are judgments in actions for frauds, or obtaining property by false pretenses or false representations, or for willful and malicious injuries to the person or property of another; (3) have not been duly scheduled in time for proof and allowance, with the name of the creditor if known to the bankrupt, unless such creditor had notice or actual knowledge of the proceedings in bankruptcy; or (4) were created by his fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation, or default while acting as an officer or in any fiduciary capacity.

Mr. LOVE. Will the gentleman allow an interruption just there?

Mr. RAY of New York. Certainly.

Mr. LOVE. In the bill as it previously passed the House provision was made that at any time within twelve months after a bankrupt was finally discharged from his debt his case might be reconsidered at the instance of his creditors in view of indications of fraud in the distribution of the estate—

Mr. RAY of New York. That is retained with a modification.

Mr. LOVE (continuing). At any time within the twelve months, then, he may be thrown back into the courts.

Mr. RAY of New York. Yes. That provision is contained in the bill. We say in the bill that one month after a man is adjudged a bankrupt he may apply for a final discharge from bankruptcy, and he is to be discharged if he is not guilty of the offenses specified or has not committed other acts specially provided for in terms in the bill. Reference has been made to other provisions in the bill where the bankrupt may be arrested and detained for examination. If he is about to leave the district, he may be arrested and held for examination, but such detention shall not be for a longer period than ten days; and there is nothing unjust or wrong in that provision.

The objections made to this bill by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] are visionary, not real. Each demonstrates that he has not studied the bill as now framed with care and without prejudice.

Those who fail in business hereafter are as much entitled to the benefits and protection of a bankruptcy law as those who are now encumbered with debts they can not pay. Five or ten years hence we may not have as many people seeking the benefits of a bankruptcy law as now, but there will be those who will need its protection and its benefits. In legislating to-day we are to legislate not simply for present conditions, but for those likely to arise in the future. If it shall so happen that a few years hence a bankruptcy law is not needed, it will be inoperative and only come into use from time to time when people are so circumstanced as to require its benefits.

Under the provisions of this bill no man can be dragged far from his home, except in exceptional cases, and when his attendance is required at a point farther than his home his expenses are to be paid from the estate. The referee in each county is to act in nearly all cases upon all questions that can arise, and so the hearings and proceedings will be brought usually to the very doors of the bankrupts affected by the law. The gentleman says that the commercial honor and integrity of this nation and of its people should be maintained. I agree with the gentleman in that statement. The maintenance of commercial honor and integrity is just what this bill seeks to secure, and the law asks nothing and seeks nothing beyond that. The person who has maintained and who maintains his commercial honor and integrity will be unharmed by the severest and most drastic measure found in this bill.

There can be no combination of dishonest creditors that will harm any debtor. We have tried to so frame this bill as to promote business intercourse and the giving of credit. Under its provisions, when in operation, the manufacturer and merchant in New England will not hesitate to extend credit to the trader or farmer in New Orleans. The merchants and traders in the great Northwest will not fear to extend credit to those asking it all through the great South. Under the beneficent influences of this bill, when it becomes a law, confidence will be restored and created where it does not now exist, and business enterprises of all kinds will be stimulated and strengthened, and the growth of the nation accelerated.

If there is anything in this bill that is a terror to an honest man I regret that the provision is found in the bill. I know no such provision can be found. If, on the other hand, there is one or more provisions in this bill that is a terror to the dishonest man, I rejoice that I have had a hand in framing the provision. No man who cares for the business and commercial interests of this country, or who cares for the prosperity of this people, desires to have it possible for the debtor to cheat his creditor, or have a creditor oppress his honest debtor. We have made it impossible for either of these things to occur.

The interests of our people to-day are not only different, but far greater from a commercial and credit standpoint than they were fifty or seventy-five years ago. In thirty years our population has increased from thirty to seventy millions, and our commercial interests are far greater in proportion. Different sections of our country promote and carry on entirely different enterprises, and the manufacturers in New England exchange their products for those produced in the far West, and in carrying on this business it becomes necessary to give and receive credit. Any law that gives confidence to business men everywhere can not fail to be beneficial to all our people and can not fail to add to the glory and strength and prosperity of our common country.

The founders of this Republic when they framed the Constitution saw the necessity of laws on the subject of bankruptcy throughout the United States, and they saw that it was necessary to put in the Constitution a provision that the Congress of the United States might exercise the power of enacting a broad, comprehensive, and universal law on this subject. The true mission of a bankruptcy law is not to discharge debtors from their debts alone, but to protect also the great so-called creditor classes whose interest must be looked to and guarded when we provide for the absolute discharge of debtors from all their debts and obligations.

The following persons may be adjudged bankrupts involuntarily:

SEC. 3. Acts of bankruptcy.—A Acts of bankruptcy by a person shall consist of his having (1) conveyed, transferred, concealed, or removed, or permitted to be concealed or removed, any part of his property with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, or any of them; or (2) transferred, while insolvent, any portion of his property to one or more of his creditors with intent to prefer such creditors over his other creditors; or (3) suffered or permitted, while insolvent, any creditor to obtain a preference through legal proceedings, and not having at least five days before a sale or final disposition of any property affected by such preference vacated or discharged such preference; or (4) made a general assignment for the benefit of his creditors; or (5) admitted in writing his inability to pay his debts and his willingness to be adjudged a bankrupt on that ground.

And the following may become voluntary bankrupts:

SEC. 4. Who may become bankrupts.—a Any person who owes debts, except a corporation, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act as a voluntary bankrupt.

b Any natural person, except a wage-earner or a person engaged chiefly in farming or the tillage of the soil, any unincorporated company, and any corporation engaged principally in manufacturing, trading, printing, publishing, or mercantile pursuits, owing debts to the amount of $1,000 or over, may be adjudged an involuntary bankrupt upon default or an impartial trial, and shall be subject to the provisions and entitled to the benefits of this act. Private bankers, but not national banks or banks incorporated under State or Territorial laws, may be adjudged involuntary bankrupts.

No just claim can be made that an honest man will suffer under these provisions. They are just, necessary, and in the interest of debtors and creditors alike.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that under the provisions of this bill thousands of our good citizens, now hopelessly involved, will be benefited; that merchants, traders, and manufacturers will be protected, and that all our business interests will be strengthened and extended.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, in the one minute remaining I desire to say that, with the consent of the House, I will incorporate in my remarks in the RECORD the sections which have been amended and those which have not been amended by the conferees on the House bill. And I wish to make this further statement: While imperfections may be found in this bill, if it becomes a law, yet it is such a bill that, in my judgment, experience will enable us to perfect it in such a way that it will work for the good of the greatest number of the people of this country. Let us now have a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] asks unanimous consent to incorporate certain papers in his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McRAE. I ask unanimous consent to insert in my remarks certain papers which I have not here, but which are not very long.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope that will be granted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas makes a similar request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAY of New York. I ask unanimous consent that in my remarks I may insert verbatim the sections to which I have called attention.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York makes a similar request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. TERRY) there were—ayes 87, noes 27.

Mr. TERRY. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DE ARMOND. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 134, nays 53, answered "present" 24, not voting 144; as follows:

 Mr. FENTON with Mr. HANDY.
 On this vote:
 Mr. RUSSELL with Mr. STARK.

Mr. BRUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with my colleague from Michigan, Mr. SPALDING. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I desire to withdraw my affirmative vote and to be marked "present."

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. LANHAM, is absent on account of the serious illness of his mother. He desired me to say that if he were present he would vote for the conference report.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the number allowed under the rules of the House of this bill be printed and put to the credit of members in the folding room, so that each will control his proportionate share.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the number of the bill be printed that can be printed under the rule, and put to the credit of members in the folding room—

Mr. HENDERSON. Just a moment, Mr. Speaker. I will amend that request so that it will apply to the law after the bill is signed by the President. I do that on the suggestion of my friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the number of copies of this bill, when it becomes law, permissible to be printed under the rules, may be printed and put to the credit of members in the folding room. Is there objection?

Mr. McRAE. I would like to ask the gentleman how many that will allow?

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not know. I understand it will give us 19,000 copies, which ought to clothe us with a fair amount. If it does not, in a few days afterwards I will renew the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill H. R. 4936. My purpose is to send it to conference. I desire to nonconcur and send it to a committee of conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments to the bill H. R. 4936 and agree to a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. DOCKERY. What bill is that?

Mr. MAHON. The Court of Claims bill.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, the understanding with the gentleman was that he would yield the floor to me if consent is granted.

Mr. MAHON. I will.

Mr. HULL. Now, one question. If unanimous consent is granted it goes to conference, and there is no further question?

Mr. MAHON. I agreed that the gentleman should be heard.

Mr. HULL. I will not consent to any debate upon the bill at all. How long a time was the gentleman to be recognized? The gentleman says he does not know how much time he will consume. I object, Mr. Speaker, if it is going to take time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. HENDERSON. I offer a privileged report.

Mr. MAHON. I want to say this to the gentleman: There will be no unanimous consent or bills passed through without a quorum. I represent this bill, and 300 people are interested in it. It will not take more than a moment. The gentleman from California wants to make a statement, and I agreed, if you will give us a little time, so as to get it to conference.

Mr. HULL. The threat of the gentleman that no business shall go through without a quorum has no fears for me.

Mr. MAHON. The committee has rights, as well as others.

Mr. HULL. But the bills that I propose to ask consideration of represent not myself or the committee, but the people of the United States. Let this bill go to conference with the understanding that five minutes be given to the gentleman from California for a statement. Now the gentleman declines to fix a limit, and says he does not propose to fix it. If it is five minutes or ten minutes—

Mr. LOUD. I want to say to the gentleman that I shall not take any unnecessary time. I am not specially anxious; I am not shedding tears about this bill going to a conference; but if unanimous consent is given, the gentleman has stated that he will yield the floor to me. I may take five minutes, I may take ten minutes, or I may take fifteen minutes.

Mr. BAILEY. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that I am perfectly sure the gentleman from California has no desire to delay the business or trench on the patience of the House.

Mr. HULL. I do not see why he can not fix some time.

Mr. BAILEY. You know the gentleman well enough to know that he will not go into unnecessary debate.

Mr. HULL. There is no further yielding except to the gentleman from California?

Mr. MAHON. That is all. I will make this request, that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments, agree to the conference, and that the vote shall be taken after the gentleman from California has spoken.

Mr. HULL. Make that request and I will not object.

Mr. MOODY. I should like to ask the gentleman if at some proper time he will allow the House to vote on the various amendments upon the bill, the one that I have particularly in my mind being for the payment of judgments on account of the French spoliation claims?

Mr. MAHON. I do not know what the conference committee will do. I do not know who the conferees will be.

Mr. McRAE. It is proper to say that there is but one amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. If unanimous consent is given to nonconcur, we simply nonconcur in the Senate amendments without taking a vote on nonconcurrence on any of the amendments.

Mr. MAHON. And agree to a conference.

Mr. HULL. I have no objection to the gentleman making a statement pending that time.

Mr. DINSMORE. There is only one Senate amendment.

Mr. HULL. Submit your request.

Mr. RAY of New York. Before that consent is given, I desire to ask the gentleman if I understand that the French spoliation claims are dropped out of the bill?

Mr. MAHON. That is put on by the Senate.

Mr. HULL. Ask unanimous consent in that way.

Mr. MAHON. I want to renew my request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments to House bill 4936 and agree to a conference.

Mr. MAHON. And I ask that a vote be taken after the gentleman from California gets through with his remarks.

Mr. PAYNE. There is no vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no vote on the question.

Mr. HULL. It is simply unanimous consent.

Mr. MAHON. I make that request so that the gentleman can be heard.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And that the gentleman from California be allowed to address the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I have stood in the way of this bill going to conference for some days, and only at the solicitation of some of my friends who are as much interested in this measure as I am, and probably more, who have thought it was the best thing that could be done to have the bill go into conference, have I consented. So far as I am personally concerned, I believe this bill should never go a step further than it has gone. I want to call the attention of the House to possibly some unwritten history regarding this bill. In the early days of this Congress this House took up and passed what is known as the Grant claim. Evidently a majority of the House thought that claim had some merit. I do not believe it had a particle; but however that may be, it passed the House.

Subsequently the House took up the Methodist Book Concern claim, which was fought here for some days, and finally, to the disgrace, I think, of the country, passed it. It is true the Methodist Church have secured about an equal division of the plunder. It is true that those who are back of the claim gave the Methodist Church $188,000, in their liberality, and only retained $100,000 for their own services. Next came what is known as the Bowman Act claim, embracing in their number about 1,100 separate claims. There may be among those some meritorious claims—I do not know about that, and very few members of this House know whether many of these claims have any special merit or not. Congress does know, and the country knows, that we have had three separate commissions during the last thirty-three years to investigate this class of claims.

The House and country know that rakes have been over the whole South to drag out claims that had merit or otherwise, and they have all been laid before Congress. At the time that bill was up I strenuously opposed the passage of claims of that character in that manner. I object to their passage as much to-day as I did then. I would have been willing to bear my share, however much odium might have been brought upon my head, to have had this House carefully scan every claim in that bill, and it is but an act of justice that this House should know something about the character of the claims that are embraced in a bill carrying about eleven hundred thousand dollars.

Having had four years' experience on the Committee on Claims, I know something about how claims are reported from the committee. I know that an average Claims Committee report a claim because the committee preceding it had made a favorable report, and it calls to my mind my first session in Congress. Having given my assent to a claim for $40,000 for a claimant up in Michigan, Wisconsin, or some of those States near the lakes, for the taking of property by the Government for cutting a canal—one of the most perfect cases I ever saw in my life, a brief perfect from its inception to the end—the case was reported to this Congress, but it did not pass, and it came up before the committee again.

I had occasion to go to the War Department on that occasion to investigate the claim, which had a unanimous report from many committees of this House, and what did I discover? First, that this claimant never had any title to the land; second, that the value of the land never exceeded $25, and again, that this man was the principal who was asking the Government to expend some $50,000 to cut through the canal which benefited property that he owned above. I simply recite that as a sample of claims that come from our Committee on Claims.

Now, coming back to these Bowman Act claims. Had some men been willing to have occupied the position in the House that I occupied, they would not have passed until the House scanned every claim in the bill, but to my surprise upon my return from lunch one day I found that they had all passed; and now a portion of the unwritten history in regard to these claims. I charge here that there was a compact entered into by members of this House on both sides, by which that claim was permitted to pass this House with the agreement on the part of others that no other claims outside of the Bowman Act claims should be attached to this bill. That is a bargain, if you please, that these claims shall pass; that you shall be permitted to take eleven hundred thousand dollars out of the public Treasury if you will enter into a solemn agreement with us that no other claim shall be permitted to pass. Principally on account of that agreement I have objected to the passage of these claims up to the present time.

Now, what is the condition? There happens to be on that bill to-day a claim of the States of Oregon, California, and Nevada, too much money for this House to pass in a bill by itself. Oregon, California, and Nevada have not a delegation strong enough to form any combination on this floor to pass its claim about which there is no doubt of loyalty. Nearly $4,000,000 for equipping troops to suppress the late rebellion, and there was a compact entered into in this House, a solemn compact, if you please, where men have pledged their honor that that claim and like claims shall not pass this House.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Was that agreement in writing?

Mr. LOUD. I do not care to say whether it is in writing or not. I have made the charge and I can substantiate it. I can well understand that the agreement was made here in the interest of the public Treasury, as I have supposed, and not to do justice.

Now, while I believe that those claims are just and equitable—

Mr. KING. Do you mean the Bowman Act claims?

Mr. LOUD. I refer to the claims of the States of Oregon, California, and Nevada. Those claims must be just and equitable, because there is not a single State outside of those three that has not been reimbursed for equipping troops during the rebellion. Another claim, too, from the State of California of equal equity—

Mr. CUMMINGS. The gentleman will allow me to say that the city of New York has never been reimbursed for the $2,000,000 which she spent in raising and equipping troops.

Mr. LOUD. Let me say that the State of New York has received some millions of dollars from the United States Government. Perhaps she has not received all that she ought to have received. I do not know anything about that. I know that these States to which I refer have never received a cent. And then there is this additional claim which gentlemen here have urged that Congress should not pass—the claim known as the 5 per cent claim of the State of California. That State is the only one in the United States that has not received 5 per cent of the amount realized from the sale of her public lands. But gentlemen say that is not a good claim; that claim must not pass because it carries five or six million dollars.

Again men say, "You have no legal claim upon the Government, because your State was not admitted under an enabling act." It is true we were not so admitted; but that was not our fault. California, as gentlemen will remember, was admitted in the days when the slavery question was the great question before this country; and both parties were so anxious to add another State to the Union that they would not allow us sufficient time to come in under an enabling act. And then Congress stands back here and says, "Simply because we took advantage of a condition that existed, you shall not have the rights enjoyed by every other State of this Union."

And let me say again a compact is entered into under which claims of this character can not pass the House, while claims of a suspicious character—and I emphasize the word "suspicious" when I refer to the loyalty in the South—are allowed to pass. Three years I spent in that section of the country. I never found many loyal people there. Yet Congress has been enabled since the war to find many thousands. Thirty-three years after the war has closed, and when nearly all the actors in that event have gone, it is perfectly easy to prove that a man was loyal during that controversy.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. Do you not accept the finding of your own court on that subject?

Mr. LOUD. I say that the findings of the Court of Claims as relating to a legal claim are not worth the paper they are written on. Perhaps the gentleman does not know what the findings of the Court of Claims are. Let me illustrate by one case that is before Congress to-day.

A gentleman in what is now Montana or Idaho bought in the early days a stage route from the Holiday Stage Company; he paid money for it; he had his stage station there for a number of years (these are the facts as found by the Court of Claims); he resided there for some years, when it was found that the property he was supposed to have purchased was upon a Government reservation, and he was ordered off. The court found that the buildings were worth so much; that the hay cut there was worth so much; that he had so many cattle which were driven into the State of Nevada, in doing which so many cattle were lost. The various amounts summed up $40,000.

Now, that is a finding of the Court of Claims; and so far as concerns any action by this House, it is not worth the paper it is written on. The court simply finds a condition of facts, but never attempts to say whether the Government is liable or not. In such a case the Government evidently is not liable. No man would assume as between man and man that if a person has purchased a bad title to real estate some innocent party must necessarily pay him for his laches.

I have heard many people throughout the country declaiming constantly against the dishonesty of the Government in refusing to pay claims presented; and during the last ten days my committee room and my residence have been besieged by honest "patriots" who are anxious to get their own hands or the hands of their friends into the public Treasury, and who have been condemning this great Government of ours as a "robber" of the mass of the people. If they could but know how often the Government itself is robbed, perhaps they might change their tune. My experience in this House has been that claims of the greatest merit, however, can not pass this body, but claims which are suspicious in their character and having but little merit, if they represent a great section of the country and can thereby command a great number of votes, have no trouble whatever in passing.

I do not believe this bill will ever get out of conference. I hope to God it never may. A compact of this kind should never be carried out if we have proper regard for the credit and honor of this House.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman state to the House the amount of the claims added by the Senate amendment?

Mr. LOUD. About $3,000,000, I think.

Mr. DOCKERY. And the original bill carried—

Mr. LOUD. About $1,000,000.

Mr. DOCKERY. One million one hundred thousand dollars, I understand.

Mr. LOUD. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY. And the bill was carried through, as the gentleman affirms, by a compact?

Mr. LOUD. By a compact.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, I want to enter my disclaimer as to being any party to it.

Mr. LOUD. It was carried through by a compact that no other claim should be added to it. And that is what I object to. I have never yet raised my voice or cast my vote against a bill that I believed had merit. I have quietly sat here many a time and have seen claim after claim go through which I could have prevented, claims which, in my judgment, were doubtful in their character—

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption just there?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. What is the objection that the gentleman is urging; that a sufficient amount was not added to the bill? You say that eight millions were added.

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now are you finding fault because ten or even twenty millions were not added?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, no. The gentleman is getting very facetious, apparently. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to know the gentleman's contention.

Mr. LOUD. Men of great ability, Mr. Speaker, sometimes stoop to "pettifoggery." [Laughter.] Let me state to my friend from Iowa, whom I have usually regarded as one of the clearest men in the House, what I object to is a proposition which proposes to allow a claim of $1,000,000 and over to pass through Congress of doubtful merit, with an agreement that no other claim shall pass, no matter how much equity it may have—

Mr. HEPBURN (interrupting). That is just the reason that I asked the gentleman the question. You were objecting, as I understand it, because the other claims were put on the bill.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, no; the gentleman does not seem to get it into his head yet. I will state publicly this, although privately I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that I know he fairly understands the situation. [Laughter.]

Mr. DINSMORE. Does the gentleman from California object to the claims put on the bill by the House?

Mr. LOUD. I do not know more than the gentleman from Arkansas himself knows of the nature of these claims.

Mr. DINSMORE. But the illustration of the gentleman, and to which he has called attention, is in reference to property taken by the Army and used by the Army during the war.

Mr. LOUD. That is the claim.

Mr. DINSMORE (continuing). And the Court of Claims has decided on that with reference to the loyalty of the claimant, the amount of the property taken, the necessity of its use by the United States, and the value of it. Now, does not the gentleman know that to be the fact?

Mr. LOUD. I do not know anything more about it than the gentleman from Arkansas does, which is very little.

Mr. DINSMORE. But the gentleman is making an argument, as if he did understand the facts.

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman is on the committee—

Mr. DINSMORE. I am not on the committee.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman knows how this claim was considered by the House. The bill was read, it is true, while there were fifteen or twenty members present. I do not know even if the gentleman from Arkansas was present at that time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the gentleman permit me an interruption?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand this bill originally provided for $1,000,000 or $1,100,000 of claims under the Bowman Act, and that since that time claims aggregating about $8,000,000 have been added in the Senate by way of amendment. I understand the gentleman to allege that a compact, to which he has referred, was entered into in the House which prevents a fair consideration of the justice and merits of the claims passed by the Senate and incorporated in the House bill. Is that true?

Mr. LOUD. If the conferees enter into a compact, which I will not admit or allege, because personally I do not think they did; but my point is that, to a certain extent at least, if the committee shall go into a conference now, they must practically go into it with their hands tied.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand the gentleman criticises the validity of the claims presented to the House. Now, has he any doubt of the claims which have been added by the Senate, aggregating about $4,000,000, and due to California, Nevada, and Oregon for expenditures in equipping troops and furnishing munitions of war during the late war?

Mr. LOUD. That is a question which I have not carefully investigated. I can only say, as before, that every other State in the United States has received pay under exactly similar circumstances.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Have you any doubt that this money was advanced by Nevada, California, and Oregon?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly not. There is not a sane man in the world who can deny the fact.

Mr. NEWLANDS. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. LOUD. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have said all I desired to say, simply entering my protest against this method of transacting public business.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I would like to ask the gentleman from California if any Indian depredation claims are included in the bill?

Mr. LOUD. I have not examined it carefully, but I think not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will announce the conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. MAHON, Mr. OTJEN, and Mr. RICHARDSON were appointed conferees.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate still further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 8429) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes, numbered 13, 14, 186, 221, 222, and 233, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. GORMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

BUSINESS FROM COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit for present consideration a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolution of the House No. 333, have considered the same, and report the following as a substitute therefor:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order for the House to proceed with the consideration of business reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, and to continue such consideration for a period not exceeding two days.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I am not of the opinion that it is necessary to adopt that rule. I believe, if it can be done, it is more desirable to reach an agreement without a rule, and I say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] frankly that there are several bills reported by the committee that some gentlemen in the House desire to antagonize, while there are others that I presume every gentleman in the House will cheerfully support. I hardly think it necessary, therefore, to put the House in the attitude of having to adopt a rule to insure the consideration of desirable and necessary measures reported from the Military Committee, and I believe if the gentleman from Iowa will prefer a request—

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, the effort was made twice in the House to reach an agreement by unanimous consent and it failed.

Mr. HULL. It was made three times on several bills and three or four times on individual bills.

Mr. HENDERSON. This proposition was made twice, and the chairman of the Military Committee says it was made at other times, and no agreement was arrived at. There are important matters pending which have been reported from this committee. We will all agree to that. My friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] I think will agree that there are important bills that ought to be considered. Having made fruitless efforts to reach an agreement, this resolution was introduced and referred to the Committee on Rules, and the Committee on Rules have agreed to it, in view of the importance of securing action upon these measures, some of which are of great moment. If there are any bills that ought not to be passed, the House is able to protect itself.

Mr. BAILEY. I believe an objection has been made on each side of the House, but of course that objection was directed entirely against some objectionable bill. I know that nobody on this side, and I am equally sure that nobody on that side, has any objection to any bill which is necessary for the prosecution of this war. But there are some bills that I believe are confessedly intended to deal with the Army as a permanent regulation; and on this side of the House we hardly think that desirable at this time. If it is believed that there may happen to be individual gentlemen on the floor who would object, then, of course, the rule becomes a necessary resort; but I desire it understood, not merely for the benefit of one side, but for both sides, that there is no disposition on the part of any gentleman in the House to antagonize any necessary and proper war measure.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let us have a vote on the resolution.

Mr. KING. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa one question, with his consent. When will the two days expire?

Mr. HENDERSON. That will have to be determined when the question is presented to the presiding officer, I suppose.

Mr. KING. Would it be forty-eight hours from this time?

Mr. HENDERSON. I can not answer that question. I am not in the chair.

Mr. KING. Would not the gentleman consent to amend the rule?

Mr. HENDERSON. It allows two days, commencing at this hour; and the meaning of the resolution will have to be determined by the presiding officer when the proper time comes. It is not a question that can be answered at this stage. I am not here to furnish information for the officer who may preside.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that the presiding officer will have to construe the two days as terminating to-morrow evening at the hour of adjournment.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask for a vote.

Mr. KING. I think the rule in its present form ought to be voted down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. KING demanded a division, but, pending the division, withdrew the demand.

Accordingly the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to make a suggestion in all friendliness to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL]. I hope that the bills that will excite no opposition will be first disposed of, because there are perhaps one or two of the bills that will provoke controversy.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I do not know how I can determine what bills will provoke opposition until they are taken up, but I will say that the Committee on Military Affairs and myself are anxious first to take up the bills affecting the business interests of the Army, the Quartermaster's bill, the Subsistence Department bill, the Ordnance bill, and bills of that character.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope the Engineers' bill will be included.

Mr. HULL. And the Engineer's bill.

Mr. HANDY. And the Inspector-General's bill.

Mr. HULL. Yes; although I do not regard that as of special importance. But let the great business departments of the Government be cared for first.

Mr. BAILEY. I will instance a bill that I do not think ought to be taken up first, and that is the bill to create the office of Lieutenant-General. I think that ought to be deferred.

Mr. HULL. I will say to my friend—

Mr. KING. And the military secretary.

Mr. HULL. I do not know about the military secretary, but there will be no bill creating rank brought up until the business bills are first considered.

Mr. BAILEY. That will expedite the matter.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. There is a Senate bill relating to the Quartermaster's Department on the Speaker's table. The House committee and I desire first to take up the House bill and perfect it, if necessary, and then move to strike out of the Senate bill all after the enacting clause and insert the House bill. To do that is it necessary first to call up the Senate bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that it is.

TO INCREASE THE EFFICIENCY OF THE QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY.

Mr. HULL. Then, Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 4809.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4809) to increase the efficiency of the Quartermaster's Department of the Army.

Be it enacted, etc., That during the existing war, and for a period not exceeding one year thereafter, the Secretary of War may make such distribution of the duties and labors of the Quartermaster's Department as may be deemed for the best interests of the service, and may assign a suitable officer in charge of each of such divisions, and may assign to duty as special inspectors of the Quartermaster's Department not exceeding four officers, to be selected from the regular and volunteer officers of the Department; and such officers, and the quartermaster on the staff of the Commanding General of the Army, while so acting, shall have the rank next above that held by them and not above colonel.

SEC. 2. That the President may nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may appoint twenty assistant quartermasters of volunteers, with the rank of captain, in the Quartermaster's Department. The Secretary of War may assign such of the volunteer quartermasters, with the rank of captain, as may be deemed necessary to duty as assistants in the office of the Quartermaster-General, at the various supply depots, or on other important and special work, and may continue such assignments for a period not exceeding one year after the close of the war, then to be discharged.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I—

Mr. HANDY. A parliamentary inquiry. Must not that bill be considered under the rules in Committee of the Whole? It carries, as I understand, additional charges upon the Treasury of the United States. We might as well proceed in an orderly manner.

The SPEAKER. Under the language of the rule it would be considered in the House.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the bill; and I will say that this amendment came to me from the Secretary of War to-day too late to consult the committee in regard to it or by person.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2, by inserting at the end of line 2, the following:

"Two chief quartermasters of volunteers with the rank of colonel;

"Two chief quartermasters of volunteers with the rank of lieutenant-colonel;

"Three chief quartermasters of volunteers with the rank of major."

Strike out the word "twenty," at the end of line 3, section 2, and insert the word "thirteen."

Mr. HULL. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that it is simply a change of the rank. The Secretary in his statement said that he wants one man to take charge of the transportation and another for some other purpose, and unless he gains some higher rank it will be impossible to do so. I prefer the House bill to this, and I shall afterwards move to strike out after the enacting clause and insert the House bill.

Mr. KING. If the gentleman would permit me one question, I would like to know why it is considered necessary that the men to be appointed in the Quartermaster's establishment should be civilians? Can not line officers be appointed colonels, and would not they be capable of performing the duties? The line officers will never have a chance of recognition so long as these places are thrust upon civilians.

Mr. HULL. I will say, in reply, that the gentleman will certainly recognize the fact that a man can not leave his business and take a temporary employment at a low rank and do the work. To have the work done you must give a better rank. Take, for instance, transportation and the purchase of ships. The Secretary especially wants a man who has had large experience, and even with the rank of colonel he will make business sacrifices if he accepts it at all. You can not ask a man of that character to step in and take charge of these large departments at a low rank. For the good of the service you want the highest character of men you can get.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Will the gentleman from Iowa permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Do I understand the gentleman from Iowa to say, in response to the inquiry of my friend from Utah, that a man who takes this place takes it as a matter of business, and that it involves no patriotism; and that he has got to have a rank that is to be given him here to be commensurate with the value of his services?

Mr. HULL. You did not understand me to say that. I said that even with the rank of colonel he made a great business sacrifice.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I understand that the Administration has found it necessary to employ Mr. Blanchard, having charge of the freight, and Director Thompson, president of the Pennsylvania road, in the service of which you now come, and is it to give those gentlemen this rank? If so, will the gentleman do me the kindness to state whether the rank has been conferred on other gentlemen than those?

Mr. HULL. I have not kept track as to what gentlemen are appointed. That is a matter of indifference to me. I have enough to keep me busy here, and I am willing to trust the Executive with appointments. I know that the Secretary of War himself regarded this matter of such importance that he came personally to the Capitol to-day and gave me this amendment, with the request that I offer it to the House and say for him that the best interests of the Government demanded that it should be adopted; and when I have said that, I have given the gentleman all the information I have myself.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will state to the gentleman from Washington that I understand that Mr. Thompson and Mr. Blanchard would not accept the position. One of them was getting $50,000 a year and the other $25,000.

Mr. McCLELLAN. We have 78 officers now. This is a total of 98, as against 568 in 1865, and we have 300,000 men now, and then about 1,500,000. In other words, the proportion—

Mr. HULL. Is less than one-fourth of what it was at that time.

Mr. McCLELLAN. A very moderate increase of number.

Mr. KING. Will my friend permit another question? As I understand it, there are a great many line officers, men educated at the expense of the Government, that would be very glad to secure the promotion contemplated in this bill. Why should there not be power vested in the Secretary of War or commanding officers to detail some of those officers who have been educated at the expense of the Government to conduct the business of these departments, and take the rank which the performance of those duties would confer upon them?

Mr. HULL. I assume that where they have a man specially qualified for the discharge of these duties, he will be given the position. There is nothing in the bill prohibiting that. It gives the Secretary of War power to get the best man from the Army or civil life. It is the temporary rank that he gets for extra services. So far as the purchase of supplies, it is expected that it will be a promotion within the line of the Army.

Mr. KING. Why not provide that the men shall be taken from the line? Why not have men that have been educated in that line of business?

Mr. HULL. To-day the line of the Army has been drawn on until many of the companies have but one commissioned officer. It is wrong to continue to take the officers away from the command and give them staff positions. You have a man on the staff that is educated on this line and they have to have help. There are men in civil life that are better qualified for some lines of work than men in the Army would be. Take, for instance, the matter of transportation and the shipment of a large number of troops; you find men in civil life who have made a business of it, who have organized trains for moving large bodies of men, and who are educated to it. We leave it with the Department, not with Congress, whether they will take the men out of the Army or out of civil life, and let them get the best men they can.

Mr. SULZER. I want to say to the gentleman from Utah that there is nothing in this bill that will prevent the Department from taking men from the line.

Mr. HULL. Not at all; but I do not want to force them to do it.

Mr. KING. Is it not regarded that this bill, as well as a number of others that have been passed, is for the purpose of conferring positions on civilians in preference to those from the line?

Mr. SULZER. Not at all. This bill leaves it discretionary with the Department; and that is where the discretion should lie.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the gentleman allow me a word or two?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to inquire whether the amendment suggested by the Secretary of War increases the number of quartermasters provided for by the Senate?

Mr. HULL. It does not. It gives some of them additional rank with additional pay.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And you think that is required by the exigencies of the service?

Mr. HULL. I simply stated what they say to me. I think they ought to have the additional rank. The House bill gave a higher rank than the Senate. The committee believed that where you want the increase is in the rank. The pay between a captain and a colonel is not very large, but it makes a big difference in the rank as to the character of men you get.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will you permit me to say a word or two further?

Mr. HULL. I will.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand a similar bill will be brought in with reference to the Commissary-General's Department.

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I had a conversation the other day with the Commissary-General, who has served a long time on the Pacific coast, on whose experience and capacity I place much reliance. He told me, in talking of the Commissary Department, that his department consisted, if I recollect right, of 23 officers in time of peace, but he said that in time of war the force was reduced to less than 15; that those were all regular officers, and 5 or 7 of the officers in his department had been assigned to staff duty in various corps and divisions and given increased volunteer rank.

That was carrying out the very suggestion made by the gentleman from Utah, taking the officers graduated from West Point, regular officers, assigning them to duty in the volunteer corps and giving them increased rank and increased pay, and thus reducing the actual number of men employed in the regular Commissary Department here at the time when there was need for an increased force. He told me that a number of officers in his department had been desirous of securing these volunteer appointments with increased pay, and he had been obliged to write them personal letters urging them to remain in the department; that they were familiar with their work, engaged in the purchasing of large supplies, involving large amounts of money, and he wished them to remain and he would in a recommendation to Congress request that a certain number, seven or eight, should be given increased rank, not greater than a colonel or less than a major. It seems to me that this applies also to the Quartermaster's Department and that the amendment should carry.

Mr. HULL. All you say is an argument in favor of keeping the men in the position in which they are at present, and the way to keep them and save the Government money and transact the business of the Government properly is to give them the corresponding rank that they ought to have in these times.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] has offered an amendment to the Senate bill.

Mr. HULL. I have.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the Senate bill already reported by the Clerk.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman should offer the bill which he has in his hand not as a House bill, but as a substitute for the Senate bill; and if he desires to offer it, he should offer it with the amendment already in it.

Mr. HULL. Very well; let it go. I think the bill is all right now. I call for a vote on the Senate bill.

The question being taken, the bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Speaker, in order that, if the Senate does not agree to our amendment, we may have a conference at a very early date, I move that the House request a conference with the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. HULL, Mr. MARSH, and Mr. SULZER as conferees on the part of the House.

SUBSISTENCE DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY.

Mr. HULL. There is on the Speaker's table a Senate bill in regard to the Subsistence Department. The Committee on Military Affairs this morning instructed me to ask to take up that bill and to move a substitute agreed upon by the committee. Will that be in order?

The SPEAKER. When the bill is before the House the gentleman can offer any substitute which may be germane.

Mr. HULL. Then I call up the bill (S. 4810) to increase the efficiency of the Subsistence Department of the Army.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That during the existing war, and for not exceeding one year thereafter, each commissary of subsistence who may be assigned to the duty of purchasing and shipping subsistence supplies at important depots, and the two commissaries of subsistence who may be assigned as assistants to the Commissary-General of Subsistence, and the commissary on the staff of the Commanding General of the Army shall, while so acting, have the rank next above that held by him and not above the rank of colonel. And the President may nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may appoint twenty assistant commissaries of subsistence of volunteers, with the rank of captain, to be discharged within one year after the close of the war.

Mr. HULL. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GRIFFIN] that he may offer a substitute.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That during the existence of the present war, and for one year thereafter, every commissary of subsistence, of whatever rank, who shall be assigned to the duty of purchasing and shipping of subsistence supplies at important depots, shall have the rank of colonel, but the number so assigned shall only be such as may be found necessary, not exceeding 12; also that the 2 commissaries of subsistence, who may be detailed as assistants to the Commissary-General of Subsistence, shall have the rank of colonel: Provided, That when any such officer is relieved from said duty his temporary rank, pay, and emoluments shall cease, and he shall return to his lineal rank in the Department.

"SEC. 2. That there is hereby authorized to be added to the Subsistence Department in the volunteer service during the present war, and not to exceed one year thereafter, 8 majors and 12 captains for the discharge of such subsistence duties as may be assigned to them by the Secretary of War."

Mr. HULL. This substitute covers exactly the point which the Commissary-General made before the committee this morning.

The amendment of Mr. GRIFFIN was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GRIFFIN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. HULL. I move that the House request a conference with the Senate on the amendment to this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. HULL, Mr. GRIFFIN, and Mr. COX as conferees on the part of the House.

ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HULL. I call up the bill (H. R. 10561) to increase the force of the Ordnance Department.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of chapter 458 of Statutes at Large shall be amended to read as follows:

"The Ordnance Department shall consist of 1 Chief of Ordnance, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier-general; 4 colonels, 5 lieutenant-colonels, 12 majors, 21 captains, 20 first lieutenants; and all vacancies which may hereafter exist in the grade of first lieutenant in said department shall be filled by transfer from the line of the Army: Provided, That no appointment or promotion in said department shall hereafter be made until the officer or person so appointed or promoted shall have passed a satisfactory examination before a board of ordnance officers senior to himself."

Mr. HAY. Does not this bill increase this department of the Army, not only during the continuance of the war, but for all time?

Mr. HULL. The bill increases the number of officers in the Ordnance Corps permanently by the addition of twelve.

Mr. KING. What is the necessity of this increase unless you increase the standing army permanently?

Mr. HULL. The necessity is this: The staff corps was fixed in 1876, if I remember correctly, at its present size. Since that time we have built arsenals; we have gone into the coast defense, and we have more than quadrupled the labor of this department in time of peace. At the present time the evidence is overwhelming that it is impossible for the Ordnance Department to anywhere near transact the business devolving upon it. The work is behind in every line.

Mr. LACEY. What is the strength of the Ordnance Department now?

Mr. HULL. Fifty-four officers.

Mr. LACEY. And this increases the corps to what number?

Mr. HULL. To 66—an increase of 12.

Mr. HAY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "consist," in line 5, insert "during the present war."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia will not be adopted. This is the only corps of the Army selected from the line officers by competitive examination. It requires the ablest men and the very best talent that men can give to this branch of the service. They go before a board of officers and pass the examination, and, if successful, are appointed to this corps.

The twelve men asked for are absolutely necessary in time of peace for the proper execution of the work assigned to them, and more especially are needed in time of war. Their work has been more than doubled, even in time of peace, and the increase is absolutely necessary, of course, in time of war. The work of that department has been growing rapidly, and the force is not sufficient to discharge it.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. KING. If this Government takes charge of a number of colonial possessions, and the standing army for that purpose is necessarily increased, as it would have to be after the present war, in that event would it not be necessary, if the contention of my friend from Iowa is true, to extend the number proposed here over and above the twelve which the bill carries, and will not additional legislation for that purpose be required?

Mr. HULL. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to go into the future and speculate as to what may be the consequences. I am only taking matters as they now present themselves to the committee after careful investigation. This force is necessary and should be provided.

Mr. KING (continuing). But if it would be necessary in the future, why not defer the permanent legislation until the termination of the present war and accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. HULL. I want to say this to the gentleman, and I will give him one case as an illustration. Near my own State, at the Rock Island Arsenal, they are to-day shipping an average of ten carloads of materials to the front, every carload of which must be inspected by an officer of the Ordnance Department; and with four inspectors only to look after the work, see that the work is properly done, and see that the shipments are properly made, the packing properly done, and all the necessary care taken of material of this character, the superintendent furnishes the information that these men are required to work at least an average of twenty hours a day and that then they can not keep up with the work.

As another illustration, an officer of this department was detailed to inspect the supplies and ordnance stores at different places, and it would be utterly impossible for him, if he spent all of his time in the work, to attend to more than half of it.

Now, this is higgling over a very small matter. It is crippling the efficiency of the Army at a time when the very best efforts ought to be put forward to strengthen and sustain it.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I understand that this additional force is needed whether there should be any increase made for war purposes or not?

Mr. HULL. Undoubtedly; they are absolutely needed now.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I utterly deny the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa that anybody in supporting or offering any amendment here is crippling the Army, or the officials of the Army. I say that every man on this side of the House is ready to vote, and has been ready to vote, for any increase in the Army, in any or all of its various branches, that may be necessary during this present war, and for providing everything that is needed to carry on the war to a successful conclusion.

But this is not a temporary increase. It is a permanent increase of one of the bureaus of the War Department and not an increase to be made for a particular purpose under the emergencies that now exist.

Now, if there be a permanent increase, why should it apply to this department rather than to the Quartermaster's or Commissary Department? There is no reason whatever for it. None has been given by the gentleman; and evidently, under the circumstances, there should be only a temporary increase, as there has been in the other departments of the Army.

When the war is over, when the conditions have been changed, when we can properly take into consideration what is necessary for the Army upon a peace basis for the future, we can consider such measures. But it is not right to single out one department and put it ahead of the others in such a manner as this. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HANDY) there were—ayes 24, noes 69.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ENGINEER CORPS, UNITED STATES ARMY.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the Senate bill (S. 4713) for present consideration in lieu of the bill (H. R. 10460) relative to the Corps of Engineers in the Army. It is the same bill and relates to this branch of the Army.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Corps of Engineers of the Army shall hereafter consist of 1 Chief of Engineers, with the rank of brigadier-general, 7 colonels, 14 lieutenant-colonels, 28 majors, 35 captains, 30 first lieutenants, 12 second lieutenants, and the battalion of engineers: Provided, That the vacancies created by this act in all grades above second lieutenant shall be filled by the promotion by seniority of the officers now in the Corps of Engineers; And provided further, That the number of officers in any grade above second lieutenant shall not be increased beyond the number heretofore established by law by the promotion of any officer to fill an original vacancy created by this act until such officer shall have served at least three years in the grade from which he is promoted and the captains and lieutenants shall have satisfactorily passed the examinations required by existing laws.

Mr. HAY. Is that bill one that provides for this increase during the present war only?

Mr. HULL. No; it makes a permanent increase in the Engineer Department of sixteen officers.

Mr. HAY. Then I move to insert, after the proper words in the bill, the words "during the war."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "consist," in line 4, insert the words "during the present war."

Mr. HULL. Only a single word, Mr. Speaker, with reference to the amendment.

The Engineer Department for many years have been knocking at the doors of Congress for an increase in their force, which is absolutely necessary by reason of the work which has been imposed upon them with reference to river and harbor improvements. This work has been thrown upon their shoulders by acts of Congress, and it is impossible to discharge the duties unless they have the increase which is proposed by the bill. In addition to this, our elaborate system of coast defenses is under their supervision.

That is all I desire to say.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that this just goes to show what I have said before, that these permanent increases in the Army are made under stress of the present emergency, because there is a war. If there had been no war, everybody on this floor knows that these bills would not have been brought in here, and could not have been passed if they had been. Advantage is being taken of the existence of the war in order that they shall be passed.

As I said before, I am willing to vote for any bill which has for its object the meeting of the present emergency, but I do not believe in adding to the present standing army any officers or men to serve after this war is over. If it be necessary that there shall be a larger standing army than the one we have, after the war is over, it will be time then, when men's minds are cool and when their understandings can be appealed to in a cool manner, to determine the question. I think this bill ought to be voted down.

Mr. HULL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

[Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. HULL. I want to say to my friend from Missouri that he has made a speech on a subject that is not before the House at all. This bill increases one certain staff department of the Army. That is true—the Engineer Corps. But, Mr. Speaker, every man who is put in the Engineer Corps comes from the highest graduates of West Point; and if they are not put on the Engineer Corps they are put in some other part of the Army as graduates from West Point. They may be unassigned second lieutenants, having no place to put them. This simply takes a number of highest graduates from West Point and increases the Engineer Corps by eighteen. It does not add a man to the Army; it does not interfere with the volunteers; it does not interfere with the militia or any part of the Government, except making more efficient the Army of the United States by including in the corps men of the highest intelligence and education for the discharge of the duties that Congress has put upon it.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand, the Engineer Corps has charge under the law, first, in time of peace, and war also, of the rivers and harbors and armament?

Mr. HULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Now, it has also charge of the coast fortifications and the emplacements?

Mr. HULL. It has charge of all those matters. It has charge of the building of light-houses, the river and harbor improvements, and the fortifications.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I will inform the gentleman, so as to show the necessity for these men, that seventeen have been asked for in Puget Sound in the northwest Pacific. That will give an idea of the somewhat important necessity for them.

Mr. HULL. I will say further that for the last two or three years I have thought it would have been good policy for the Government to take all the river and harbor improvements away from the Corps of Engineers, and you would not have had any increase; but I will say further that to have secured men of the same ability and of the same fidelity that you get out of a captain of engineers would have cost three times the pay of the captain, if you obtained the same service from civil life.

Mr. SULZER. Ten times.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Is it not a fact that there has been no increase in the Engineer Corps since July 28, 1866?

Mr. HULL. That is true.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. It is but a transfer from one service to another.

Mr. HAY. And a permanent increase in the whole Army.

Mr. HULL. The bill permits the appointment of a certain number of men, and fills up with second lieutenants. It takes them from one line of the Army and puts them in another.

Mr. HAY. It increases the Army.

Mr. HULL. It does not increase the Army one.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. The gentleman from Virginia is mistaken in his idea as to what is the object and status of the bill. The bill does not increase the Army. It merely takes those who go to West Point and qualify for the Army and details them to a special line of the service.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, in answer to that, I will say that in the last two or three years it would not have increased the Army at all, before war was declared, because we had as many as sixty second lieutenants who were unassigned. There was no place for them in the line of the Army; but although they were unassigned, we paid them just the same as if they were assigned. At this time we increase the number temporarily of the officers in the reorganization bill, because at this time we are having more officers in the Regular Army, and there are more places for first and second lieutenants than we have officers.

Mr. HAY. Has there not been authorized an organization of 3,500 engineers?

Mr. HULL. Those are volunteer troops entirely. I will say that there are only three officers of the Regular Army with each regiment, and they do not necessarily come out of the Corps of Engineers, only three officers of the Regular Army that can serve with one regiment.

Mr. HAY. But you are making a point that this is an emergency measure of this war to increase the Corps of Engineers.

Mr. HULL. The 3,500 engineers have nothing to do with the Engineer Corps.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL].

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentlemen who have dealt with this proposition to increase the force of the Army seem to forget all about the manner in which the engineer officers now in the Army are assigned to that position. When a class of cadets at West Point, consisting of 50 or 60 members, graduates, two or three or more who stand highest in the class are assigned to the Engineer Corps, the next highest are assigned to the ordnance or artillery, the next to the cavalry, and the lowest to the infantry.

Now, this bill provides that the present number of engineer officers—that is, 109, the number fixed in the act of 1866—may be increased by assigning to that corps more men at the head of the class of the graduates of West Point than are now taken. There will be no more graduates each year, but they will be divided up among the different corps in a different manner. It will only mean that instead of two or three at the head of the class being put in the Engineer Corps, there will be five or six or seven, according as the emergency exists and the service demands and as vacancies exist in the Engineer Corps.

Gentlemen forget the immense amount of work that is done by the Engineer Corps in time of peace and overlook the fact that it is in times of peace that you need these officers more than in times of war. In the first place, they have the fortification work to look after. It is going to require three or four years, with all the rush work that is now going on, to complete these fortifications according to the Endicott plan. In addition to that, they have the construction of lighthouses along the coast. They also have the river and harbor work, which every year is put into the hands of the Engineer Corps. I want to say to the gentlemen who are declaiming against the increase of the Army that I have no doubt they will continue to come before the House asking for improvements in the rivers and harbors in their districts which will require the supervision of one of these engineers. I call attention of the House to a report made by Brigadier-General Wilson, Chief of Engineers, as to the increase of work that has taken place in the last thirty years. He says:

As indicative of the great increase of the duties of the Corps of Engineers without any increase in its members, it will be noted that the annual appropriations expended under the direction of officers of the Corps of Engineers between 1864 and 1870 averaged about four and one quarter millions, from 1880 to 1889 about nine and three-quarters millions, and between 1890 and 1897 this average had increased to about twenty millions. The number of separate works provided for in 1880 was about thirty-four, which number had increased in 1896 to over five hundred.

The annual report of the Chief of Engineers in 1870 covered 680 pages, which in 1880 had increased to 2,536, in 1890 to 3,718, and in 1897 to 4,225 pages; thus while the space required to record the work of the Corps of Engineers has increased sevenfold the number of officers has remained the same. This has necessitated an immense increase in the area of, and amount of work in, the individual districts and in their number, and the assignment to the charge of many of such districts of officers most competent on account of experience and professional training, but with rank far below that which is commensurate with great engineering and financial responsibility connected with the positions occupied. One of the just effects of the proposed act would be, by the slight increase of the number in each grade, to give to a greater extent than now permissible to the officers in charge of districts rank more nearly commensurate with their experience and professional training and with the responsibility attached to the works of their districts.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this does not provide for any increase in the Regular Army, in view of the fact that for thirty years there has been no increase in this corps, and in view of the fact that year after year all these great public works that are being put into the hands of the engineer officers are growing, and it is a matter that every one of us in our districts where the great improvements are being made is interested in, it seems to me that this bill ought to pass.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BROMWELL. Yes.

Mr. KING. As I understand the gentleman, while it does not in the aggregate increase the number of officers, it permits the advancement of persons who may be second lieutenants to captains, thus practically throwing an increase of burden on the Government. Why is not the man as a second lieutenant just as capable of performing engineer work as he will be if he is made a captain?

Mr. BROMWELL. These men are all in the Engineer Corps, and I will say to the gentleman from Utah that after they have graduated from West Point all these engineer officers are assigned to a three-years' course of instruction at Willets Point to especially prepare them for the work they are to be called on to do. Then as they go along they are assigned from time to time to more important work. The second lieutenants are given less important work under the supervision of their superior officers. This gives a greater number of these officers for this less important work, and it will give an opportunity for others who would otherwise have to go into the artillery and into the cavalry to take this engineer course.

Mr. DOCKERY. What increase does the bill carry?

Mr. BROMWELL. An increase of eighteen along the entire line. It provides that there shall be no promotions unless an officer has served three years in the grade from which he is to be promoted.

Mr. HULL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. HANDY].

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to the absurdity of urging this bill as a war measure. The Engineer Corps of the Army is largely devoted to the arts of peace. The young gentlemen who enter the Engineer Corps, after graduating from West Point, take charge of the improvements of our rivers and harbors and our light-houses and all that. As has been stated on the floor, the most brilliant of the graduates of West Point are chosen for the Engineer Corps, and from that time on they devote themselves to duties which are substantially peaceful and civil. Now, we find ourselves in a war, and the Military Committee brings in a proposition to abstract from the fighting force eighteen more of our most brilliant young officers and put them at the works of peace.

They bring in such a measure and ask that we pass it in the name of patriotism and for the sake of supporting the country in the hour of its peril.

Instead of providing now that this corps should be enlarged, the present would be a proper time to reduce this corps. Now would be the time to take these men away from the affairs of peace; now would be the time to recall them from their work on rivers and harbors and send them into the line of battle to fight for their country. When the war is over, when peace comes again, when we can apply ourselves anew to the improvement of our commercial facilities, when we need these men once more to deepen our rivers and harbors, then we may properly enlarge our Engineer Corps and send our brilliant young officers to complete engineering projects.

Mr. Speaker, this is not intended in the least as a war measure. How can it be? This bill proposes to provide a long-needed increase in our force of engineers to carry on the operations of peace. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] takes advantage of this opportunity, because we all want to strengthen the Government in time of war, to bring in this proposition for an increase of a corps which we need in times of peace and for peaceful operations. It is of a piece with much that has been going on here under the pretense of getting ready to fight. Under the pretense of strengthening the hands of our soldiers in the field we are doing things with another purpose in view.

And I call attention to this situation: While the gentleman brings this bill in here as a needed war measure, yet when he comes to debate it, the uses and purposes disclosed in favor of the bill are not the uses and purposes of war. They are not the purposes of fighting the enemy. They are the general purposes of improving our rivers and harbors and taking care of our light-houses. I should prefer that during this war all our brightest military men, all of our brainiest and most brilliant young officers, should go forth into the fight to win there their country's reward and the promotion which would naturally come from such services in the field. If I understand their desires, that is also what those officers themselves would prefer.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. HAY was rejected.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

INSPECTOR-GENERAL'S DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HULL. I call up the bill (H. R. 10424) to provide for a temporary increase in the Inspector-General's Department of the Army.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint one inspector-general with the rank of colonel, one inspector-general with the rank of lieutenant colonel, and one inspector-general with the rank of major; Provided, That the vacancies created in the grade of colonel and lieutenant colonel by this act shall be filled by the promotion of officers now in the Inspector-General's Department according to seniority, and that upon the mustering out of the volunteer forces and the reduction of the Regular Army to a peace basis no appointments shall be made in the Inspector-General's Department until the number of officers in each grade in that Department shall be reduced to the number now authorized by law.

Mr. LACEY. I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Military Committee to a defect in section 10 of the act of April 25 last. I find that a House resolution (No. 270) to remedy this defect has been introduced by the gentleman and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I ask the gentleman to yield so that I may offer the body of that joint resolution as an amendment to this bill, so as to correct the defect. The original bill as to corps rank provided for giving the rank of colonel to the adjutant-general, the inspector-general, and various officers of a corps commander's staff.

Members of the House will perhaps recollect that when that bill was under consideration I moved to substitute the rank of lieutenant colonel for that of colonel, which amendment the House rejected. The Senate, however, amended the bill in that way. But in the preparation of that bill one officer was overlooked—the chief of the signal corps. Under the legislation as it stands he alone will have the rank of major, whilst all his associates on the staff, who are not doing any more important duty, will have the rank of lieutenant colonel. I propose to offer as an amendment to this bill the provisions of House resolution No. 270, introduced by the chairman of the Military Committee.

Mr. HULL. I am willing to yield that the gentleman may offer the amendment. The committee has not yet passed upon that proposition.

Mr. LACEY. Let the amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as section 2 the following:
"That so much of section 10 of the act of Congress approved April 25, 1898, as provides that the staff of the general commanding an army corps shall consist of certain officers, with the rank of lieutenant colonel, shall be held to include among such officers a chief signal officer."

Mr. HANDY. I make the point of order that this amendment is not germane to the bill.

Mr. LACEY. It seems to me the point is not well taken. This bill is a proposition to amend temporarily the law in regard to the Volunteer Army. It amends the law in relation to the staff. This is another part—

The SPEAKER. The original bill relates solely to the Inspector-General's Department.

Mr. HANDY. And the amendment relates to an officer of the Signal Corps.

Mr. LACEY. It is an amendment as to the staff of the Army; and the Inspector-General is upon the corps staff. Now, this is a proposition not to increase the staff corps of the Army, but to make the rank uniform throughout; and the gentleman, I understand, introduces a resolution that creates a new condition of things, practically a grade of officers really of the same grade of service, but of different rank.

Mr. SULZER. How many officers does this provide for?

Mr. LACEY. One for each corps. They have one now, a major; and this is to give him the rank of lieutenant colonel for performing precisely the same duties.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that this is a bill to increase the corps of the Inspector-General of the Army during the war. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] offers an amendment to increase the rank of certain signal officers who belong to another and different corps. Certainly one is not germane to the other; and hence I have made the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order is good, and sustains it.

The question was taken on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, which was ordered; and being read the third time, the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PAY AND ALLOWANCES OF CHAPLAINS OF VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I now call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 10835) to fix the pay and allowances of chaplains of volunteers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all chaplains in the volunteer service shall have the pay and allowances of a captain mounted.

Mr. McCLELLAN. If the gentleman from Iowa in charge of this bill will permit me, I desire to submit an inquiry to him.

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Post chaplains in the Regular Army, having the rank of captains, not mounted, have heretofore been paid the sum of $1,500 a year, as I understand it?

Mr. HULL. That is correct.

Mr. McCLELLAN. And this makes the pay of such chaplains $2,000 a year, or an increase of $500?

Mr. HULL. That is correct. But the gentleman will remember that there are conditions which make one of these appointments very different from the other. The post chaplain is usually located in such position that he has a house furnished free and can buy what he wants at low figures, and supply himself, in other words, without unnecessary cost. A chaplain of the volunteers, however, goes with the regiment wherever the regiment may be, on the field of battle, if necessary, and it may be that he will be sent, as in the present war, away from the country. Therefore, a very different condition of affairs is presented.

This bill gives him the rank and allowances of a captain mounted. That is to say, it increases his pay from $1,500 a year, under the present law, to $2,000 a year. And, Mr. Speaker, I think a man who goes into the field, if he is any account at all as a chaplain, and renders efficient services for the Government, looking after the sick, and for the moral and physical welfare of the troops, writing letters home for the boys, and performing duty in various other ways as chaplain which he is compelled to perform, is worth $500 a year more than the man who remains at the post and is enabled to live comparatively at his ease.

Mr. McCLELLAN. What is the pay of the chaplains of the four colored regiments?

A MEMBER. They receive more pay than chaplains at the post. Mr. HAY (interrupting). Is the gentleman from New York going to make his first attack on these military bills on the chaplains?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Not at all. I have supported all of the bills, and am simply seeking information from the chairman of the committee in reference to this one.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the troops have been ordered to the front from many of the posts and have left behind them the chaplain, I would like to ask what duty he is expected or required to perform in that event?

Mr. HULL. It is presumable that the chaplain has followed the troops which have been sent to the front.

A MEMBER. If he is mounted.

Mr. HULL. A chaplain of the Regular Army is not a mounted officer at all. Now, our chaplains out at Fort Alger, where I got my first inspiration with reference to the matter, have no allowance for forage. They have to pay for it. The result is that instead of having the rank and pay that captains had during the civil war, they are infinitely worse off. I do not think the bill gives more than they ought to have in this regard.

Mr. STEELE. I am not objecting to the amount given to the chaplains in the field or when they are ordered away with the troops. But does the gentleman think they ought to have just as much when they stay at home or at the forts and look after the comfort of the families of the officers?

Mr. HULL. I have no objection to any provision which would except from the operation of such a law those chaplains who are not called into the field or who are not there of their own selection. But my impression is that such a proposition would not hit many men—

Mr. STEELE. Well, if it hits one, it is a good thing. [Laughter.] I offer an amendment that chaplains in the field, serving with troops, shall have the pay of mounted officers, as the bill provides.

A MEMBER. I understand this is only for temporary service?

Mr. DOCKERY. Not at all. It is a permanent proposition. We do not want to blend the two propositions.

Mr. STEELE. As there seems to be an impression that the chaplains are preaching to the families of officers, and will not need to go to the field, I withdraw the amendment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SIGNAL OFFICERS ON STAFFS OF CORPS COMMANDERS.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, at the request of members on both sides, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution relative to the signal officers on the staffs of corps commanders. It has not been reported from the committee, and I have no right to call it up.

Mr. KING. Have the members of the committee seen it and considered it?

Mr. HAY. What is the resolution? I should like to hear it read.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman from Iowa offered it as an amendment to the Inspector-General's bill.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is asked for the present consideration of a resolution which will be reported by the Clerk.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That so much of section 10 of the act of Congress approved April 25, 1898, as provides that the staff of the general commanding an army corps shall consist of certain officers, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, shall be held to include among such officers a chief signal officer.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

Mr. HULL. I believe that is equivalent to an objection.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

PAY OF VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

Mr. HULL. I call up the bill H. R. 10805, reported from the committee this morning with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress approved May 26, 1898, entitled "An act providing for the payment and maintenance of volunteers during the interval between their enrollment and muster into the United States service, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That the pay and allowance of such of the volunteers as are received into the service of the United States under the act of Congress approved April 22, 1898, and the acts supplemental thereto, shall be deemed to commence from the day on which they had their name enrolled for service in the Volunteer Army of the United States and joined for duty therein after having been called for by the governor on the authority of the President: Provided, That troops about to embark for service in the Philippine Islands may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be paid one month's wages in advance prior to embarkation."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, the Clerk has read the bill as it will be amended. The bill was introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], and its object was to put the word "company" in with the words "battalion" and "regimental," so that companies would receive pay from the day of their enrollment. His idea was that they should have pay from the time of their rendezvous at company headquarters. The Judge-Advocate-General's Department was in consultation with the committee, and agreed, with some of us at least, that putting the word "company" in it might carry pay for many weeks or even months before they were called out. Neither the gentleman from Missouri nor any member of the committee desired that. So we struck out all that referring to company, battalion, regimental, and State rendezvous.

The SPEAKER. Has this bill been reported?

Mr. HULL. It has been reported, but it was reported as it will be as amended, instead of as it was originally offered.

Mr. DOCKERY. The Clerk read the bill with the amendment. I should like to have the original bill read and then the amendment read separately.

Mr. HULL. I will say, before the Clerk reads it, that the bill we passed, and which is now the law, is exactly as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] introduced this, with the exception that the one word "company" was inserted.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is the only change.

Mr. HAY. I did not so understand. I thought that the original bill was added to by the gentleman who was before the committee at the time, and that he made an entire change in three or four parts of the bill.

Mr. HULL. I am talking about the bill as it was originally introduced. The bill as introduced by the gentleman from Missouri made no change in the law that we had already passed, except the insertion of the word "company."

Mr. HAY. Oh, I understand.

Mr. HULL. And the bill as reported by the committee strikes out all in reference to battalion and company rendezvous and inserts the words just read.

Mr. DOCKERY. I have examined the amendment very carefully, and while one or two gentlemen have some doubts about it, my own judgment is that the amendment of the committee makes the section clearer than the original bill. I will say to the House that the object of the bill is to place all the volunteer troops on exactly the same footing as to pay. The law now provides that they shall be paid from the time of their enrollment at the battalion or regimental rendezvous. The effect is to discriminate unwittingly against companies raised in the small towns.

In other words, the law now operates to discriminate in favor of companies raised in cities where there is a battalion or regimental rendezvous, as against companies raised in small towns.

To illustrate: Two regiments from Missouri were paid from the 16th day of May. Two other regiments that entered the service at the same time were, under the law, paid from the 27th of April, obviously an unfair discrimination. Of course Congress had no such purpose in view. This amendment is simply intended to equalize the pay, so that all soldiers shall receive their pay from the time they report for enrollment under the order of the governor, and after a call by the President.

Mr. BRUCKER. As the law now stands, was there any distinction made between regimental officers and privates as to the time when their pay should commence?

Mr. DOCKERY. Oh, no.

Mr. BRUCKER. I ask the question for the reason that I was informed by some regimental officers of Michigan troops, for instance the Thirty-third and Thirty-fourth Michigan, that the pay of the regimental officers did not commence at the same time as the pay of the privates.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then there is faulty administration somewhere. I think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] will bear me out in the statement that that would be an erroneous construction of the existing law.

Mr. STEELE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question. I understand that the States have been paying the militia organizations up to the time they were mustered into the service of the United States, and some of the States have been paying a great deal more compensation to their soldiers than they get in the Regular Army.

Mr. SULZER. That is correct.

Mr. STEELE. New York, for instance, gives $1.50 a day, while in this service they get 60 cents. So that your proposition would be against rather than for them in the case of New York.

Mr. DOCKERY. I will say that question is not raised by my proposition.

Mr. MARSH. And New York will be around here in due time to collect that money from the United States Government.

Mr. STEELE. I am glad to have a prophet among us.

Mr. DOCKERY. I will say to my friend from Indiana that that issue is not raised by this amendment.

Mr. STEELE. They are going to get what the State gives them and what the Government gives them also.

Mr. DOCKERY. This amendment simply seeks to pay the volunteer soldier from the time of enrollment in the company under the order of the governor.

Mr. BRUCKER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa whether or not, under the existing law, there is any distinction made between regimental officers and privates as to the time when their pay commences?

Mr. HULL. I think not. The bill we passed some weeks ago provided that the pay should commence when the battalion or regiment was ordered to the battalion or regimental rendezvous. That is the law as it is. It places officers and privates on the same footing.

Mr. BRUCKER. I know, as a matter of fact, a distinction has been made, and that as to the privates of the Thirty-third and Thirty-fourth Michigan their pay commenced at one time and the pay of the regimental officers commenced at a time much subsequent.

Mr. SULZER. That is the fault of somebody in Michigan. They are to be paid by the United States Government.

Mr. HULL. You are talking about the State.

Mr. BRUCKER. No.

Mr. SULZER. It is a mistake as far as the Government of the United States is concerned. If there is an error, it is somewhere in the State of Michigan.

Mr. COX. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question.

Mr. DOCKERY. Very well.

Mr. COX. In this bill, as I understand, we are assuming that the company is organized in one of your counties. We are trying to put the bill into practical operation. Now, that company is called out by authority of the governor, and he gets his authority from the President of the United States. These men are enrolled. They are put upon the list. Now, then, as I understand this bill, it simply means that they shall be paid from the time the governor gave the order calling them out, if the United States has accepted them.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is a correct statement.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 14 and 15 strike out the words "joined for duty and are enrolled at the company, battalion, regimental, or State rendezvous" and insert in lieu thereof the words "had their names enrolled for service in the Volunteer Army of the United States and joined for duty therein, after having been called for by the governor on the authority of the President."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question, because I do not understand it yet. Does this give pay to the members of the regiment in those States that do not pay their volunteers anything from the time they agree to volunteer?

Mr. HULL. Oh, no, sir; it pays them from the time they volunteer and report for duty on the call of the governor, authorized by the President of the United States.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, there are States which pay the men from the time they volunteer up to the time they are mustered into the service of the United States, our State paying them $1.25 a day, but some other State pays them nothing. Now, it is proposed to pay them, where the State is doing nothing to pay its soldiers, from the time they first volunteered until they are mustered into the service.

Mr. HULL. I think the law we passed for the pay of soldiers settled that matter. The governors of the various States could not fix the pay. They did not know at what amount it would be fixed. We have fixed the pay that is to be paid by the Government, and if the pay of the soldiers paid by a State was greater than that which is paid by the Government, there would be no validity in any claim that the State would make for the difference in the pay after the amount of the pay had been fixed by Congress.

It was originally battalion or regimental rendezvous, and it was suggested at the time to put in the word "company," as it might go on for weeks and months before they were ordered for duty and joined for duty. The committee did not believe it right to pay companies from date of enrollment before a call is issued. This makes it apply to the squad or an individual who has joined for duty and to every member who is an enlisted soldier with his company in waiting until he gets to the State camp. But he must join for duty after called upon by the governor of his State. To pay from date of enrollment might mean pay for months before a call is issued and while the man is attending to his ordinary duties in civil life. He is paid at the same rate that the United States pays the volunteers, without any reference to what the State pays, and the State has no honest demand upon the Federal Government for a penny more. To let the States pay this would make the pay of a soldier vary with the different States from nothing up to $2 a day.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the volunteers from my State, before they were mustered into the service of the United States, get their proportion of this pay from the United States in addition to their pay from the State?

Mr. HAY. If they rendezvoused at camp, they would.

Mr. HANDY. They would get both pays.

Mr. PAYNE. That would be all the better for the boys, but I think the State of New York should be reimbursed.

Mr. HULL. It simply equalizes the little difference between the city regiment and the country regiment. The States have no business to pay the men after they volunteer. There are several States where the State paid nothing.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to print in the RECORD a letter from the Paymaster-General approving this bill. Beyond that I do not care to say anything further.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the letter presented by the gentleman from Missouri will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The letter is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, PAYMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, June 25, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the proposed amendment to the act of May 26, 1898. In my opinion there appears no just or sufficient reason why a company, recruited from adjacent towns, should not receive pay from the date of enrollment as a company at the company rendezvous.

The men are withdrawn from their avocations and render themselves up to the control of the officers selected to command them for the time, and should, in my opinion, be recognized as entitled to pay from that time without waiting until summoned to some other rendezvous to be incorporated in a battalion or regiment.

Very respectfully,

T. H. STANTON,

Paymaster-General United States Army.

Hon. ALEX. M. DOCKERY, M. C.,
Ebbitt House, Washington, D. C.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MILITARY STOREKEEPER IN THE QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, by instruction of the committee I now call up the bill (S. 3277) to authorize the appointment of a military storekeeper in the Army, and I call it up in lieu of the House bill on the same subject.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint a military storekeeper in the Quartermaster's Department of the Army; and all laws inconsistent herewith are hereby suspended for the purposes of this act only.

Mr. HAY. Is this a war measure? Is it necessary to have it passed to carry on the war?

Mr. HULL. No; I think the war would go on without it.

Mr. HANDY. Is it a sutler's bill?

Mr. KING. When does it expire?

Mr. HULL. When the man dies.

Mr. KING. It does not expire at the end of the war?

Mr. HULL. No. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the House that the President of the United States would like to have the grade revived, and I will say to the House in all frankness that it will not add anything to the expense of the Government, provided the gentleman who receives the appointment continues to be able to discharge the duties he has been discharging.

Mr. SIMPSON. Has the gentleman already been selected?

Mr. HULL. Yes. I am willing to meet the matter frankly which these questions are seeking to draw out. The gentleman who will be appointed, in all human probability, will be Major Loeffler. He is a gentleman who served under Lee before the civil war, and was in the Utah expedition, served all through the civil war in the Regular Army, was with General Grant when he was elected President of the United States, and so commended himself to General Grant that, at Grant's own request, he was taken out of the Army and put on duty at the White House, and he has stayed there from that day to this; and every man who has had business at the White House for the last thirty years knows that no more efficient man has ever been in the discharge of any public trust.

I want to say further that his salary is exactly the same as this salary will be, but the time may come when he will be unable to discharge the duties, and it allows him to have this grade and this rank and is the testimony of Congress and the President of the United States to an efficient officer who has served his country for more than forty years.

Mr. SIMPSON. It has the effect to put him on the retired list?

Mr. HULL. When he can not perform the duties.

Mr. HANDY. Can not he go on the retired list without this bill?

Mr. HULL. He is not an officer of the Regular Army.

Mr. STEELE. He was a good soldier and is a very efficient man.

Mr. HANDY. This is in the nature of a civil pension.

Mr. HULL. You may call it what you please.

Mr. LOVE. Will he draw the pay for the position which he now holds in addition to this one provided for in this bill?

Mr. HULL. No; he will draw but one pay, and it makes no increase of pay at all.

Mr. HANDY. Would the gentleman from Iowa object to telling the House what will be his duties in this position provided for in this bill?

Mr. SULZER. The same duties that he is attending to now.

Mr. COX. I ask the chairman of the committee to yield me three or four minutes?

Mr. HULL. I will, of course.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, what is the present proposition?

Mr. KING. To give a man a position.

Mr. COX. I will do my own answering, if the gentleman pleases.

[Laughter.]

Mr. KING. Very good, if the gentleman will answer correctly.

Mr. COX. I will.

The gentleman for whom this bill proposes to provide a place is no doubt a good soldier and a good officer. Nobody can say anything against him. But we are proposing to create a place for him—I can not call it an office. We propose to give him the rank of military storekeeper. What is he going to do? What will be his duties?

Mr. SIMPSON. We are giving a man a job.

Mr. COX. Of course; we are giving a man a job. It is solemnly proposed in this Congress to put this man into a job.

Mr. SULZER. He has a job now.

Mr. COX. Do you propose to provide jobs for all the good soldiers?

A MEMBER. Yes.

Mr. COX. You do? Then bring in a general bill for that purpose, so that we may all understand it. Now, here is a proposition to do what? To create a new position and to name the man who is to fill that position, to pay him a salary, and in due time retire him. Yet there is not a man on the other side of the House who can tell what duties this officer is going to perform. Where are we to stop with these "Army emergency" bills? I do not want to say a word against this man. I have no objection to him personally. I do not know anything about him. I assume he is all right. But, if you are going to introduce here as "war bills" all sorts of propositions to provide places for worthy gentlemen, then let us have a general bill and put them all in.

Mr. HANDY. Will the gentleman from Iowa permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. HANDY. Is there anything in this bill that provides what shall be the salary attached to this position, or what shall be the rank of this officer in the Army, or what shall be the duties performed by him?

Mr. HULL. The bill provides that he shall have the rank of a military storekeeper. That rank is well known, and also the salary.

A MEMBER. How much?

Mr. HULL. One thousand eight hundred dollars a year. The rank is that of a captain not mounted.

Mr. HANDY. Do we have these storekeepers now in the Army?

Mr. HULL. No; the office has been abolished. This bill revives it for this particular case.

Mr. SULZER. This is a good bill and ought to pass.

Mr. HANDY. It strikes me that it is a bad bill, setting a bad precedent, and one which ought not under any circumstances to pass.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is this one of the bills that the Secretary of War so earnestly urged the gentleman from Iowa to present to the House?

Mr. HANDY. This is one of the bills that the Democratic minority is so unpatriotic as not to be in favor of.

Mr. HULL. I will say to the gentleman from Delaware that a very large number of good Democrats, and men who are recognized as leaders on that side of the House, have urged me to take up this bill. There is no party politics in it. It is not a bill in behalf of this man as a Republican or a Democrat. I do not know whether the man who will get this place is a Democrat or Republican, and I do not care. I have not called this a war measure, and no one in authority has claimed that for it. It is a just measure.

Mr. HANDY. The gentleman will excuse me. My remark was not intended for his ear, but for our friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. KING. I want to ask my friend from Iowa, in good faith, who will perform the duties this man is now performing?

Mr. HULL. He will perform them himself. I have the liberty to say that he has letters from all the Presidents under whom he has served, from Grant down, recommending him in the highest terms for continuance in that place or for any other place that he might desire. The two ex-Presidents now living and the present occupant of the White House all say that this bill is simply an act of ordinary justice to a faithful public officer.

Mr. RIDGELY. We are all in favor of the bill. Let us vote.

Mr. KING. We are not all in favor of it.

Mr. HANDY. I think the gentleman from Iowa had better withdraw this bill unless there is a quorum present.

Mr. DALZELL. No; let us have a vote.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Would it not be as well for the gentleman from Delaware to ask that the bill considered here for one of his relatives should be withdrawn?

Mr. DALZELL. What bill is that?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Providing for General Breckenridge. Now let us vote for some of these other bills.

Mr. HANDY. I do not know of any such bill as that the gentleman refers to.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Has not the gentleman from Delaware, in and out of season, presented reasons and arguments to the chairman of the committee for the presentation and passage of that bill?

Mr. HANDY. The gentleman from Ohio is surely aware of the fact that the gentleman to whom he has referred has no advantage personally and no promotion of any character because of the passage of that bill. It will not increase any salary attaching to his office nor give him any rank whatever if it shall become a law. He has no interest in it whatever, save as the head of the Inspector-General's Department; and the bill simply gives additional men to do the work imposed upon him as the Inspector-General of the Army.

The gentleman from Ohio can not therefore accuse me of selfishness, or a wrongful desire to advance a relative of mine by any legislation here.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Would it not have been as well if the gentleman from Delaware had failed to make reference to a gentleman who has taken no part whatever in the discussion of the measures before the House?

Mr. HANDY. When the gentleman from Ohio says on the floor of the House that I am an advocate of any bill which proposes to benefit any relative of mine, I will meet him.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman's anxiety with reference to the bill marked it in my estimation.

Mr. HANDY. I have reasons that the gentleman from Ohio may perhaps not be aware of.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HULL. If no other gentleman desires to discuss the bill under consideration, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the Chair was in doubt.

On a division (demanded by Mr. HULL) there were—ayes 64, noes 41.

Mr. HANDY. I raise the point, Mr. Speaker, that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SULZER. Oh, no; do not make that point.

Mr. HANDY. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Delaware makes the point of no quorum, and the Chair will determine the matter.

Mr. HULL (pending the count by the Speaker). I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, before that I move to reconsider the vote by which the House passed the bill H. R. No. 10424—

The SPEAKER. But a question of quorum is still pending—

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER (continuing). And the gentleman from Iowa moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I give notice, then, that I shall submit a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill H. R. 10424 was passed.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 59 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

free-delivery system in all of the cities of the United States to a number not exceeding four deliveries per day—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. OSBORNE: Resolutions adopted by the Brotherhoods of Locomotive Engineers, Firemen, and Trainmen, and Orders of Railway Conductors and Telegraphers, in favor of the passage of the anti-scalping bill—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 29, 1898.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. GALLINGER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FRYE. I present the petition of Governor Powers, of Maine, and a large number of other very distinguished citizens of the United States, addressed to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, asking for legislation to provide for arbitration, the arbitrators to be the highest courts of the various countries. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Henry Howerter and sundry other citizens of the United States, representing the Brotherhoods of Locomotive Engineers, Firemen, Conductors, and Telegraphers, praying for the passage of the so-called anti-scalping ticket bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PASCO presented a petition of the Democratic county convention of Hamilton County, Fla., praying for the imposition of an import duty on long-staple cotton; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally with amendments, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 4382) granting an increase of pension to Eliza M. Miller; and

A bill (H. R. 10316) for the relief of Georgie Smiley.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 4383) granting an increase of pension to William B. Murray;

A bill (H. R. 4200) granting an increase of pension to Ellen Stack; and

A bill (H. R. 7293) granting a pension to Della E. Spaulding.

FRANK H. NEWCOMB AND DANIEL B. HODGSDON.

Mr. FRYE. I report favorably from the Committee on Commerce Senate joint resolution 178, a joint resolution to carry out the recommendations of the President of the United States touching certain officers of the Revenue-Cutter Service, and I am instructed by that committee to ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. 178) recognizing the gallantry of Frank H. Newcomb, commanding the revenue cutter Hudson; of his officers and men; also retiring Capt. Daniel B. Hodgson, of the Revenue-Cutter Service, for efficient and meritorious services in command of the cutter Hugh McCulloch at Manila.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress be, and are hereby, extended to First Lieut. Frank H. Newcomb, of the Revenue-Cutter Service, commanding the revenue cutter Hudson, his officers and the men of his command, for their intrepid and heroic gallantry in the action at Cardenas, Cuba, on the 11th day of May, 1898, when the Hudson rescued the U. S. naval torpedo boat Winslow, in the face of a most galling fire from the enemy's guns, the Winslow being disabled, her captain wounded, her only other officer and half her crew killed. The commander of the Hudson kept his vessel in the very center of the hottest fire of the action, although in constant danger of going ashore on account of the shallow water, until finally he got a line made fast to the Winslow and towed that vessel out of range of the enemy's guns; that, in commemoration of this signal act of heroism, First Lieut. Frank H. Newcomb, Revenue-Cutter Service, be given a gold medal of honor, each of his officers a silver medal, and each member of his crew a bronze medal, of such appropriate design as may be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

That in recognition of the efficient and meritorious services of Capt. Daniel B. Hodgson, United States Revenue-Cutter Service, while in command of the U. S. revenue cutter Hugh McCulloch, under the orders and in cooperation with the fleet commanded by Rear-Admiral George Dewey, United States Navy, at the battle of Manila, on May 1, 1898, and said officer being now in the sixty-third year of his age, and having served continuously for thirty-seven years as an officer of the Revenue-Cutter Service, he be placed on the permanent waiting orders or retired list of the Revenue-Cutter Service, on the duty pay of his grade.

That the sum of $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the medals above specified.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE. I ask unanimous consent that the accompanying communications relating to this matter may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communications were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U. S. S. McCulloch, Manila Bay, May 3, 1898.

SIR: Regarding the part taken by this vessel in the naval action of Manila Bay, at Cavite, on Sunday morning, May 1, 1898, I have the honor to submit the following report:

Constituting the leading vessel of the reserve squadron, the McCulloch was, when fire opened, advanced as closely as was advisable in rear of our engaged men-of-war—in fact, to a point where several shells struck close aboard and others passed overhead—and kept steaming slowly to and fro ready to render any aid in her power to respond at once to any signal from the Olympia.

A 9-inch hawser was gotten up and run aft should assistance be necessary in case any of our ships grounded. At a later hour during the day, just prior to the renewal of the attack by our squadron, I intercepted the British mail steamer Emeralda, in compliance with a signal from our flagship, communicated to her commander your orders in regard to his movements and thence proceeded to resume my former position of the morning, near the fleet, where I remained until the surrender of the enemy. I desire to state in conclusion that I was ably seconded by the officers and crew of my command in every effort made to be in a state of readiness to carry out promptly any order which might have been signaled from your flagship.

Respectfully, yours,

DANIEL B. HODGSDON,

Captain, Revenue-Cutter Service, Commanding.

Commodore GEORGE DEWEY, U. S. N.,
Commanding United States Naval Force on Asiatic Squadron.

U. S. S. HUDSON (2), Key West, Fla., May 13, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report of the participation by this vessel in the engagement with the Spanish forces at Cardenas on the 11th instant:

At 11.30 a. m., while off the main entrance to Cardenas Bay, the Hudson was ordered by the senior officer present to accompany the U. S. S. Wilmington and the U. S. torpedo boat Winslow inside. All three vessels started immediately, and, after some preliminary soundings to determine the best water, passed through Blanco Channel into the bay and headed for Cardenas.

About 1 p. m., when abreast of Corogal Point, the Hudson was ordered by the commanding officer of the U. S. S. Wilmington to "go out and look at small craft." Steamed over toward Diana Cay and skirted the western shore of the bay. Discovered no vessels and observing that the Wilmington and Winslow were nearing Cardenas, at 1.35 p. m. steamed toward them at full speed. At 1.45, when a little over a mile distant from our vessels, saw firing commence from the shore, which was immediately returned by our ships. At 1.50, when within range of the shore guns, the Hudson opened fire upon them with her two 6-pounders. Observing that the Winslow was quite inshore and exposed to the full strength of the enemy's guns, ran up alongside of the Wilmington, and asked if we should go to her (Winslow) assistance. Received the answer "Yes," and immediately steamed into the immediate vicinity of the Winslow, keeping up a constant and rapid fire from the Hudson's battery upon the enemy's guns on shore.

At 2.30, commanding officer Winslow reported his vessel totally disabled and requested to be towed out of range. Owing to the shoal water and the rapid drift toward shore of the Winslow (the wind was on shore), it was fully thirty minutes before the Hudson succeeded in making a line fast from the Winslow and starting ahead with her. The enemy kept up a constant fire during this time, which appeared to be especially directed toward the Winslow, which was returned at every opportunity by the Winslow and Hudson. The Winslow was towed alongside the Wilmington, from which vessel a boat was sent with a medical officer, who transferred the dead and wounded from the Winslow to the Wilmington. Finally, at about 3.30 p. m., all three vessels steamed out of the bay, the Winslow in tow of the Hudson. At about dark joined the U. S. S. Maclachlan outside, where the Winslow was anchored.

At 9.15 p. m. the Hudson started for Key West with dispatches for the senior officer commanding that station and carrying the dead and wounded from the Winslow. Reported to the senior officer commanding at Key West at 7.10 on the morning of the 12th instant. The only damage resulting to the Hudson during the engagement were a few slight marks from small projectiles upon two of the foreroom ventilators and a few bullet marks upon the outside of the pilot house plating. One hundred and thirty-five shells were fired from the two 6-pounders during the action.

Respectfully, yours,

FRANK H. NEWCOMB,

First Lieutenant, R. C. S., Commanding.

Hon. SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,

Washington, D. C.

(Through senior officer commanding naval station, Key West, Fla.)

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, June 15, 1898.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 9th instant, and to forward herewith a copy of the report requested. I regret that inadvertently a copy of this letter was not forwarded to you immediately after it was received.

The rescue of the Winslow by the Hudson was so gallantly done, in the face of a most galling fire, that First Lieut. Frank H. Newcomb, Revenue-Cutter Service, commanding, his officers and men, deserve the warmest commendation. The Winslow was riddled with shell, disabled, helplessly drifting onto the beach into the hands of the enemy, her captain wounded, her only other officer and half of her crew killed, but the Hudson courageously remained by her in the very center of the hottest fire of the action, although in constant danger of going ashore on account of the shallow water, until finally a line was made fast to the Winslow and that vessel towed out of range of the enemy's guns.

Very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG,

Secretary.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

U. S. STEAMER HUDSON, Key West, Fla., June 16, 1898.

SIR: For the better information of the Department, I have the honor to submit the following supplementary report containing certain facts relating to the part taken by this vessel in the late engagement at Cardenas on the 11th ultimo, which were omitted in the hasty preparation of my report of the 31st ultimo.

The injuries sustained by the Hudson from the enemy's projectiles were as follows: The hull was struck in two places below the guards on the starboard side, and two places on the port side, one below the guards, and the other on the after filling piece between the guards, evidently by a piece of a large projectile, as it left quite a deep dent in the hard wood. No damage resulted from the other places struck, beyond knocking off the paint and scaling the iron at the points of contact.

The rudder on the port side, where it joins the stock, was struck once, with similar results. The forward foreroom ventilator on the starboard side, above the upper deck, was struck four times, one only resulting in a perforation three-fourths of an inch in diameter. The after ventilator on the same side was struck once and perforated, the hole being about one-half of an inch in diameter.

The after end of the pilot house was spattered with numerous small pieces of lead, each of which was buried out of sight in the wood. The light joiner work of the cabin was shaken and shattered more or less by the fire of the after 6-pounder, while windows, lamp shades, and other fragile articles were smashed.

During the action 135 rounds were fired from the two 6-pounder guns. The Colt automatic gun on the upper deck was not used, its fire being reserved for short range in case the vessel became disabled and drifted near the shore.

Second Lieut. W. H. Scott was in charge of the after 6-pounder and Third Lieut. E. E. Mead of the forward one. The coolness and intrepidity manifested by these gentlemen in handling their respective gun crews and taking advantage of every favorable opportunity to get in an effective shot at the enemy, and their efforts under the most trying circumstances to run lines to the disabled Winslow, are deserving of the highest commendation.

The professional skill and promptness displayed by Mr. N. E. Cutchin, the engineer (first assistant) in charge, in responding to the constant and exciting demands upon the machinery in maneuvering the vessel, merit unstinted praise. Not the slightest hitch or delay of any kind occurred in the workings of his department, and the successful issue of the day's operations was undoubtedly due in a great measure to his efforts and those of the men under him.

Whenever the services of Second Asst. Engineer T. D. Lewton could be spared from the engine and fire rooms he cheerfully repaired to the pilot house, where his aid in locating the other vessels and the direction of the enemy's guns in the midst of the dense smoke from the Hudson's guns which at times prevailed was of the utmost assistance.

Each and every member of the crew, from the boatswain down to Moses Jones, the colored boy, who attached himself to the after gun and never failed to have a shell ready when it was needed, did his whole duty, cheerfully and without the least hesitation. This appears the more remarkable in view of the fact that none of them had ever been under fire before, and that the guns were without protection or shelter of any kind. They deserve the most substantial recognition in the power of the Government for their heroic services upon this occasion.

I take pleasure in testifying to the remarkable bravery displayed by Lieutenant Bernadon and the men of the Winslow, and consider it as one of the greatest privileges of my life to have been an eye witness of their conduct at a time when many men would have felt justified in abandoning all hope. With such officers and such men the American nation may well be proud of its Navy.

Respectfully, yours,

FRANK H. NEWCOMB,

First Lieutenant, Revenue-Cutter Service, Commanding.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,

Washington, D. C.

SINKING OF THE MERRIMAC.

Mr. HALE. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report a joint resolution, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. 179) tendering the thanks of Congress to Assistant Naval Constructor Richmond Pearson Hobson and to the volunteer crew of the Merrimac, and authorizing the transfer of Assistant Naval Constructor Hobson from the Construction Corps to the line of the United States Navy, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress are due, and are hereby tendered, to Assistant Naval Constructor Richmond Pearson Hobson, and to the volunteer crew of the collier Merrimac, for extraordinary heroism displayed by them in running the Merrimac into the mouth of the harbor of Santiago, Cuba, on the 3d instant, and dexterously sinking said vessel in the channel; and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to bestow upon Assistant Naval Constructor Hobson and the men of said crew bronze medals of honor of suitable design.

SEC. 2. That in further recognition of this signal act of gallantry on the part of Assistant Naval Constructor Hobson, the President is hereby authorized to transfer that officer from the Construction Corps to the line of the United States Navy, and to promote him to such position therein as, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, he may determine.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like to say something in regard to Mr. Hobson before the joint resolution just passed goes from the consideration of the Senate.

It is true that when a commander of a large army wins a great battle under circumstances that call for special honor to him, all we do, and all we can do, is to thank him and the officers and soldiers under his command, without naming them. But it seems to me that where a deed of special heroism has been done, for which all the persons who took part in it volunteered, which was not in the ordinary course of military duty, and there were but seven in all, all undergoing the same risk, all suffering the same severity of consequences, the names of the whole seven should be mentioned specifically in the joint resolution as well as the name of Hobson himself.

This is one of the great marks of honor which this world has to give. It is the greatest single mark of honor which this world has to give. A hundred years, five hundred years, hence the descendants of these seven men will read and know that their ancestors performed this deed and received this mark of the gratitude of the country with a pride which no ducal coronet or strawberry leaf of earl or marquis can inspire.

I hope the Senator who reported the joint resolution will let it be reconsidered and permit the other seven men to be named by name.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I fully agree with the views expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts, and having in view the same object, I have procured from the Secretary of the Navy the names of the men who were on board the Merrimac when she was sunk in the harbor of Santiago de Cuba. I therefore ask that the names be read. They can at least be placed in the RECORD.

Mr. HALE. This matter can be very easily reached. The President of the United States, who is presumed to be keenly alive to the proprieties of such an occasion, in sending his message in followed the precedents in such cases, and did not name these gallant men, doing as is commonly done, mentioning the commanding officer, with a reference to the brave men. I sent to the Navy Department and asked the Secretary to frame a bill that would be proper and in accordance with the precedents, and he, like the President, being presumed to be alive to the fitness of what should be done, inclosed to me the joint resolution which I reported this morning.

I do not feel that anybody has lacked in the case because the case for these men has not been presented in the elegant way the Senator from Massachusetts has presented it. I presume all of us realize as he does the services that they rendered.

I will move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed, and then if the Senator from California desires to amend by substituting the names he may do so, because I shall not oppose that amendment. I only say that the joint resolution was offered after the fashion which has always obtained in such cases. I do not remember that the names of the parties who were with Cushing in his exploit in blowing up the Albatross, although very few, were put in. But I do not object to the names being put in now if any Senator desires.

Mr. SPOONER. They ought to have been named, because they are now almost forgotten. I suppose there is not a member of this body who could name one of them.

Mr. HALE. We have the information.

Mr. SPOONER. I know you have.

Mr. HALE. The information comes from the Navy Department. I move to reconsider the votes by which the joint resolution was ordered to a third reading and passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Now, being in charge of the joint resolution, I move to insert the names of the individuals as reported from the Navy Department.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask to have the names read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the names. The Secretary read as follows:

Daniel Montague, chief master at arms on the New York.
George Charrette, gunner's mate, first class, on the New York.
J. E. Murphy, coxswain on the Iowa.
Osborne Deignan, coxswain on the Merrimac.
George F. Phillips, machinist, first class, on Merrimac.
Francis Kelly, water tender of the Merrimac.
Randolph Clausen, coxswain on the New York.

Mr. HALE. Now let the Secretary read the names as an amendment to the joint resolution.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President—

Mr. HALE. Let the Secretary read the language of the resolution, so that I may indicate where the amendment comes in.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the thanks of Congress are due, and are hereby tendered, to Assistant Naval Constructor Richmond Pearson Hobson and to the volunteer crew of the collier Merrimac—

Mr. HALE. After the words "and to" put in the names, and then follow by the description, "the volunteer crew," etc.

Mr. SEWELL. I wish to ask if it is the intention to give the thanks of Congress individually to men in the Navy?

Mr. HALE. That is what is proposed.

Mr. SEWELL. It is a new principle.

Mr. HALE. It is entirely a new principle.

Mr. SEWELL. It was never done in the history of the country before, and it is something that will trouble us in the future. There are plenty of acts of gallantry in the Army and Navy. After that principle has been established here I think it will be looked upon as a precedent and will probably trouble us in the future. But I shall not make any point.

Mr. HALE. I expect this Chamber will be filled with applications before we get through.

Mr. WHITE. If that is the case, there will be no disaster.

Mr. HOAR. Let me say one word. I should like to be troubled, I am sure, in exactly this way, and I should like to see this Chamber filled with the names of this class of heroes. This is not the case of persons taken into action under the ordinary laws of war by their superiors. It is a case of seven men volunteering for their death, and every one of them has the same title to personal gratitude and personal honor as the man who commanded them. That is the distinction. I do not think those cases will occur so as to trouble us.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President—

Mr. SEWELL. Will the Senator from Maine allow me?

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SEWELL. Mr. President, I have some anxiety on this subject, because I do not like to make precedents of this kind without some discussion and some deliberation. I do not want to be carried away with an enthusiastic desire to reward everybody on the same basis. No one has a higher regard for heroism than I have, but I have a higher regard for the rank and file and the men who compose the Army and Navy. They are all heroes. There are no cowards amongst the American Army and Navy. There is no desperate undertaking where a commanding officer will call for men but that they will step to the front one hundred for one that is required.

We have not heretofore been honoring these men in this way. We have given those serving as enlisted men promotion; we have given them pay; we have given them medals of honor; but we never before have given to anybody but a commissioned officer the thanks of Congress. In these days you find regiments and crews made up of every class of society. The darling of the parlor, the athlete at Yale, Harvard, or Princeton, are lined to-day on the picket line before Santiago with the farmer and the mechanic, each equal, each claiming no more right as an American citizen, and each anxious and eager for the fray.

It is the most sublime spectacle, I say to the Senate of the United States, that ever has been witnessed that our very best blood, our brightest young men, claim the right of citizenship to the extent that they go to the front line of battle and vie with anybody and everybody, no matter from what rank of society. They claim no exemptions. Hundreds of them are serving in the ranks who have asked for no commissions; but they take their rifles in their hands and their hundred rounds of ammunition and say, "Give us a lift to the front."

I am sorry, however, that the joint resolution is to take the shape which has been proposed. I think the precedents of a hundred years ought not to be broken without some consideration.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I am sorry to see the Senator from New Jersey take such an antiquated view of this case. It was said of the Duke of Wellington in his Peninsular campaign that no matter what act of heroism a private or a noncommissioned officer in the English army might have performed, his name was never mentioned in the dispatches, because it was considered unmilitary and unwarlike.

Mr. President, we do not want any such doctrine established in this country. The idea that it is a sacrilege to mention the name of a private soldier or a sailor who commits an act of heroism and have his name go down to posterity along with his officer's is something hostile and inimical to the spirit and genius of American institutions. I think at this date no man ought to advocate any such idea. There are as big heroes in the ranks as there are wearing shoulder straps, and it is our duty to hand their names down to posterity.

Every one of these seven sailors, just as much as in the case of Lieutenant Hobson, took his life in his hand. Every one of them felt that he was going to certain death. To stand up here and say that we have no right to hand the names of those heroes down to posterity is something that I trust will never be heard again before the American people.

Mr. HALE. Now let the amendment be read. I do not think any Senator will object.

The SECRETARY. Insert after the word "to," in line 3 of the joint resolution:

Daniel Montague, chief master at arms on the New York.
George Charrette, gunner's mate, first-class, on the New York.
J. E. Murphy, coxswain on the Iowa.
Osborne Deignan, coxswain on the Merrimac.
George F. Phillips, machinist, first-class, on Merrimac.
Francis Kelly, water tender of the Merrimac.
Randolph Clausen, coxswain on the New York.

Mr. HALE. What is the description following?

The SECRETARY. Then would follow a comma and the words:

The volunteer crew of the collier Merrimac, for extraordinary heroism displayed by them in running the Merrimac into the mouth of Santiago, Cuba, on the 3d instant.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HALE. That is the list sent by the Navy Department in response to a request from the Naval Committee to furnish these names, and I have no doubt it is accurate. I hope that as amended the joint resolution will be passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the amendment?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President—

Mr. HALE. The Senator from California will not object?

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to occupy but one minute. The reason why I presented these names to the Senate to be incorporated in the joint resolution is because if it is establishing a precedent it is one that each one of us may well venerate. I would not detract one iota from the heroism of Lieutenant Hobson, who stood upon the bridge of that ship and directed her course into the harbor, but whether he won or fell he was there making a name for himself which shall endure in the annals of history alongside that of Paul Jones, Decatur, and Farragut.

But 20 feet below him in the hold of that ship there were a stoker shoveling coal into the furnace and an engineer with his hand upon the throttle valve; inclosed in an iron casket, in dense darkness, relieved only by the glare of the furnace fires, stood these brave men furnishing the motive power to the vessel. Without the assistance of those two men that ship could never have been conducted into the harbor of Santiago. There was nothing to tell them what was transpiring on the decks above them, while they did know the steamer was passing among sunken torpedoes, with shells from the forts flying around them, which, if struck, would send them into eternity without any possible chance to escape to the surface of the water where they could swim for their lives.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator have any doubt that if Lieutenant Hobson himself could vote upon this question he would desire to have these names embodied in the joint resolution?

Mr. PERKINS. I believe he would desire to have it done. I believe, hero as he is, he would do justice to those who were co-operating with him in that gallant deed.

I fully subscribe to the sentiment of the Senator from New Jersey that there are heroes in the ranks, that there are heroes in the fire room. The way for us to recognize their heroism is by this little tribute, this testimonial, in mentioning their names in this roll of honor. I would rather have my name mentioned there than to possess all the wealth of the richest man in this city. Therefore I say it is a precedent we can well afford to establish. I hope before the end of the war the Senator from New Jersey will stand alongside of me with his votes and cast them for the 400 who volunteered to go on the Merrimac if an opportunity is presented where they may distinguish themselves as did Lieutenant Hobson and the gallant men who were with him on the Merrimac.

Mr. HALE. Now, let the amendment be agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Shall the joint resolution be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time?

Mr. PETTUS. I have never heard the joint resolution read in connection with the amendment. I should like to hear it all read.

Mr. HALE. Let the entire joint resolution be read.

Mr. MILLS. Let it be read as amended.

The Secretary read the joint resolution as amended, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress are due, and are hereby tendered, to Asst. Naval Constructor Richmond Pearson Hobson, and to Daniel Montague, chief master at arms, on the New York; George Charette, gunner's mate, first class, on the New York; J. E. Murphy, coxswain on the Iowa; Osborne Deignan, coxswain on the Merrimac; George F. Phillips, machinist, first class, on Merrimac; Francis Kelly, water tender of the Merrimac; Randolph Clausen, coxswain on the New York, the volunteer crew of the collier Merrimac, for extraordinary heroism displayed by them in running the Merrimac into the mouth of the harbor of Santiago, Cuba, on the 3d instant, and dexterously sinking said vessel in the channel; and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to bestow upon Assistant Naval Constructor Hobson and the men of said crew bronze medals of honor of suitable design.

SEC. 2. That in further recognition of this signal act of gallantry on the part of Assistant Naval Constructor Hobson, the President is hereby authorized to transfer that officer from the Construction Corps to the line of the United States Navy, and to promote him to such position therein as, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, he may determine.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine if it is customary in cases of this kind to send to the beneficiaries a copy of the resolutions adopted.

Mr. HALE. The Department, without the direction of Congress, does that invariably at once.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4715) relative to the Corps of Engineers of the Army.

The message also announced that the House had passed with amendments the bill (S. 4809) to increase the efficiency of the Quartermaster's Department of the Army; asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HULL, Mr. MARSH, and Mr. SULZER managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed with an amendment the bill (S. 4810) to increase the efficiency of the Subsistence Department of the Army; asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HULL, Mr. GRIFFIN, and Mr. COX managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 10424) to provide for a temporary increase in the Inspector-General's Department of the Army;

A bill (H. R. 10561) to increase the force of the Ordnance Department;

A bill (H. R. 10685) fixing pay and allowances of chaplains for volunteer regiments; and

A bill (H. R. 10805) to amend an act relating to pay of volunteer soldiers.

The message further announced that the House insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6890) making appropriations for current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes, agrees to the further conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. CURTIS of Kansas, and Mr. LITTLE managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House further insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 13, 14, 186, 222, and 223 to the bill (H. R. 8428) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes; agrees to the further conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CANNON, Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE, and Mr. SAYERS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4936) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims, under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act, and for other purposes; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MAHON, Mr. OTJEN, and Mr. RICHARDSON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Senate to resume the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10691) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. There are several matters which have come in since the bill was framed. I move to insert, on page 4, after line 22:

Reimbursement of the German Trade and Plantation Company, of Hamburg, at Apia, Samoa: To reimburse the German Trade and Plantation Company of Hamburg, in Apia, Samoa, for losses sustained by them from the payment of certain drafts illegally drawn on the Secretary of State by William Churchill, late consul-general at Apia, Samoa, and purporting to be on business of the United States Government, aggregating $1,800.00, with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent per annum to the date of payment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 7, line 7, I move to strike out "$1,332.69" and insert "$1,564.74;" so as to read:

To pay amounts found due by the accounting officers of the Treasury on account of the appropriation "Contingent expenses, Treasury Department: Freight, telegrams, etc.," $1,564.74.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 16, line 12, I move to strike out all of the clause after the words "in force" in the following words: "to remain available during the fiscal year 1899;" so as to make the clause read:

Prevention of epidemics: To enable the President of the United States, in case of threatened or actual epidemic of cholera, yellow fever, smallpox, bubonic plague or Chinese plague, or black death, to aid State and local boards, or otherwise, in his discretion, in preventing and suppressing the spread of the same; and in such emergency, in the execution of any quarantine laws which may be then in force, $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. All these amendments are estimates that have come in from the Department since the bill was framed. On page 23, after line 4, I move to insert:

Engraving and printing: For labor and expenses of engraving and printing: For salaries of all necessary clerks and employees other than plate printers and plate printers' assistants, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, $10,000.

For wages of plate printers, at piece rates to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, not to exceed the rates usually paid for such work, including the wages of printers' assistants at $1.25 a day each, when employed, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, $10,000.

For engravers', printers', and other materials, except distinctive paper, and for miscellaneous expenses, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 24, after line 2, I move to insert:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to pay the East Side Construction Company, of Toledo, Ohio, on account of their contract, dated January 21, 1890, for the pile foundations for two beacons, the sum of $1,521.41 from the appropriation of $20,000 made by the sundry civil act for 1890, for Maumee Range Light Station, Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 31 reference to an additional document is to be inserted. In line 10, after the words "two hundred and ninety-nine," I move to insert the words "and three hundred and nineteen;" and in lines 11 and 12 I move to strike out "$7,159.40" and insert "$3,711.20;" so as to read:

Judgments: For the payment of judgments, including costs, against the District of Columbia, set forth on page 7, House Document No. 319, and in House Document No. 460, and in Senate Document No. 229 and 319, of this session, $3,711.20, together with a further sum to pay the interest on said judgments, as provided by law, from the date the same became due until date of payment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 32, after line 17, I move to insert:

Industrial Home School: For amount required for sewerage for new building, to continue available during the fiscal year 1890, $1,610.50.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Now, going back to page 2, after line 7, I move to insert:

To make the salaries of the Second and Third Assistant Secretaries of State $4,500 each for the fiscal year 1890, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 36, after line 3, I move to insert:

Payment to owners of canal boat W. H. Smith: That the supervisor of the harbor of New York is authorized to pay to the Whitehead Brothers Company, of the city of New York, the sum of $228 for damages to the canal boat W. H. Smith, owned by the said company, which said canal boat was injured in collision with the U. S. steam tug Argus, May 29, 1890, said collision being without fault on the part of said company or any of its employees; the said amount to be paid from any funds appropriated for the prevention of obstructing and injurious deposits within the harbor and adjacent waters of New York City.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 38, after line 25, I move to insert:

Marion Branch, at Marion, Ind.: For transportation, namely: For transportation of members of the Home, fiscal year 1890, not to exceed $125.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move to strike out line 26 at the bottom of page 38, down to and including line 9, on page 39, in the following words:

That the jurisdiction over the places purchased for the location of any of the Branches of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers is hereby ceded to the respective States in which said Branches are located, and relinquished by the United States; and the United States shall claim or exercise no jurisdiction over said places after the passage of this act: Provided, That nothing contained herein shall be construed to impair the powers and rights heretofore conferred upon the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers in and over said places.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 40, after line 16, I move to insert:

Improvement of Pearl Harbor: For purchase, by condemnation or otherwise, of not less than 800 acres of land, at not exceeding $50 per acre, in Pearl Harbor, Hawaiian Islands, for a coaling and repair station, $40,000, and for dredging the bar in said harbor, to secure a channel of not less than 30 feet in depth, $105,000; in all, $145,000.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator object to my asking him a question about this amendment?

Mr. HALE. I am always pleased to hear the Senator's pertinent question.

Mr. SPOONER. I will not be impertinent, I can assure the Senator. Let the amendment be read again.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. HALE. I will listen to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. What struck me about the amendment was the peculiarity of it. I presume in all probability Hawaii is to become a part of the United States, but it is not a part of the United States now, and the question which I wanted to ask the Senator was upon what theory, in advance of the acquisition of Hawaii by the United States, are we to pass acts providing for condemning land beyond the jurisdiction of this country?

Mr. HALE. This is a matter which has been investigated by the Department. In a full report, which I have in my hand, statements are given showing that this is a desirable place. In framing the amendment I thought it desirable that it shall not be left to condemnation, and if Hawaii is not annexed that the Government may have the opportunity to purchase at private sale, if it can do so, at a reasonable rate, to be approved by the Hawaiian Government, this valuable and important part of the harbor of Honolulu.

Mr. SPOONER. Would it not be better legislation for the Senator to make his amendment hypothetical and provide for the condemnation if Hawaii should be annexed?

Mr. HAWLEY. If it should be practicable.

Mr. SPOONER. If it shall be practicable, or if it shall become a part of the United States.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to the alternative, of course. As the Senator will see, it really does cover that; but I have no objection to the insertion, after "condemnation," of the words "if the same be practicable." Those words may be inserted.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not object to that. As the amendment now stands it is simply ridiculous.

Mr. FAULKNER. I suggest to the Senator from Maine whether it would not be better simply to make an appropriation of $40,000 for the acquisition of the land.

Mr. SPOONER. No; that would not answer.

Mr. FAULKNER. Why not?

Mr. SPOONER. For this reason: You can not compel anybody to sell. It is a mere matter of contract.

Mr. FAULKNER. Of course you can not, but if you give—

Mr. SPOONER. Let me finish, please. If the United States acquires Hawaii and desires for governmental purposes certain land which the owner is not willing to sell, there must be authority in the officer to condemn it.

Mr. FAULKNER. But if it could be procured by private contract, there would then be an appropriation by which it could be obtained; and that could be done by simply making an appropriation.

Mr. HALE. I really think the matter covers the point suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin in being left in the alternative. If it can not be done by condemnation, and if Hawaii does not pass under our jurisdiction, then the Department can see if it can not purchase at this rate. The limitation has been put on because the danger is that an attempt will be made to put the price up extravagantly. I think everything the Senator has in mind is covered by the provision as it is now, although I have no objection to the insertion of the words "if the same be practicable" after "condemnation." Of course it will not be practicable if we do not annex the islands. I would not like to have the whole scheme fall, and if the Government can get by private negotiation from Hawaiian owners the 800 acres at $50 per acre, subject to the approval of the Hawaiian Government, it would be a good thing to do.

Mr. SPOONER. I agree entirely with the Senator from Maine that a mere appropriation is not adequate, because if we should annex Hawaii, and the owner of the property were unwilling to sell, the Government would be for the time being powerless.

Mr. HALE. And at his mercy.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, at his mercy; and it would be necessary that there should be authority and power for condemnation. But the point which I make is that it seems like very sloppy legislation—to use no milder expression—to provide without qualification for the condemnation of land in what at the time this bill is passed is a foreign territory beyond the jurisdiction of the United States, where, from the standpoint of to-day, we have no more right to exercise the power of condemnation than we would have to exercise it in England.

Mr. HALE. The committee thought that the words "to acquire by condemnation or otherwise" would cover the point by private negotiation and purchase; but, as I have said, I have no objection, and I think it will be a good thing, in view of what the Senator says, to insert after the word "condemnation" the words "if the same be practicable."

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to have the Senator from Maine tell us, if he has the statement there or the document there, as to whether, when Pearl Harbor was ceded to the Government of the United States by the Hawaiian Government, there were any conditions in regard to the banks of the harbor or the land or anything around it. Did they cede anything else?

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. TILLMAN. They ceded no rights?

Mr. HALE. The cession was very incomplete.

Mr. TILLMAN. Were no rights ceded along with the harbor itself?

Mr. HALE. I do not think so.

Mr. TILLMAN. Have you a copy there of the treaty ceding Pearl Harbor?

Mr. HALE. I have not.

Mr. WHITE. The Government of Hawaii could not, of course, cede any private right. There are loose ideas prevailing about these things, and many people imagine that if we annex the Hawaiian Islands we will own all the private property. Of course the Hawaiian Government could not cede away the property of its citizens if the ceded lands were in private ownership. All that was done by the treaty of cession was merely to give to us the governmental rights, such as they were. We have the right to take Pearl Harbor; but the Government of Hawaii did not cede any private property in the neighborhood, and could not have done so.

Mr. DAVIS. Wherever there was any private property no attempt was made by the treaty to make any cession of it.

Mr. HALE. I have not the language of the treaty here, but it was expected and was in view, that if anything was done accompanying the cession, then the Government of the United States would proceed to acquire private title and ownership.

Mr. TILLMAN. But did not the Government of Hawaii cede jurisdiction over whatever land might be purchased or obtained in a lawful way by this Government?

Mr. HALE. Precisely. That was all the Government could do. I almost used that word. By the treaty it ceded jurisdiction. Therefore the United States Government might come in and do what is proposed by this amendment and buy the property of the private owners.

Mr. SPOONER. Where there are private owners.

Mr. HALE. Yes; where there are private owners.

Mr. SPOONER. This was private ownership at the time the treaty or the grant was made.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The property around Pearl Harbor is all owned by private parties, and all that is suitable for this purpose is owned by an Englishman named Campbell. We were told that a portion of it could be bought for $75 an acre; but Mr. Campbell, in talking to me, said that it could not be bought for anything like that sum. He said he would want very much more for it. I do not believe that a title can be secured from him except by condemnation. He is a very bitter antiannexationist. Further than that, there is nothing in the treaty which cedes any of the shore. We simply have the right to enter and use Pearl Harbor, without an inch of its shore line. Mr. Campbell owns the fishing rights, which give him title to the entrance of the harbor; and we should have to deal with him before we could even dredge it out or do anything else. His cession was given years and years ago; and you can not dredge the harbor until you first deal with him.

Further than that, we own to-day a harbor better than Pearl Harbor ever will be. You can not enter Pearl Harbor in storms unless you build great breakwaters that will cost millions. It opens right upon the sea. We have a harbor in Kiska, in the Aleutian chain, a thousand miles nearer Manila and nearer Hong-kong than is Pearl Harbor, and that harbor is better than Pearl Harbor ever will be; and if we are going to improve any harbor, why not improve a harbor of our own? Kiska Harbor, which we own, is but 3,700 miles from Manila, while Pearl Harbor is 5,000 miles from Manila; and while all our ships can carry coal enough to go from Kiska to Manila, over half of our ships of war can not carry coal enough to go from Pearl Harbor to Manila. We will never use Pearl Harbor, as it does not command the shores of any country and is useless for naval purposes.

Mr. HALE. Let the amendment be read as modified.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Maine permit the Senator from South Dakota to answer a question which I wish to put?

Mr. HALE. The Senator has taken his seat.

Mr. TILLMAN. But he is so well posted that I should like to know from him; or if the Senator from Maine chooses, he can answer. I want to know who is responsible for that glorious treaty of cession to this Government of Pearl Harbor, by which we received that valuable sheet of water, and spent $2,000,000 since the time the reciprocity treaty was entered into? Can the Senator from Maine state that? I want to know what the situation is, and who it was that perpetrated that joke upon the American people.

Mr. HALE. The United States, of course, is responsible for it. There is enough responsibility to be distributed over several individuals. I do not know who the individuals are. I ask that the Secretary may read the amendment as it has been modified.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment as modified will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert:

Improvement of Pearl Harbor: For purchase by condemnation, if the same be practicable, or otherwise, of not less than 800 acres of land, at not exceeding $50 per acre, at Pearl Harbor, Hawaiian Islands, for a coaling and repair station, $40,000.

Mr. BACON. I suggest that there be inserted before the word "practicable" the words "should hereafter become."

Mr. HALE. Rather than take any time about it, I will accept those words, too.

Mr. BACON. Very well.

Mr. HALE. It will be just the same then as it is now.

Mr. BACON. There is a much better reason for accepting it than that statement of the Senator.

Mr. HALE. All right; let the words be inserted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. ALLEN. I think this is the proper time for the Senator from Maine to let us understand the exact character of our title to Pearl Harbor. If we are going to appropriate money to condemn adjacent property and to make proper improvements, we ought to have a perfect and complete title to the harbor. What is the character of our title?

Mr. HALE. That has been already stated, Mr. President. We have it only by the cession in that treaty. If the Senator will refer to the treaty, it will show.

Mr. ALLEN. Is that a permanent cession?

Mr. SPOONER. It is a grant. The treaty uses the word "grant," and there is no limit to its duration.

Mr. ALLEN. No limitation as to time or as to estate?

Mr. SPOONER. No limit whatever.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment as modified is before the Senate. The question is on the adoption of the amendment as modified.

Mr. LINDSAY. A book recently published by an officer in the Navy, which purports to be published by the authority of the Navy Department, as I recollect, argues that Pearl Harbor can not be defended by fortifications that do not also include the defense of the harbor at Honolulu. I will ask the Senator from Maine whether this matter has been investigated, whether this condemnation, should it become practicable, will really put us in possession of the land to enable us to erect fortifications to protect Pearl Harbor?

Mr. HALE. The last investigation tends to show that this is the best place to purchase land in the harbor. Of course the details have got to be managed by the Department. The Department, on investigation, sent us in the past full reports, to be found in Executive Document No. 394, in favor of this particular place. There is this about it that everybody understands, that unless we do appropriate the money and give the Department a chance to see and investigate Pearl Harbor, and encounter this warlike Englishman, nothing will be done. I do not know that anything will come out of it, but under the circumstances, I think it would be well for Congress to put this money in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy, so that he may see if anything can come out of it. If the Senate opposes this amendment and strikes it out and lets it all go, I think it would be wise, under present conditions, with the amendments suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], to put this money into the hands of the Secretary of the Navy, and see what he can do with it. That is all there is about it. I have no feeling about it if the Senate does not want to do it.

Mr. PASCO. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine if the appropriation which is proposed here is the first effort which has been made to improve this harbor?

Mr. HALE. No; we have made small appropriations from time to time, but it has not been considered desirable, because the matter was not so closely pressing—was not imminent—and this, perhaps, is the first real move in the direction of acquiring the land.

Mr. CAFFERY. I ask the Senator from Maine when the title to this private property surrounding Pearl Harbor was acquired? Was it at the time of the negotiation of the treaty whereby the United States acquired Pearl Harbor?

Mr. HALE. I do not know; and that is not essential. If the Secretary is given this money and goes to work, and if we annex Hawaii and proceed to condemn, or if we do not annex and we seek to buy, then the whole question as to who had the title at the time of the treaty, or who has the title now, would be looked into. I do not know about that, and I do not care how that is. The Government has got to go there.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Government should find that it was not private property at the time this grant was made and passed, there would be no condemnation.

Mr. HALE. Of course, there would be no condemnation.

Mr. SPOONER. In other words, it only gives authority to do whatever may be necessary.

Mr. HALE. It endows the Government with authority to go on and see if they can purchase this land if it is desirable.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to ask the Senator if our title to Pearl Harbor is not disputed?

Mr. HALE. I do not know whether or not it is disputed.

Mr. ALLEN. Is it not claimed upon the one hand that we have an indefeasible title, and upon the other that our title is temporary, a mere easement, which will expire with the reciprocity treaty now in existence between this Government and Hawaii?

Mr. HALE. I do not understand that the Hawaiian Government makes any contest as to the title of the United States, but I will say the title we have got is substantially nothing; it is in the air; it is floating; it is nebulous, until something more is done in the way of acquiring land and rights. It is of no account to us unless we do authorize the Government to take such steps as this amendment provides for.

Mr. ALLEN. Did not Mr. Bayard hold that our right of possession would expire with the treaty?

Mr. HALE. I have not followed Mr. Bayard's declarations with that care which would enable me to say just what he has held in regard to that matter.

Mr. ALLEN. That is my impression.

Mr. HALE. That may be.

Mr. ALLEN. He held, in the correspondence with the proper authorities of Hawaii, that our title or right of possession to Pearl Harbor would expire with the reciprocity treaty with that country.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, Mr. Bayard was very careful in the exercise of the duties of his office, and his opinions are entitled to weight; but I do not understand that really and substantially that contention is made with any force by the Hawaiian Government.

Mr. ALLEN. I take it the Senator from Maine, being chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, has complete knowledge of the character of our possessions and of our title to Pearl Harbor. Therefore I submit this observation, that it is not wise to purchase property and make improvements or to purchase interests and make improvements on property to which we have no title and where our title may be lost to us through litigation or in some other form.

Mr. HALE. The Senator may be certain if there is any question of that kind, and we do not get a good, operative, and actual title that will enable us to take possession and use and dredge and make complete that harbor, nothing will be done with this money.

Mr. ALLEN. Have any appropriations heretofore been made to improve this harbor?

Mr. HALE. Only in small amounts for the purpose of general improvements; but nothing has come of it.

Mr. ALLEN. Is the harbor capable of receiving a vessel at this time?

Mr. HALE. I do not know.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask the Senator if the water at the mouth of the harbor at Pearl reefs is to exceed 3 or 4 feet deep?

Mr. HALE. I do not know about that particular point; but this provision provides for such dredging as will make the entrance complete and passable.

Mr. ALLEN. Then the dredging that must be done, I understand, is not the ordinary dredging of dirt or sand, but the blasting of rock?

Mr. FAULKNER. It is coral.

Mr. HALE. It is for whatever dredging is necessary, whether rock or sand. There is no limitation whatever.

Mr. ALLEN. Of course to blast out rocks and remove them would be much more expensive than ordinary dredging.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. There is a small coral reef that has to be taken out. It is not rock in the sense of granite, or basalt, or anything of that kind. Then there is a quantity of sand to be removed, which has drifted in and is held there by the reef. It is not a very expensive thing to open the mouth of the harbor, but it is a very easy thing to do.

I should like to say further that there is a very good map published by the Department of Pearl Harbor, which the Senator can get if he desires, showing who owns the pieces of land that are desirable. I have seen that map. I do not know whether the committee have it or not.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator states the matter substantially as I understand it to be. The mouth of this harbor is blocked by coral reef, or by a stone formation of some kind, and that stone formation must be blasted or removed before it will be possible for an ordinary vessel to go into the harbor. The harbor proper is filled up largely with sand, that must be removed, and it will require the construction of heavy breakwaters to prevent the entrance of sand there thereafter.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, I think he will not find that the harbor itself is filled with sand, but only the mouth of the harbor, where this narrow cut is to be made. The harbor itself is capacious, with an island in the center of it, and with plenty of deep water, and in every way, if we want a good harbor, this can be made a good harbor by dredging the approaches. That is the real trouble, and that is all the trouble.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not doubt as to our ability to make a good harbor of it. I only know that I have been informed that the harbor is well filled with sand, which must be removed before vessels can get in.

Mr. TELLER. You can make a good harbor of it with a slight amount of money compared with the many harbors that we are making in this country on our own coasts. It will not cost a tenth of what it has cost to make some harbors on the Atlantic coast that we are appropriating for—not a hundredth part, as the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] suggests to me; and I think that is probably true.

Mr. SPOONER. My understanding is that the statement made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] as to Pearl Harbor is absolutely accurate in so far as the harbor itself is concerned for the purposes for which it was granted, and for all purposes to which the United States would ever wish to put it, it is beyond compare, almost, amongst the harbors of the world.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me, will he kindly repeat his statement, as my attention was diverted for a moment?

Mr. SPOONER. I was speaking of the capacity and of the character of Pearl Harbor. The question whether we own the harbor is a question of law as to which every lawyer is entitled to his opinion. Here is the grant:

His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands grants to the Government of the United States the exclusive right to enter the harbor of Pearl River, in the island of Oahu, and to establish and maintain there a coaling and repair station for the use of vessels of the United States, and to that end the United States may improve the entrance to said harbor and do all other things needful to the purpose aforesaid.

I suppose it is true that, so far as the land at the entrance of that harbor is concerned, which at the time of the grant belonged to the Hawaiian Government, the right to utilize would pass by the grant. So far as private ownership is concerned, it was beyond the power of the Government of Hawaii to grant it to the United States, and therefore the statement of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is absolutely accurate, that we might as well have a grant in the clouds, so far as practical purposes are concerned, as to have this grant of Pearl Harbor with the private ownership at the entrance, which prevents our utilization of it.

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator permit me to inquire of him whether the entrance of that harbor, being an entrance from the open sea, and connecting the harbor with the open sea, is susceptible of private ownership—whether that sort of property does not necessarily belong to the State?

Mr. SPOONER. I have not examined the laws of Hawaii on that subject. This land, I presume, might become the subject of private ownership, and I understand that it is under the laws of Hawaii, and that its private ownership was recognized at the time of its purchase by the Government, so that in order for this Government to utilize it and the harbor it must acquire either by purchase or condemnation this property; and it seems to me this proposition is not debatable.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator construe the language read to confer title?

Mr. SPOONER. I do.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator, I understand, is reading from the treaty of 1875 with the Hawaiian Government.

Mr. SPOONER. I am reading from the treaty which granted the harbor.

Mr. ALLEN. The treaty of 1875 or of 1884?

Mr. SPOONER. The treaty of 1884.

Mr. ALLEN. It is an ordinary reciprocity treaty, I understand?

Mr. SPOONER. This part of it is not an ordinary reciprocity treaty. It is an ordinary grant by a Government without limitation as to time.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit to the Senator, if he is sure—

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] is recognized as entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. There are two ways of acquiring title to property, and only two ways. The first is by gift and the second is by purchase. There is a very particular distinction between acquiring title to property and acquiring an easement over or on property. The language read by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], which is from the treaty of 1884 between the Hawaiian Islands and the United States, reads thus:

His Majesty the King of the Hawaiian Islands grants to the Government of the United States the exclusive right to enter the harbor of Pearl River, in the island of Oahu, and to establish and maintain there a coaling and repair station for the use of vessels of the United States, and to that end the United States may improve the entrance to said harbor and do all other things needful to the purpose aforesaid.

Mr. President, the language of that grant is language that grants an easement. The Government of the United States is permitted to enter the harbor for certain specific purposes. It does not give title to the harbor. If the Government of the United States ever enters into court to maintain a title to this harbor under that treaty it will be defeated.

Suppose, Mr. President, you grant me a right to drive over your premises under a contract which in its nature is revocable at the pleasure of one or both of the parties—and every treaty is revocable at the option of either party to it, unless it becomes an absolute unqualified grant or transfer of property—would any man hold under those circumstances that I would acquire a title to the soil over which the easement was granted? Not at all.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not claim that. I claim that it is a grant, without limit of time, of the exclusive right to occupy Pearl River Harbor as a coaling station and repair station for the vessels of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN. I regret, Mr. President, my inability to agree with the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. That is my misfortune.

Mr. ALLEN. No; it is my misfortune, for I recognize the great legal ability and experience of my friend from Wisconsin. But the Senator can not deny this proposition, that an ordinary treaty of reciprocity, an ordinary commercial treaty made between nations, is revocable at the option of either party to it; and everything embraced in that treaty is revocable as a consequence of the power of revocation. We may enter into a treaty with Great Britain or any other nation, saying they shall have a right, for instance, to send their vessels into New York Harbor, and we have a right to put an end to that privilege at any time we may see fit. Because we would grant them the right of easement—if that is the right expression—to enter the waters of New York Harbor, would any gentleman in this Chamber claim, under such circumstances, that we granted them a title, an irrevocable title, to New York Harbor or an irrevocable interest in it?

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. CAFFERY. Under the grant from Hawaii to the United States of Pearl Harbor there is a grant to occupy that harbor for a coaling station and repair station and to do all the works to the end of making a coaling station and a repair station valuable. That is a part of the substance of the grant.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CAFFERY. Now that the United States undertakes to improve this harbor, to establish a coaling station, a repair station, and to do other work necessary to the end of making that harbor answer the purpose of the grant, does the Senator suppose that Hawaii can revoke that grant?

Mr. ALLEN. I most certainly do, under the terms of this grant. Under this grant we have the power to do those things only that are incident to carrying out or to make effective the grant. Our right to establish coal houses—if that is the way the business is transacted—our right to purchase and use adjoining real estate, all grows out of the single fact that they are necessarily incidental to our right to enter and occupy the harbor, and whenever the Hawaiian Government withdraws its consent to that easement, whenever the Hawaiian Government says, "We will put an end to this treaty and you shall no longer enter this harbor with your war vessels or with your vessels of commerce; we will revoke this treaty," every incident that follows the treaty falls with the treaty itself, for those other rights exist as incidents of the main right, and we can have no greater right as an incident than the principal thing.

Mr. President, this language is carefully guarded. The Senate of the United States can not afford to enter upon a loose construction that will not bear careful analysis and that will not stand in court.

I do not, Mr. President, inveigh against owning Pearl Harbor and improving it. I believe it to be wise policy for the Government of the United States to get a perpetual cession of this harbor, to obtain an absolute title to it to the exclusion of the world, and then I shall be willing to vote all the money necessary and proper to provide for its improvement.

But, Mr. President, would any sensible business man erect or construct valuable buildings upon real estate to which he had no title? Would he make structural improvements worth more than the real estate itself, which would be forfeited to the real owner of the estate whenever his easement or title might be canceled? If a prudent business man could not safely do that, will the Senator from Maine insist that the Government of the United States shall pour into the improvement of Pearl Harbor millions of dollars of money, which will be lost by a cancellation of our easement to enter the harbor?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, now let us have a vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 55, after line 11, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, and agreed to, as follows:

Pensions: For fees and expenses of examining surgeons for services rendered within the fiscal year 1893, $250,000.

Mr. HALE. On page 86, after line 17, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, and agreed to, as follows:

Provided, That section 2 of the legislative appropriation act for the fiscal year 1899, approved March 15, 1898, shall not apply to the Library of Congress or the Botanic Garden.

Mr. HALE. I move to insert what I send to the desk, to come in after line 17, on page 90.

The amendment was read, and agreed to, as follows:

To Adolph Meyer, in case of Romain vs. Meyer, $2,000.

To Adolph Meyer, in case of Gazin vs. Meyer, $2,000.

And in line 19 strike out the word "seventy" and insert "seventy-four."

Mr. HALE. On page 102, line 16, I move to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 136, line 2, I move to strike out the word "two" and insert "three."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 136, after line 21, I move to insert "including machinery, tools, etc., for their manufacture."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 136, line 22, I move to strike out "nine hundred and twenty" and insert "two million five hundred thousand."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 137, after line 2, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, and agreed to, as follows:

To pay for six 24-inch Sims-Dudley dynamite guns purchased by order of the Secretary of War, $10,200.

Mr. HALE. Following that I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, and agreed to, as follows:

For purchase of ten Sims-Dudley dynamite guns of 24-inch caliber for the six months beginning July 1, 1898, $22,500. For 1,000 projectiles and charges for same, $17,000.

Mr. HALE. On page 11, after line 21, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, and agreed to, as follows:

For detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons guilty of violating the internal-revenue laws, $10,000.

Mr. HALE. On page 86, after line 18, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, and agreed to, as follows:

For compensation of the officers, clerks, messengers, and others in the service of the Senate, namely, sixteen pages for the Senate Chamber, at the rate of $2.50 per day each during the session, $1,240, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899.

Mr. HALE. At the request of several Senators, and not from the committee, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted on page 38, after line 7.

The amendment was read, and agreed to, as follows:

For payment of the heirs of Margaret Kennedy, widow and sole executrix of John Kennedy, deceased, the sum of $1,621.53, said amount to be in full compensation for all claim or demand of said Margaret Kennedy as the executrix of John Kennedy, deceased, or of the claim or demand of the heirs or representatives of said John Kennedy by reason of timber, fences, fruit trees, and other property taken and used by the Army of the United States during the late war of the rebellion from the farm of said John Kennedy, in the District of Columbia, being the farm on which Fort Sedgwick was erected.

Mr. CULLOM. I believe the Senator in charge of the bill has concluded the offering of committee amendments, and I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted at the end of line 2, on page 6.

The amendment was read, and agreed to, as follows:

That a competent person be employed, under the direction of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to make a compilation of all the treaties now in force between the United States and any foreign government. Said compilation shall contain the full text of the treaties now in force, together with a citation of any decision which may have been made in regard to said treaties by the Supreme Court of the United States or any court of Federal jurisdiction. The said work shall also contain a list, in chronological order, of all the treaties at any time made by the United States with other foreign countries, with a reference to the page and volume where the text of the same may be found, the whole to be carefully indexed by countries and by subject-matters. There shall be printed 1,500 copies of said volume; 1,000 for the use of the House of Representatives and 500 for the use of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. On behalf of my colleague [Mr. CHANDLER], who is unavoidably absent from the city, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to which I believe there will be no objection.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert after line 7, on page 28:

For paving Twenty-sixth street between D and Water streets NW. with vitrified blocks on concrete, $2,767.

Mr. HALE. Is that reported from a committee?

Mr. GALLINGER. It was reported favorably from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. I offer an amendment, which I ask may be inserted on page 18, after line 14.

The amendment was read and agreed to, as follows:

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to pay to the Venable Construction Company the 10 per cent retained on monthly payments for the construction of gun and mortar batteries at Key West, Fla., notwithstanding the contract for such construction is included in a contract for sand-fill in front of and adjacent to said mortar batteries, the latter not being fully completed; the said gun and mortar batteries having been completed and being now in the possession and use of the United States.

Mr. GORMAN. I offer an amendment, to be inserted after line 16, on page 40.

The amendment was read and agreed to, as follows:

That the claims of the William Cramp & Sons' Ship and Engine Building Company for damages and losses sustained by it by reason of the failure of the United States to promptly and properly furnish the armor armament, other materials, plans and specifications for the ships constructed by said company for the United States, submitted to the Navy Department under the act of June 10, 1896, be, and the same are hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for adjudication upon their merit; and if the said court shall find that the said company sustained losses and damages by reason of the alleged delays and defaults of the United States, then they shall render such judgment as in the opinion of the court will fully, fairly, and equitably compensate the said company therefor.

Mr. BUTLER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted on page 24 after line 8.

The amendment was read, and agreed to, as follows:

For the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of North Carolina, purchase of site, construction of buildings and ponds, and equipment of same, $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That not more than $1,000 of said sum shall be used for the purchase of a suitable site for the purposes of said station.

Mr. WARREN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted between lines 1 and 2, on page 48.

The amendment was read, and agreed to, as follows:

Office of the Assistant Attorney-General: For sufficient additional employees for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890, to bring and keep the work of the office up to date, as required by section 7 of the act of March 15, 1893, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1890, and for other purposes," namely, three assistant attorneys, at $2,000 each, and one clerk, who shall also be a stenographer and typewriter, $1,600; in all, $7,600.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to insert in the RECORD, in connection with the amendment, about four lines from the report of the Secretary of the Interior, which I have marked, and half a dozen lines from the legislative act of the present session, together with the letter of the Secretary of the Interior to the Appropriations Committee bearing upon this subject.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the report of the Secretary of the Interior for 1897.]

The number of assistant attorneys in this office is not sufficient to dispose of the great volume of work which comes before the office, and the compensation provided for some of them is not commensurate with either the amount of work to be done or the ability and learning required.

[From the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved March 15, 1893.]

Hereafter it shall be the duty of the head of each Executive Department to require monthly reports to be made to him as to the condition of the public business in the several bureaus or offices of his Department at Washington; and in each case where such reports disclose that the public business is in arrears, the head of the Department in which such arrears exist shall require, as provided herein, an extension of the hours of service to such clerks or employees as may be necessary to bring up such arrears of public business.

The letter of the Secretary of the Interior is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 29, 1898.

SIR: The office of the Assistant Attorney-General in this Department is, and has been for a long time, more than a year behind in its work. That office prepares legal opinions for the advice of the Secretary and Assistant Secretaries whenever requested; examines and prepares decisions in all appeals from the General Land Office, and also in a large volume of cases coming from the Indian Office, as well as in some cases coming from the Patent Office, and in others originating in the several bureaus in this Department. The values involved in many of the public-land cases reach into the hundred of thousands, and, in some instances, into millions. The volume of business in the office of the Assistant Attorney-General, and the number of people affected thereby, are much beyond the comprehension of one who has not given it attentive consideration.

The character of cases decided requires careful investigation and that the decisions be made with reasonable promptness. Serious delay, such as is now necessary by reason of the accumulated business in the office, is not only attended with great inconvenience to the Government and the parties interested, but, in some instances, is almost ruinous to the interests involved.

The present force in that office is not large enough to keep up the work in hand. Each of the assistant attorneys now examines and passes upon, in a single year, more cases and greater values than are ordinarily considered and determined in the same time by a State or Federal judge.

I respectfully and very earnestly recommend that, through an amendment in the pending deficiency bill, if it can be appropriately done, the force in the office named be increased by the addition of three assistant attorneys, at $2,000 per annum each, and one clerk, who shall also be a stenographer and typewriter, at $1,600 per annum.

Very respectfully,

C. N. BLISS, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
Chairman of Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted after line 21, on page 62.

The amendment was read, and agreed to, as follows:

And nothing in section 27 of chapter 543, volume 28, of the United States Statutes at Large, pages 1038 and 1039, shall be construed to apply to any contract for services for the prosecution of any claim against the United States or the Indians named in said section, and which had been prosecuted to its final allowance by the Department before which it was prosecuted within the period stated in said contracts; and said contracts shall not be deemed or taken to have been in full force and legal effect until the date of their official approval by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the date of the approval thereof officially indorsed thereon by said Secretary of the Interior and Commissioner of Indian Affairs, as required by the provisions of the fourth paragraph of section 2103 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and in all such cases the Secretary of the Interior shall cause all claims for service under such agreements to be adjusted, audited, allowed, and paid out of any moneys in the Treasury belonging to the bands or tribes to which such Indians belong; and so much money as is necessary for that purpose is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the amount so paid shall be charged against any fund to the credit of said Indians, tribes, bands, or individuals in the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That the amount so audited, allowed, and paid shall not exceed the sum of $45,000.

Mr. CARTER. I submit the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted between lines 11 and 12, on page 55.

The amendment was read, and agreed to, as follows:

That no filing shall be allowed nor shall patent or other evidence of title be issued on land in Alaska or elsewhere on any homestead or any soldier's additional homestead claim until the public-land surveys are regularly extended and approved embracing such claim.

Mr. CARTER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert between lines 2 and 3, on page 54, the following:

For compensation of forest inspectors, superintendents, supervisors, surveyors, rangers, and fire patrol, to be hereafter appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, wholly with reference to their fitness and without regard to their political affiliations, and as far as practicable from the residents of the respective States where forest reservations exist or may hereafter be set apart, to inspect or survey said reservations, report to the Secretary of the Interior the portions which should be excluded, and generally to perform such duties in the preservation of such forest reservations and the appraisal and sale of timber as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, $100,000.

Mr. HALE. Is this the amendment which arose from the discussion upon the sundry civil bill in relation to forest reservations?

Mr. CARTER. This is the amendment, and I will state to the Senator—

Mr. HALE. The Senator need not explain it, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. CARTER. It is the same amendment.

Mr. HALE. I looked at it then, if it is the same amendment.

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. HALE. I do not object.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, after line 11, it is proposed to insert:

Commercial commission to China: The President is hereby authorized to appoint a commission of three persons to study the commercial and industrial conditions in the Chinese Empire and report to Congress its conclusions as to the opportunities for and obstacles to the enlargement of markets in China for the raw products and manufactures of the United States; and the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the compensation of said commission and the payment of traveling and other necessary expenses in the pursuit of its investigations in that Empire.

Mr. HALE. I think that can wait, and therefore I must make the point of order upon it. It is new legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. CAFFERY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. After line 17, on page 17, it is proposed to insert:

The salaries of the officers and clerks of the mint at New Orleans, La., shall be the same in amount for the fiscal year 1899 as for the present fiscal year.

Mr. CAFFERY. There seems to be some question as to whether that is the proper place for the amendment to be inserted, and I temporarily withdraw it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. SPOONER. On page 139, line 19, I move to strike out the words "on the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue."

Mr. HALE. There is no objection to that.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed, on page 139, line 19, to strike out the words "on the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue."

Mr. COCKRELL. So as to read.

The SECRETARY. So that if amended the clause will read:

For such additional temporary force in the Internal-Revenue Service as, in the judgment of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, may be necessary to carry into effect the act "to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, and for other purposes;" the office force in the Internal-Revenue Bureau to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and internal-revenue agents and deputy collectors of internal revenue paid from this appropriation shall be selected and appointed, respectively, under the provisions of section 3152 and section 3148 of the Revised Statutes, to be available from the date of the approval of the foregoing act and to continue available during the fiscal year 1899, $500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted after line 16 on page 40.

The SECRETARY. After line 16, page 40, it is proposed to insert:

That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized, as recommended by his Department, to remit to the Union Iron Works, of San Francisco, Cal., the horsepower penalty imposed under the contract for the armored coast-defense vessel Monterey; and the sum of $12,225 is hereby appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. HALE. I make the point of order upon the amendment.

Mr. STEWART. I think it must be in order. It has been reported by a standing committee, the Committee on Claims, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and it is precisely of the same nature as various appropriations in the bill.

Mr. HALE. This is a matter which by the Senate was committed to the Committee on Claims, has been reported from that committee, and is now found in what is known as the Teller bill, which is at present in conference between the two Houses. No committee since that action by the Senate has reported in favor of its being placed upon the appropriation bill. Therefore I make the point of order upon it. If we begin to take out of the Teller bill items which under the direction of the Senate have been put into that measure, there will be no end to them, and we may as well put the whole bill on the pending appropriation bill, and that would end this bill. The Teller bill is now in conference.

Mr. STEWART. That changes the aspect.

Mr. HALE. The Senator withdraws the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. SPOONER. On page 88, between lines 5 and 6, I move to insert the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment already adopted, after line 5, page 88, insert the following:

To pay Michael Conlan the difference between the compensation of a laborer and that of a messenger from December 2, 1889, to March 31, 1890, under resolutions of the Senate of March 1, 1889, and January 27, 1890, $238.75.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear some explanation of that amendment.

Mr. HALE. I make the point of order against it.

Mr. SPOONER. I hope the Senator from Maine will not make a point of order.

Mr. HALE. I shall be obliged to make a point of order. It is not recommended by any committee.

Mr. SPOONER. This, of course, is a Senate expenditure. When I was a member of the Senate before, I was a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. That committee was required by a resolution of the Senate, under date of December 21, 1888, to make an investigation into the conduct of the office of the Supervising Architect. The committee was authorized to employ a stenographer and a messenger, to send for persons and papers, and there was conferred upon the committee the usual power for a complete investigation. This Mr. Conlan was appointed the messenger of that committee. I was the chairman of the subcommittee which made the investigation. It is a simple matter to the Senate, but it is a very large matter to the man who is interested in it. I hold in my hand the testimony which was taken by the committee. During all the time that the committee had sessions Mr. Conlan was the messenger of the committee.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. SPOONER. I am much obliged.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. I offer an amendment to be inserted on page 36, after line 25.

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows:

For value and rent of buildings on the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 2, township 13, range 13, Fort Crook, Nebr., from February 9, 1890, to February 9, 1898, at $490 per year, being for the value and use of buildings on the land acquired by the United States by condemnation proceedings in the suit of the United States against Henry Zucher, in accordance with a proposition made by Henry T. Clarke to the Secretary of War July 29, 1889, which said proposition was for the sale of lands to the United States for a new Fort Omaha, now Fort Crook, by which proposition all said buildings were reserved by Henry T. Clarke, but were appropriated by the United States, $5,500.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President—

Mr. HAWLEY. The subject-matter of the amendment was before the Committee on Military Affairs at more than one session, and it was discussed a great deal. I wish to ask the Senator from Nebraska who offers it now whether the form in which he offers it has been approved by that committee?

Mr. HALE. I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator from Maine will not do that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A question was asked of the Senator from Nebraska by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. ALLEN. The form of the amendment, I think, is substantially that suggested to me by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY. How much does it propose to pay?

Mr. ALLEN. It carries the sum from $2,900, which was recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs, to $5,500, which includes the three subsequent years.

Mr. HAWLEY. I could not understand the Senator owing to the noise in the Chamber. Will he please repeat his statement?

Mr. ALLEN. The Committee on Military Affairs recommended an appropriation of $2,900, being rent at $400 a year, I think. Since that time, since the Fifty-fourth Congress, rent for some three years more has accrued at the same rate, and it is made to embrace those three years. It conveys an absolute title and closes up the account between Mr. Clarke and the United States.

Now, Mr. President, one word to the Senator from Maine, if he will yield to me. I hope this amendment will be accepted. It is a very recent account. There is no question about its legality or justness. It is closely connected with the administration of the duties of the War Office, and has accumulated within the last five or six years. It met the approval of the Committee on Military Affairs at one time up to the sum of $2,900, which was the amount then due. The amount of $5,500 is due now.

While it is true that this item is on the omnibus claims bill, I do not think that ought to be construed to prevent its prompt settlement in view of its very recent and close connection with the administration of the War Office. I was in hopes, after the Senator from Wisconsin had been treated so nicely and the objection to his amendment withdrawn, that no objection would be made to this amendment. I hope the Senator from Maine will not press his objection.

Mr. HALE. Senators will understand, and I know the Senator from Nebraska will appreciate, that in any of the cases that have been considered by the Committee on Claims and put upon their bill I am constrained to make the point of order. If I do not do that in this case, as I did with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], I would be overwhelmed. Any other course would render nugatory the deliberate plan which we made to have all these cases considered by the Committee on Claims and having the committee to report a general bill covering all of them. This is one of the cases that they considered, and it is now in that bill and in conference. Since that was done no committee has recommended that it be taken out. Therefore I must raise the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me, I say in all kindness I think the Senator ought to apply the rule indiscriminately. If the knife is to be placed in any bill, let it be placed in every bill. Less than ten minutes ago the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] submitted an amendment carrying an appropriation of $100,000 which was subject to a point of order. That point of order was not made. That amendment pertained to the forest reservations of the United States. There is a general committee of this body on forest reservations. That amendment was never referred to that committee.

Mr. HALE. Was that amendment not in the Teller bill?

Mr. ALLEN. No; but I say the amendment was never referred to the appropriate committee and never met its approval. It was therefore subject to a point of order. I did not see fit to make it, in view of the fact that the chairman of the committee did not see fit to make it.

Mr. HALE. I understand now what the Senator is referring to. The matter came up at the time of the discussion of the sundry civil bill. The Committee on Appropriations were then consulted and polled, and agreed that it should be offered upon the deficiency bill to cover the defect in that bill. So the amendment had the approval of the committee. I did not know what amendment the Senator was talking about.

Mr. ALLEN. It was, however, subject to a point of order under the rule.

Mr. HALE. It was not subject to a point of order. The committee had agreed to that amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. Is it not the universal rule that a proposed amendment must be sent to the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and meet its approval or its rejection before it can be offered? That seems to be the rule of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Yes; I suppose technically that would be so.

Mr. ALLEN. That was not done in that case.

Mr. HALE. But as it came over from the other bill with a full understanding at that time that it should be offered here, I did not make the point of order, as the Committee on Appropriations had agreed to it.

Mr. ALLEN. I am not chiding the Senator for not making the point of order. I only regret that the point of order was not made on the Senator from Montana or the Senator from Wisconsin, but that it fell to my lot at the first opportunity.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska is not disposed of.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to say, in addition to what I have already said, that I introduced this amendment at the extraordinary session of the present Congress, and I have been importuning the Committee on Military Affairs to take it up and dispose of it one way or another from that time to the present. I have not been able to get a report on the amendment during this Congress. I have appealed to the chairman of the committee in person; I have written several times on the subject, but the committee have no doubt been loaded down with military affairs requiring their attention, and this matter, with others, has been placed aside until the pressure of business was over. I have done everything I could to have it properly considered.

Mr. HALE. The Senator undoubtedly has done everything he can to have it adopted, but it is clearly subject to the point of order. The Senator, of course, is not to blame for that.

Mr. ALLEN. Can not the Senator pass over the point of order and let me escape with the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HALE. I am afraid I can not, because there are a dozen Senators here waiting with amendments that are in the Teller bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think my friend from Nebraska has any right to complain against the Committee on Military Affairs. By his direction or by that of some one else this claim has been before the Committee on Claims of this body, where it ought to go and where it belongs. The Committee on Claims has acted upon it, reported it to the Senate, and it has passed the Senate in the bill that has been sent over to the House. On page 154 of that bill I find the following:

To Henry T. Clarke, of Omaha, Nebr., the sum of $2,900, for the value and rent of buildings on the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 2, township 13, range 13, Fort Cook, Nebr., and being the buildings on said land acquired by the United States by condemnation proceedings in the suit of the United States against Henry Zucher, in accordance with a proposition made by Henry T. Clarke to the Secretary of War on July 29, 1889, which said proposition was for the sale of land to the United States for a new Fort Omaha, now Fort Crook, and by which proposition all said buildings were retained by said Henry T. Clarke.

Mr. ALLEN. That is my work. It is not by virtue of the Senator from Missouri that it is there.

Mr. COCKRELL. Can you have a case pending in one committee and have it acted upon there, and abuse and blame another committee for not acting upon it?

Mr. ALLEN. I can.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is a new way of proceeding in the Senate. Mr. ALLEN. It may be. New methods are properly introduced here. It would be a very good thing for the Senate if some new methods were introduced. But, aside from that, I want to say to my amiable friend at my right that I have not abused the Committee on Military Affairs. I have exculpated them, expressly saying that they were pressed with business and had been unable to take it up and consider the amendment. At the same time, Mr. President, that clears my skirts of any negligence in connection with the matter.

It was perfectly proper, in view of the fact that this is a military matter, to send it to the Committee on Military Affairs. It would have been perfectly proper for that committee to have taken it up and reported it either affirmatively or adversely. It was perfectly proper under the rules of this body for me to introduce it as a distinct bill and send it to the Committee on Claims and have it acted upon there and reported favorably. It was perfectly proper for me to introduce it as a proposed amendment to the omnibus bill and have it incorporated in that bill. Mr. President, if there was anything wrong in the transaction, I am perfectly willing to submit myself to the distinguished condemnation of my friend.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the amendment withdrawn?

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is not withdrawn. The point of order is sustained. The Senator from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask leave to offer an amendment to the pending bill, to come in on page 66, after line 4.

The amendment was read, and agreed to, as follows:

That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to state an account with the Mobile and Ohio Railroad Company, a corporation chartered by the State of Alabama, for transporting the mails of the United States over its lines during the period between July 12, 1876, and January 25, 1883, both inclusive; and in stating said account credit shall be given to said railroad company for all sums to which it was justly entitled; and no such sum shall be barred by the statute of limitations. And the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed, upon stating the said account, to certify the amount found to be due to said company to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment; and a sufficient sum of money is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of the sum so certified.

Mr. CAFFERY. I renew the amendment which I withdrew a few moments ago.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 4, page 23, insert:

The salaries of the officers and clerks of the mint at New Orleans, La., shall be the same in amount for the fiscal year 1899 as for the present fiscal year.

Mr. HALE. Does that cover the matter that was before the Committee on Appropriations in reference to the increased business at the New Orleans mint?

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. Then I do not object to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAFFERY. I offer the following amendment also. After line 4, page 17, I move to insert:

Payment to Edward H. Murrell: To pay to Edward H. Murrell the sum of $1,400.34 collected from his property by Treasury agents in Louisiana and turned into the Treasury.

Mr. HALE. I must make the point of order that that is a claim.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained unless the amendment has been reported by a committee and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 30, at the end of line 2, I move to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That all existing conduits within the fire limits and all existing overhead electric-light wires without the fire limits in the District of Columbia are hereby legalized until otherwise provided by law, and house connections may be made with such overhead electric-light wires outside such fire limits.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Immediately after the amendment just agreed to, I move to insert:

Provided further, That the Cable and Postal Telegraph Company now in the ducts of the Potomac Electric Power Company may be connected with the existing wires of said telegraph company on the Aqueduct Bridge by a connection not exceeding 300 feet in length.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I have one other amendment that I propose to offer at this time, and I ask unanimous consent, because it is not in order, that I may offer it and make a brief explanation. It relates to the compensation of gaugers of fruit brandy and fruit liquor. Owing to a decision made only four or five days ago by the Comptroller it is impossible to pay these gaugers as they should be paid. I have a letter here from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, and also the opinion of the Comptroller. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be placed in the bill. If there is any objection to it hereafter it may be considered in conference. It is the request that it shall be put upon some bill at this session, as it is important to include the fruit brandy making season, beginning now very soon.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Insert at its proper place the following—

Mr. ALLISON. The proper place is on page 11, after line 21. There has already been an amendment inserted there.

The SECRETARY. Following the amendment on page 11, after line 21, insert:

That gaugers employed in gauging fruit brandy and gaugers specially detailed for special duty under the direction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may be paid at the discretion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, either by fees to be determined by the quantity gauged or by a daily compensation not to exceed $5 per diem while actually employed; and in calculating the daily compensation of all gaugers paid by fees the quantity gauged for which fees are paid may be determined by dividing the aggregate gallons of spirits gauged by the number of days on which the gauger was actually employed during the month.

Mr. CAFFERY. Is $5 a day the usual compensation?

Mr. ALLISON. That is the present law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. On page 69, line 14, I move to strike out the word "Muscogee" and insert "Wagoner."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report favorably a proposed amendment to the pending bill. I move to insert, on page 36, after line 7, the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 36, after line 7, insert:

Gerdom gas check: To enable the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to purchase the patent of Gregory Gerdom for a gas check for breech-loading guns, for a sum not exceeding $22,000: Provided, That in the opinion of the Secretary of War said patent covers the same: And provided further, That before payment is made to said Gerdom for said patent he shall file with the Secretary of War a release of all claims against the War Department for accrued royalties for the use of said patent.

Mr. HALE. Is the amendment reported by a committee?

Mr. HAWLEY. It is, after very careful consideration. It is a measure of economy.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. On page 83, after line 5, I move to insert, following the amendment already adopted:

To pay R. P. Troy the difference between the salary of a messenger acting as assistant doorkeeper and that of acting assistant doorkeeper from August 18, 1893, to February 18, 1896, $1,980.

Mr. HALE. Is that a matter in the House of Representatives?

Mr. WHITE. No, sir.

Mr. HALE. Is it a matter in the Senate?

Mr. WHITE. It is exactly analogous to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] and adopted. It is the same kind of an amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANTLE. On page 88, after the amendment just adopted, I move to insert:

To pay H. R. Cunningham for additional services rendered in the office of the Secretary of the Senate as acting assistant minute and journal clerk from March 12, 1896, to May 15, 1896, $385.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANTLE submitted the following amendment; which was read:

That hereafter, and until otherwise provided by law, regular terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of Montana shall be held at Butte, Mont., on the first Tuesday in February and on the first Tuesday in September in each year, and causes, civil or criminal, may be transferred by the court or the judge thereof from Helena to Butte or from Butte to Helena, in said district, when the convenience of parties or the ends of justice would be promoted by the transfer, and any interlocutory order may be made by the court or judge thereof in either place.

That an act entitled "An act to provide for holding terms of court in the district of Montana," approved July 23, 1892, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. HALE. Was the amendment reported from the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. MANTLE. It was favorably reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. On behalf of the Committee on Pacific Railroads, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. Insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Attorney-General, and their successors in office, be, and they are hereby, appointed a commission with full power to settle the indebtedness to the Government growing out of the issue of bonds in aid of the construction of the Central Pacific and Western Pacific bond-aided railroads, upon such terms and in such manner as may be agreed upon by them, or by a majority of them, and the owners of said railroads: Provided, That any and all settlements thus made shall be submitted in writing to the President for his approval or disapproval, and unless approved by him shall not be binding.

That said commission shall not agree to accept a less sum in settlement of the amount due the United States than the full amount of the principal and unpaid interest due at the time of said settlement: And also provided, That said commission are hereby empowered to grant such time or times of payment by installment, and at such rates of interest, to be not less than 3 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, and with such security as to said commission may seem expedient.

The sums of money and stocks or securities that shall be received by the United States under the provisions of this act, and such sums of money, stocks, or securities as have been received, or shall be received, from the sale or other disposal of the rights or interests of the United States in the Union Pacific Railway Company and the Kansas Pacific Railroad Company and in any branch of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, shall constitute a charge on the Treasury of the United States, to be applied to the construction of a ship canal through Nicaragua, which sums shall be appropriated from time to time and applied to the construction of such canal as Congress shall direct: Provided, That this charge on the Treasury shall not interfere with the use of said fund for the current expenses of the Government, but the same shall be returned to the fund when the same is acquired by appropriations made by act of Congress toward the construction of such canal.

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000 to defray the expenses of said commission in making the said settlement.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of that amendment.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I move the consideration of the amendment, Mr. President, upon the recommendation of the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I must, then, raise the point of order, because I have been notified that if this amendment is taken up it will consume a week in debate. Senators have notified me that it will not be allowed to pass. Therefore I must make the point of order that it is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. MORGAN. The time that might be taken up in the debate of this proposition is not an answer to its merits at all. I had not supposed that the amendment would lead to any debate scarcely, and I am quite surprised to hear the statement.

Mr. HALE. When the Senator offered the amendment, as was quite right and proper, he realized the force of it, and asked unanimous consent that it might be considered. I did not object to that, because, recognizing some merit in the proposition, if it could go by unanimous consent I was willing that it should go on the bill; but now I am told that if the amendment is precipitated here it will prolong the discussion upon this bill—where, of course, the amendment does not properly belong—and therefore, while I did not object to going on by unanimous consent, I must make the point of order, because the amendment can not, as the Senator thinks it will, go without debate, for I have been notified that it will give rise to extended debate.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not in the slightest degree find fault with the Senator in charge of this bill. His action about it, of course, is entirely correct. At the same time I am thoroughly convinced that the amendment is in order. The amendment has been recommended by the Committee on Pacific Railroads and is, therefore, now brought before the Senate as a matter of right, we insisting that the action of that committee upon this amendment and the reference of it to the Committee on Appropriations makes the matter in order upon the present bill.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, legislation is not made in order by a committee reporting it. An increase of appropriation or anything of that kind is in order by one of the standing committees reporting it and referring it to the Committee on Appropriations; but general legislation, which this amendment is to a very great and marked extent, can not be made in order by a committee reporting it. The rule is very distinct in reference to that.

Mr. MORGAN. This amendment carries an appropriation of $20,000 for the purpose of executing an appropriation that has been made and that would be in order as an appropriation.

Mr. HALE. That is only an incident of the great legislation which is proposed.

Mr. MORGAN. It may be an incident to legislation.

Mr. HALE. You can not pin legislation onto a small appropriation of money. Of course the Senator must see this is one of the most important pieces of legislation which has been before this Congress, and it ought not, except by unanimous consent, be urged upon this bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Of course the Government of the United States is at the mercy of any Senator who chooses to make objection on an occasion of this kind, it makes no difference how important the matter may be or how essential to the welfare of the country. I have no right to complain, and I do not complain, if any Senator on this floor desires to occupy any length of time, a week or ten days, for the discussion of a matter like this, when, perhaps, it might as well be discussed in two or three hours at the outside. I am making no complaint about that; but I do not feel that I am warranted as a member of the Committee on Pacific Railroads in omitting to bring this subject to the attention of the Senate, after their very careful study and their recommendation of it, this amendment embracing, as it does, a settlement of a very great and vexed question that for many years has disturbed the internal policy of the people of the United States.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to know if the Committee on Pacific Railroads are unanimous in this report with regard to the settlement with the railroads?

Mr. MORGAN. I think they are entirely unanimous.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not think I would object to this amendment if it contained nothing else. If it is simply a proposition upon which the Committee on Pacific Railroads are unanimous, I will withdraw my objection; but I object because it contains very much other matter in the form of an amendment which, as I understand, does not come from that committee.

Mr. MORGAN. All the members of that committee who are now in the Senate have conferred together, as I understand it, and have consented to the amendment as I present it to-day, and for which I have asked unanimous consent without being successful.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I understand that the Senator also offers an amendment with regard to the Nicaraguan Canal.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to explain that, and will the Senate give me consent to explain it?

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, if I can get the consent of the Senate to speak.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the Senator from Alabama proceeding.

Mr. MORGAN. Very good.

Mr. SPOONER. I was not in the Senate when the amendment was read. Will the Senator kindly consent to have the amendment again read?

Mr. MORGAN. Of course I will. I should be very glad to have it read again. I will not occupy the floor long in explaining this matter, although it is a matter of very great importance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary again read the amendment submitted by Mr. MORGAN.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, with the indulgence of the Senate I shall occupy a short time in explaining this amendment, and I shall confine myself to a statement of the facts of the situation, without any effort to argue upon the propriety or the necessity of the passage of this amendment, which I think is so obvious that every person in the United States will see that it is a matter of great concern, a matter of necessity, of emergent necessity.

The first proposition of this amendment relates to a settlement of the indebtedness between the United States and the Central Pacific Railway Company. The Senate perfectly understands, at least those of the Senate who have paid any attention to the action of the Committee on Pacific Railroads, that I at least have opposed many propositions for a settlement which have been brought forward by those who have control of the Central Pacific Railway Company, and none of those propositions, although they are very numerous, that have been reported by different committees from time to time have yet met with the approbation of the Senate. This subject has led at one time and another to a great deal of discussion and much effort to pass bills in different forms.

We pass on in the history of these railways until we come to the point of settling the Union Pacific Railway debt to the United States through the agency of a decree of the circuit court of the United States in a suit to which the United States made itself voluntarily a party. That settlement resulted in the payment to the United States of the principal sum of the debt that had been paid by the Government for the Union Pacific Railway Company and interest, without compounding the interest or making annual rests in the calculation. A plain sum of the principal debt paid by the United States for principal and interest has been secured through the agency of the decree of that court, and has been collected, as I understand, and paid into the Treasury, amounting, perhaps, to sixty-two or sixty-three million dollars in all.

At the time that transaction was matured or accomplished, or was being brought to a conclusion, it was freely stated on all sides of the Senate, and it is a matter that no one would hereafter dispute, probably, that the settlement then made by the President of the United States, he requiring the payment of the full sum of the principal and interest of the debt, would be a precedent for the settlement with the Central Pacific Railway Company.

Now, I remark as I go on that the settlement made by the President with the Union Pacific Railway Company has been accepted by the country as being satisfactory, and no one has any purpose, so far as I can hear, of attempting to disturb that settlement. Therefore the precedent thus established by the judicial action of the court, by the executive action of the President, and by the acquiescence of the American people has become a precedent for the settlement of the debt of the Central Pacific Railway Company.

We could go on here and have a long series of litigious controversies in Congress and in the courts with the Central Pacific Railway Company; and I am free to acknowledge that my belief is—in fact, I am satisfied—that in the outcome of any litigation of that kind after years of effort there would be perhaps added to the debt due from the Central Pacific Railway Company to the United States many million dollars, which could be recovered by a judicial decree, or perhaps enforced or compelled by action of Congress. Nevertheless, I am quite satisfied that no Congress will sit here that will depart from the precedent that has been established in the case of the Union Pacific Railway Company.

The country has become, as I have remarked, so entirely satisfied with that settlement as that hereafter there will be no serious question made anywhere as to its validity as a precedent for the settlement of the Central Pacific Railway debt. Therefore, in committee I voted with the entire body of the committee that this should be the basis of settlement between the Central Pacific Railway Company and the United States; that while we could recover back the principal sum that we have paid out and the interest that we have paid out, without making rests for the calculation of interest from year to year, and without attempting to resort to any of the hidden assets of this company upon any ground of irregularity or fraud, or what not, we would reach in such a settlement as that the conclusion, which we may now just as well anticipate, because that is what it is coming to, that the precedent I have mentioned will furnish the basis and the rule of settlement.

When we see a matter as plainly as this, when it is established by the precedents to which I have referred, and when we know that the outcome of the settlement with the Central Pacific Railroad Company is but to be that which is presented in this amendment, I for one feel, Mr. President, that it is my duty to waive all of my predilections, or, if you please, prejudices, or, if you please, convictions, as to what is honestly and equitably due from this railway company to the United States, and to accept the settlement that everyone sees is to become the settlement of the future, whenever that is made.

In committee the question arose as to whether the sum should be less than that which I have stated. That objection was voted down, and we fixed upon the sum of the principal debt and the interest as being the basis of the settlement.

The Central Pacific Railroad Company professes not to be able at this time to pay so large an amount of money in hand, which, as I remember the figures—I do not know that I am quoting exactly—is about $59,000,000. That is the amount of the debt. Therefore, the Central Pacific Company would have to claim, and does claim, an extension of the debt.

A question arose as to the interest they should pay upon that extension, and the rate of 3 per cent was fixed by the committee, because that is now substantially the Government rate of interest as established by our recent legislation. So the committee came together, without any sort of difficulty, in making the recommendation that the debt should be paid upon that basis and should also bear the rate of 3 per cent interest until it was extinguished. Some Senators desired to give a long period of time for these postponed payments. Others desired a very short space of time.

The committee did not agree to report any particular space of time, leaving that matter open, of course, for the consideration of the Senate after being duly advised of the facts; but the committee felt satisfied, when they got this debt from the Central Pacific Railroad Company amply and perfectly secured and that it should bear the rate of 3 per cent interest per annum, payable semi-annually, that that was all that we could ask, for the Government of the United States was not then, at the time we made the report, and certainly is not now in distress for resources of any kind in the handling of its securities, it makes no difference whether the subject is war or peace that creates the necessity for the raising of money.

So I am entirely satisfied on my own behalf to let the matter stand just as it is, and to let the President of the United States and the commission fix the time. But a time has been agreed upon on the suggestion of a Senator who is not a member of the committee, which is that in ten annual payments, as I understand it, this $59,000,000 is to be paid. Well, that is a pretty drastic movement, I know; we all know that even the greatest railroad company in the United States would find much difficulty, out of its earnings, or even out of its credit, in raising the sum of $59,000,000 in ten payments—very great difficulty. But that is neither here nor there.

Mr. President, a question has arisen in my mind and in the minds of this committee, what disposal ought to be made of this great fund in the Treasury of the United States arising from the sale of the Union and Central Pacific railways? That subsidy fund was created by taxation upon the people. It was created at a time when Congress had the unquestioned right to pass the legislation of 1862, 1863, and 1864, by which the credit of the Government was loaned to the Union and Central Pacific railways for the building of that great transcontinental route of railroad.

The manner of raising that fund, the power of Congress to create those railroad companies, and all connected with it is a matter of undisputed authority now upon the part of the Government of the United States; and that authority has been frequently affirmed by decisions of the Supreme Court. So that this fund has found its way into the Treasury, and part of it is there now, without the slightest opportunity on the part of any person to raise a question of constitutional power in the gathering or the raising of this fund upon subsidy bonds.

What was the object of the Congress of the United States in the creation of these great corporations, these great railway companies—for Congress did create them, Congress gave the charters and appropriated the money for the purpose of building these roads—what was the object? Twofold. First, a governmental object in connecting the coasts of the Pacific Ocean with the eastern parts of the United States, whereby the Government might overcome the hostilities of Indian tribes and might transmit its mails, its munitions of war, its soldiery, its agents, and all that rapidly from one coast to the other, and thereby complete, so far as the Government could complete, the wonderful project of the location of our civilization and our States and Territories upon the Pacific coast.

The other object was to furnish to the people of those countries engaged in industry, whether it was in mining, or timber shipments, or in agricultural industries, or what not, an opportunity to transfer their commerce from coast to coast and from State to State freely and rapidly at a fair rate for transportation.

The railroad system, when it was established by the aid of Congress, went into the hands of men who seemed to have little or no consideration for the welfare of those people, and we are about now to relax our hold upon this railroad system and let it go without retaining the power to restrain these railroads in their conduct for the benefit of the people of the United States who live along the line and on the Pacific slope.

Now, sir, for the purpose of giving to the people of the United States, those situated in and inhabiting those countries, an opportunity to live in their agricultural and other industries a plan has been set on foot here of setting apart this fund in the Treasury of the United States, not by earmark, not as a specific trust, but as a charge on the Treasury for the purpose of building the Nicaraguan Canal.

Mr. President, I supposed the time had arrived in the history of the Congress of the United States—it certainly has arrived in the minds and contemplation of the people—when there is to be no longer delay in the building of the Nicaraguan Canal. This fund that you are proposing to handle under this amendment, having answered its purpose of building this great transcontinental line of railway, comes back into the Treasury of the United States, repaid by these corporations.

But the proposition is that that fund shall be set apart in the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of constructing a ship canal across Nicaragua, so as to give to the people who are concerned along the Pacific slope and everywhere else, to all classes of men, the opportunity of having freights carried by competitive waterways, so that their industries will be relieved of some of the tax and burden of overcharges for transportation to our Eastern home markets.

I would not consent, Mr. President, for the franchise and property of the Central Pacific Railway Company to find its ownership in the hands of private individuals, without strict legal responsibility to the United States, because upon the maintenance of the rights of the United States in the Central Pacific Railway Company as they exist, and under the charters as they exist, there hinges the most important results that are conceivable to the people of the Pacific coast and all the people to the eastward until you get to the Union Pacific Railway, and over that to the Middle and Atlantic States.

The settlement proposed here leaves all of the acts of Congress in full force, leaves the charter in full force, and the obligations of the Central Pacific Railway Company entirely unaffected by this legislation; and in that respect the advantages of this settlement are immensely greater than those of the settlement we have already made with the Union Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. President, I take it for granted that the canal through Nicaragua is going to be built, and built immediately. A bill is pending here, now upon the Calendar, for the purpose of constructing it; and while I may be entirely mistaken in my conception of the wisdom of the provisions of the bill, whenever the Senate of the United States shall find itself in a position of sufficient quietude and patience to act upon the proposition, I do not believe that 5 votes will be developed against the passage of the bill—I do not mean precisely in its present shape, but after it has undergone critical investigation. I predicate that conviction upon the fact that the people of the United States have discovered that a waterway through Nicaragua is absolutely indispensable as a matter of safety to the coasts of the United States as well as to the commerce of the country.

Then this fund, having performed this great service, which I have called missionary work, in building this transcontinental railroad, now that it is coming back to the Treasury of the United States, ought to be employed in giving to the people waterway facilities for their travel and for their traffic, and in giving to the Navy of the United States the opportunity of forming a junction between the fleets without passing 13,000 miles around the southern point of South America.

So I concluded that I would present that feature of the case, and it has met with the entire acceptance of every Senator who is concerned in the recommendation of this amendment to the Senate.

I am greatly gratified, Mr. President, at the success of the idea, not because it is mine exclusively, for it is not mine. It has been in the minds of many men for a great while. But I am greatly gratified to know that there is an almost universal consensus of opinion that this fund, when it goes into the Treasury of the United States, and that part of it which is already in the Treasury, shall be made a charge upon the Treasury for the purpose of building the canal. That is its proper, logical, just, and natural destination.

Now, a word about the nature of that charge. It is a mere declaration by law of the policy of the Government of the United States that this money ought to be applied and will be applied to the construction of the canal, for the amendment as it is proposed here now leaves it optional with Congress to make the application of the money from time to time as Congress may determine that the money ought to be applied for that purpose, and in the meantime it leaves the money liable to pass into the current expenses of the Government whenever that is necessary, but to be returned to this fund whenever Congress shall by law make appropriation for the purpose of building the canal.

Mr. President, if we could pass this amendment to-day, not only would the construction of the Nicaraguan Canal become an absolute and indefeasible certainty, but we would settle many questions that are looming up from time to time and that have surrounded this subject and have harassed its friends now for ten or fifteen years, all of which are important, all of which are dangerous; but they derive their importance and their danger from the fact that the Congress of the United States withholds its hand and takes no positive action upon the subject.

If the amendment could be passed into a law to-day whereby the $125,000,000—for that is about the amount—could be made a charge upon the Treasury of the United States, and the world saw—for the nations of the earth are looking upon us with anxious eyes about this matter—that the Congress had come to a resolution to build the canal without entering into particulars as to the manner in which it would do so, but leaving that open for future legislation, then we would have accomplished a result for our country which otherwise we may be very seriously disappointed about, both as to the time of its realization and also as to the difficulties with which it may be surrounded.

At the present time the Government of the United States has no official connection whatever with a canal going through Nicaragua except through concessions made to some of its citizens. Wipe those out, and we have not a grain of sand even to stand upon for a foundation. We would then be left to the possibilities of diplomatic negotiations for the purpose of creating a status quo upon which we could predicate any future action, legislative or otherwise. All would be gone. All will be gone whenever those concessions are broken down, if we are weak enough to permit that to be done. They have not very long to run. In the meantime Nicaragua, consulting her own interests—I am not going to criticize her or blame her for her conduct at all—is making preparation to form combinations with citizens of Great Britain to build the canal.

She has already, in contempt of the concessions to our own people, given to the Atlas Company, a company chartered in London, the right of the exclusive navigation of the San Juan River, the exclusive navigation of Lake Nicaragua, the exclusive navigation of Lake Managua, and has sold to this company the railroad reaching from the city of Managua to Corinto, with authority also to build another railway across from Lake Managua to Bluefields or the river, the head of navigation just above Bluefields, a short route through a very fertile country and a route of immense importance because of the low cost at which it can be built and the short line between the Caribbean Sea and the Pacific Ocean at the harbor of Corinto.

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator from Alabama permit me to ask him a question? I desire to know of the Senator whether the concession of Nicaragua to the British company, giving it the exclusive navigation of the San Juan, as he has stated, and the exclusive navigation of Lake Nicaragua, in any wise conflicts with the concession of Nicaragua and Costa Rica to the Maritime Canal Company?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President—

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Alabama will allow me for a moment. I wish it to be understood that my point of order is pending. I stated that if the matter was not debated I was willing that it should be put in by the unanimous consent of the Senate; but the course that matters have taken shows very clearly that what I stated was correct, and I shall insist, at the end of the Senator's remarks, on my point of order.

Mr. MORGAN. In reply to the question of the Senator from Louisiana, I will state that Nicaragua seems to be indifferent as to whether there is a conflict between the grant to our concessionaries and the grant to the Atlas Company.

Mr. SPOONER. Is there a conflict?

Mr. MORGAN. I think there is a conflict, absolutely and unquestionably. That is my opinion. I am only stating my opinion. There are some others, including the Atlas Company themselves, who insist that their purpose is not to conflict, and that while they might have the opportunity of conflicting with the present concession, they are counting upon the fact that the concession will expire by limitation before anything is done.

Now, that brings to view the peril of the situation, and that is why I have anxiously referred to this subject. There is this great Atlas Company, composed of very important individuals both in England and the United States, gentlemen of eminence, gentlemen of personal worth and also of large capital in the city of New York, representing it, and that company is now working very rapidly for the building of the railroad connection between Lake Managua and Bluefields close to the Caribbean Sea. Obviously, beyond question, both as matter of deduction and as matter of fact, the Atlas Company expects to receive into its hands the concession we are about to give up by our delay; and when that time comes around, there is no possibility of our escaping a controversy with a great British company about the canal rights.

We have now got no rights as a Government except such as rest upon the doctrine of estoppel. More than that, we stand in an attitude toward Nicaragua, which she can maintain in the face of the nations of the world, of rather an unpleasant character, which would forbid us from going back to the Frelinghuysen-Zavala treaty, if that was considered to be a valuable treaty, and demanding or claiming of Nicaragua a renewal of that negotiation. That negotiation was made by Mr. Frelinghuysen when he was Secretary of State and by Mr. Zavala when, I believe, he was in the same office for Nicaragua, or was President of Nicaragua. That treaty required us to pay Nicaragua $4,000,000 in money for the canal rights and concession. It required us, as I remember the figures, to pay Nicaragua for an indefinite period of time 13 per cent of the actual income of the canal, making for her an enormous amount of money.

That treaty was debated in the Senate, and inasmuch as the injunction of secrecy has been long since removed, I will give its status before the Senate at the time Mr. Cleveland was inaugurated for his first term. A vote had been taken in the Senate which failed of 2 votes to reach two-thirds majority on the ratification of the treaty. Mr. Edmunds, of Vermont, voted in the negative for the purpose of getting on proper ground upon which to move a reconsideration, and he moved a reconsideration; and that motion was pending at the time Mr. Cleveland came into office.

Mr. Bayard, who became his Secretary of State and was known as having been selected for that high office, was then in the Senate, and Mr. Bayard opposed the ratification of the treaty upon the ground that it was calculated to create an entangling alliance between ourselves and Nicaragua and also, according to his opinion, that it came in conflict with the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. When Mr. Cleveland came into office, he withdrew the treaty from the Senate, and since that time has paid no further attention to the subject.

Now, Nicaragua having made that treaty, having ratified it on her part, having presented it, and it having been rejected by a vote of the Senate and then withdrawn by the President of the United States and put into a state of "innocuous desuetude," as a matter of course Nicaragua can not be called upon to treat even on that subject with any degree of assurance on our part that she would accept such negotiation. But who is there in the United States who, after our citizens have spent nearly $5,000,000 in constructing a canal there under a concession, is now willing to throw that away, deprive them of any opportunity of recoupment at all, and then pay Nicaragua $4,000,000 in money for another concession, and that to be accompanied by a provision that 13 per cent of the income of the canal is to be devoted to Nicaragua so long as the canal lasts, if I have the figures right, and I think I have?

I refer to that now to show the improbability and the impossibility of that negotiation. The concessions to our citizens expire on the 9th day of October, 1899—that is to say, on their face they expire then—but there is not a court of justice in the world which would hold that Nicaragua had the right to enforce the forfeiture at that time. I need not go into the reasons of it. I state that proposition, and if I am questioned about it at any time when it is proper to debate it, I will be able to show that there is not a court of justice in the world that would declare the forfeiture of that concession on the 9th day of October, 1899, under the circumstances of the conduct of Nicaragua and Costa Rica in respect of this concession during its pendency. But I pass from that question, not desiring to discuss it.

Feeling the weight of the pressure of this situation, Mr. President, I addressed a letter to the Secretary of State to know whether or not the Government of the United States expected to enter into any negotiations with Nicaragua in regard to the canal. The answer came promptly and definitely, "No!" While citizens of the United States have concessions that are unexpired, we can not negotiate with Nicaragua to change the situation without doing them injustice. Therefore we have no such expectation. Therefore the earliest period at which it is possible to take any diplomatic action upon this subject is October, 1899, conceding that Nicaragua then might have the right to declare a forfeiture of these charters. We see, therefore, Mr. President, that unless some action is taken upon the basis of the concessions to our citizens, in some direction or other, it is impossible that we can even start upon the project of building the canal before October, 1899.

I wanted to make this statement plain to the Senate, that the people of the United States might exactly understand what we are doing with their very valuable and important interest in this regard. Here is the Senate so fatigued with the heat of the summer and long sessions that there is not any probability, I think, of the consideration at this session of the canal bill which has been reported by the select committee upon that subject, and I felt it was my duty at all events to bring this matter to the attention of the American people. I want them to know that I am not responsible, being chairman of the select committee, for any delay whatever in respect to this matter. I will accept none of the criminality of delay. Surely I will not make my personal convenience or comfort the paltry reason for such delinquency.

I will not undertake to discuss particularly the bill which has been reported here, but I will say that all the objections I have heard of any material character against the bills—I refer to the bills which have been heretofore reported here, one of them passed through this body by 11 majority—have been removed by the character of the present bill. I merely state that to show that on the part of the committee which I have the honor to represent on this floor as its chairman we have resorted to every possible diligence in order to bring this subject up fully and fairly to the consideration of the country, and particularly of Congress, so that we might be safe at the earliest possible moment from that distressful situation which but recently has excited the fears and apprehensions of every American citizen, even for the loss of the great battle ship Oregon.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me? Will he state briefly, not in detail, in what particular the bill which has been reported by his committee differs from the bill which was before the Senate at the last session?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senate passed a bill and the House declined to act upon it, although there was a strong majority in the House for it. Everybody knew that. They signed a statement of a majority to show it. At the next session—Fifty-fourth Congress—another bill was reported in the House, and the identical House bill was reported here from this committee to the Senate, word for word. Therefore, in order to point out the differences, I will refer to the last bill. The last bill contained a provision that the Government of the United States, in consideration of indorsing the bonds of the Nicaragua Canal Company for the sum of $100,000,000, should receive $70,000,000 of stock of that company, that is, full paid-up stock. The bill limited the capital stock to $100,000,000. That every bill did which had been reported from any of the committees, whether the Committee on Foreign Relations or the select committee on the canal.

Now, let it be understood that all these bills were amendments to the charter. The charter provides that the company may have stock to the amount of $200,000,000 and may issue bonds to the amount of $200,000,000, if I remember aright, but the bill to which I now refer as showing the distinction between the bill now on the Calendar, which I have recently reported from the committee, and the bill which was reported in the House and also in the Senate during the last Congress, contained a provision amending the charter so as to reduce the capital stock to $100,000,000 and the right to issue bonds to $100,000,000, and it provided that the Government of the United States should receive $70,000,000 out of the $100,000,000 in stock in consideration of its guaranty of the bonds of the company. That left $30,000,000 of stock to be disposed of under the bill.

Six million dollars of that stock was to be given to Nicaragua because she had reserved that in her concession, and $1,500,000 was to be given to Costa Rica because she had reserved that in her concession. That is $7,500,000. Then the bill reported to the Fifty-fourth Congress provided for the payment of a sum of money or the issue of bonds, amounting to a sum not exceeding $4,000,000, to pay for the work which had been done upon the canal, and another sum of $6,000,000, I think, in that bill to enable this company to clear off certain issues of stock which it had made, and scrip for stock, and obligations which it was under to the construction company for building the canal. They agreed to take that as a condition of the bill becoming operative.

In the present bill the stock of the canal company is limited to $100,000,000. The power to issue bonds is limited to $100,000,000, and they are forbidden to issue any other bonds or to make any other obligations as security for any person or corporation whatever. Seventy million dollars of the stock is to be given to the United States in consideration of its guaranty of $100,000,000 of bonds, $6,000,000 is to be given to Nicaragua to fulfill the concession, and a million and a half to Costa Rica to fulfill the concession, and $5,000,000 of bonds of the company is to be issued to the present Maritime Canal Company, which this bill provides shall be reorganized—

Mr. CAFFERY. Are those bonds to be indorsed by the United States?

Mr. MORGAN. They are to be indorsed by the United States and be in full payment of all of the rights of that company of every kind, character, and description, and remain in the Treasury of the United States until the outstanding obligations, scrip, stock, and everything of that kind are brought in and canceled. That leaves $23,000,000 of stock of this company in the treasury of the company for working capital. It adds only $1,000,000 to the $4,000,000 that were proposed in all the preceding bills to pay these men for the actual expenditure of money they have made, and instead of giving them $6,000,000 for the purpose of clearing up the outstanding incumbrances, and everything of that sort, they are paid simply with $5,000,000.

Whether they can get through with that sum or not I do not know, but this bill is not predicated upon their consent. It is a savage bill; it is a harsh bill; but is one that seems to be made necessary by the condition of affairs that exists, and these men will bow their heads to the knife with as much sincere patriotism as any set of men who have ever lived in this country. The bill takes from them $6,000,000 in stock or other securities reserved to them in the concessions.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that he describe the organization, the board of directors.

Mr. MORGAN. The bill now on the Calendar creates a reorganization of the company. Who are the stockholders? Seventy millions of the stock is in the hands of the United States Government, six millions is in the hands of Nicaragua, and a million and a half in the hands of Costa Rica, and the three Republics are the stockholders. The other $23,000,000 of stock is left in the treasury of the company. Corresponding with that, the board of directors is reduced and fixed at eleven in number. Of this number, Nicaragua has one, Costa Rica has one, and the United States has nine. They are to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. I could go on with other various details, but I am speaking now of the difference between the two bills, and only of that.

Now, it will be seen that almost every objection conceivable or that has ever been urged is cleared up by this bill except one, and that is the objection that the United States ought to be the sovereign owner of the canal and of the ground over which it runs. That can not be without invading the sovereignty of Costa Rica and Nicaragua. We do not want to do that. It is not necessary to do it, and it would be an extremely harsh thing and would lead to war if we did it. So we do not want to do that. It would be very foolish to undertake that.

More than that, there is the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which never has been declared obsolete or abrogated, although many Senators, including myself, believe that we have a right to declare it abrogated, as having been abandoned. There it stands, with Great Britain holding her right under it, as she has always done—

Mr. BACON. Does not the Senator from Alabama hold that it is obsolete, not speaking of the declaration?

Mr. MORGAN. No; not without a declaration. It is not obsolete.

Mr. BACON. I thought that in the debate I had heard the Senator state that to be his position.

Mr. MORGAN. If I was arguing a case in the Supreme Court of the United States under that treaty, I should be obliged to admit that it was a valid treaty, a subsisting treaty; that the United States had the right to get rid of it, but that it had never done so.

Mr. BACON. I was not stating my view, but I understood what I stated to be the view of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. No; it is not. I never expressed that view.

There is the situation which we have been attempting to provide for in this bill which is before the Congress, and if I was standing on this floor for the last minute of my life, making my last appeal to the Senate of the United States, it would be: "Gentlemen, stay here for a few days until the Congress of the United States can pass a bill, with such amendments as you think ought to be put upon it, believing as I do that it is the most essential measure that is now in view for the welfare of the people of the United States, and absolutely indispensable, as has been recently demonstrated, for the defense of our coast."

Mr. President, I think I have presented in a tolerably clear way—not as fully as I probably would like to do if I had the opportunity to do so without giving any unnecessary detention to the Senate—a situation here that ought to be provided against immediately. I think the amendment which I offered to the bill, including the feature in regard to the Nicaraguan Canal, would settle almost every question that rests in the mind of any people foreign to the United States in respect of our determination to go on and build the canal. It is immensely important right now that the Government of the United States shall indicate in some way its positive determination to go on and construct the canal. We can not give up this canal, Mr. President, without releasing such an amount of the just power of the United States commercially and in a military sense as to weaken us almost incalculably.

But, sir, I find myself opposed by questions of order and by objections of a single Senator, so that my hands are tied upon this occasion and I can not move in any direction at all. I regret exceedingly that no expression of opinion can be obtained from the Senate of the United States by a vote to-day upon this proposition, for if I could get any expression of opinion in favor of the proposition of creating this as a fund in the Treasury, not a fund designated by earmarks, but a charge upon the Treasury subject to future appropriation, so that the money arising from the sale of the transcontinental railroads may be applied to opening a waterway for the relief of the people of the Pacific slope and of all the interior country by competitive lines of transportation, I would feel that very much had been accomplished; that, in fact, the whole business had been put upon such a foundation as that it would be absolute hereafter and indubitable. But, sir, I can not help myself.

I did not suppose that disconnected from the canal proposition I could be induced to vote for the settlement proposed of the debt of the Central Pacific Railroad. I have had as much to do with the investigation of that question as any gentleman on this floor, and I have done it with an honest conscience and without the slightest bias in any direction, for, as I have often observed, the State of Alabama stands in such relation to all the transcontinental railways as that we are absolutely impartial in respect of the success of any of them or the defeat of any of their purposes.

But, sir, here is a question of settling up the Central Pacific Railway debt on the basis of the settlement of the Union Pacific Railway debt, and that is a very important matter for the peace and welfare of this country. If we settle with the Central Pacific Railway on that basis, we still hold to the charter powers that exist now in the statute, and that railway line is subject to our authority just as it has been all the time. It is not so with the Union Pacific. That has slipped out of reach, or it is supposed to have done so.

In view of the great precedent to which I referred in my opening remarks as to the basis of settlement by receiving back the principal money and the interest we have actually paid out, I now announce my intention, if that will remove the objection to the consideration of this amendment, to vote first for the amendment proposed by the committee, without reference to the Nicaraguan Canal, and in doing so I will trust to the Senate of the United States to come up to the help of the country by giving to this canal such assistance as is indispensably necessary to its construction and also to its being withheld from the control of foreign powers.

Has any Senator ever contemplated for a moment what the agitation would be in the United States if it was announced that a corporation of some foreign government like the great Atlas Company had become the successor to the concessions that now exists in favor of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua under our laws? What would be the state of exasperation in the Senate of the United States, and in the country at large, upon the announcement of a statement like that? Mr. President, we have not encountered a question in a long time that would produce the same commotion, agitation, and anxiety in the country that such an announcement would make.

My opinion is (and my opinion is based upon a careful consideration of the facts as they exist, which can not be concealed) that the moment we turn our backs upon this proposition, in that moment we hesitate and refuse to announce our determination, so often expressed by Presidents and Secretaries of State and political conventions, as my friend from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS] suggests, that the canal shall be built and shall be an American canal under American control. What will that mean, sir, but the abandonment of a vital policy?

When the Senate of the United States was informed that the Government of France was about to inaugurate a lottery to build the Panama Canal, after it had gone to wreck and ruin and insolvency, the Committee on Foreign Relations reported a resolution here which passed, I think, without a dissenting voice, that the Government of the United States could not look with any toleration—I do not quote the language, but that is the idea—upon the intervention of any foreign government by any means whatever to build a canal across the Isthmus of Darien. That resolution passed this body unanimously, as I remember it. It was drawn by Mr. Edmunds, of Vermont, and was discussed here for some considerable time. That was in anticipation of what would take place if the Government of France should undertake to aid the Panama Canal, after it had broken down in the hands of its projectors, by merely organizing under the laws of France a lottery to raise the money to complete the canal. There is our attitude. We can not depart from it.

But, Mr. President, this is not a mere matter of sentiment. It has become one of the most real and important of all the questions that ever concerned the people of the United States. The idea that our coast lines on the East and West should be divided by 13,000 miles, when by digging this canal they would become practically continuous through that canal, it being a neutral canal, is something that the people of the United States at last have seen in such a practical way that there is no longer evading on the part of Congress of solemn and imperative duty to act upon this subject as soon as may be.

Now, sir, with the consent of my friends on the committee, if there is no objection made to it, I will separate this proposition.

Mr. WILSON. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator hopes it will not be done. Here is a member of the Nicaraguan Canal Committee who objects to it. Let it go as I have presented it. The Senator is right. Still I will vote for either proposition. It will rest with some other Senator to ask a division of the question.

Mr. WILSON. If I may be permitted to interrupt the Senator—

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. It seems to me that the construction of the canal is of vital importance not only to the Pacific coast, but to the entire country. There is an almost unanimous opinion throughout the country in favor of its construction, and the committee has arrived at a settlement of the entire matter. I think I can say that much.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. The committee has entirely settled this matter, and if it can be settled in this way by the Senate it is of the utmost importance that it should be acted upon.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, the Senator from Washington sees the situation. It is that a single objection prevents the consideration of this amendment unless the Senate chooses to vote the amendment on the bill by a vote that it is in order.

Mr. WILSON. It is more important, I may say, in my judgment, to our people that we should construct the canal than that we should settle with the Central Pacific Railroad.

Mr. MORGAN. I think it really would be far more important. At the same time, Mr. President, we can not have our own way about matters of this kind. I thought it was possible that the objection to the consideration of the amendment voted by the committee would not be made if I should ask to separate the two propositions.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, it is not suitable and proper that the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill, which is the great war appropriation bill of the session, covering more than $220,000,000, some of which is immediately needed for the war, should be prolonged by any outside matter. If the Senator from Alabama can submit a proposition here that will receive unanimous consent and not give rise to any further debate, I shall not make the point of order; but if debate is to proceed, in the interests of the great war appropriation bill which I have in charge I must insist on the point of order and ask the Chair to rule upon it as soon as the Senator is through. Otherwise we would go on and be here day after day upon the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Then, Mr. President, I will submit the proposition separately, just as it was reported by the committee originally.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the situation to be that the Senator from Alabama withdraws his amendment and offers on behalf of the committee the amendment which is in print, to be submitted to the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I do not withdraw the point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. HALE. I simply withhold it, and if the amendment as now proposed is to be complicated with other amendments and other discussion, I shall ask the Chair to rule upon it, because the point of order is plain, in order that debate and delay may be stopped.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator who has the bill in charge is not willing to make the point of order, I certainly will. We can not legislate on this great question on the pending bill in the last hours of the session.

Mr. HALE. Then I ask the ruling of the Chair on the point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HALE. Now, I hope the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Are there further amendments to the bill as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President—

Mr. TELLER. Perhaps I did not understand what the last amendment was. I understood that it was the Nicaraguan Canal proposition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That was withdrawn.

Mr. TELLER. And this is the amendment from the Committee on Pacific Railroads?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. TELLER. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. WILSON. If we are forced to withdraw a portion of the amendment which I think is of vital importance to my State and to our section and to the whole country, which has been demonstrated since the present war commenced, and if that portion of the amendment can not stay in, I shall have to make the point of order against the balance.

Mr. HALE. The Chair has already ruled on the point of order. So let the consideration of the bill be proceeded with.

Mr. TELLER. I made the objection under the supposition that it was the Nicaraguan question.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Washington objects on the other ground.

Mr. WILSON. That proposition is of importance—just as vital to us as the other.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida was recognized.

Mr. PASCO. I submit an amendment to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, after line 8, insert the following:

For the payment in full of John D. Sands, a watchman employed in the public building at Key West, Fla., for the fiscal year 1894, $193.91, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. HALE. There is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PASCO. I wish to put in the RECORD in connection with the amendment two letters from the Treasury Department.

Mr. HALE. There is no need to put in the letters.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letters will be printed in the RECORD, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The letters referred to are as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., March 23, 1893.

SIR: Referring to your letter of the 19th instant, in reference to a claim in favor of John D. Sands, for service as watchman at the custom-house, Key West, Fla., from July 1 to October 2, 1894, I have the honor to inclose herewith a copy of a letter written April 25, 1896, by this Department to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate, in regard to said claim.

Respectfully, yours,

L. J. GAGE,
Secretary.

Hon. S. PASCO,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., April 25, 1896.

SIR: The Department is in receipt of your letter dated April 21, 1896, inclosing a copy of amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. Call to the bill (H. R. 7664) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, for the payment of John D. Sands, a watchman employed at Key West, Fla., on the public building, $250, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and requesting to have the views of this Department upon the matter.

In reply I have the honor to state that the records of this office show that John D. Sands was transferred from the customs service to the custodian's force, custom-house building, Key West, Fla., on April 25, 1894, as a watchman, with compensation at the rate of $720 per annum.

Owing to the insufficiency of the appropriation to which Mr. Sands's salary would have been chargeable during the fiscal year 1895, his term of service was limited by the Department to June 30, 1894, notwithstanding which, however, the custodian, upon his own responsibility, continued the employment of Mr. Sands to October 2, 1894.

There is no question that the services of a watchman at the building were essential, and the custodian of the custom-house has, from time to time, certified to the Department that Mr. Sands actually performed the duties of the position.

Should the services of Mr. Sands have been authorized by the Department there would be due him from July 1 to October 2, 1894, for salary at the rate of $720 per annum, the sum of $193.91.

Respectfully, yours,

S. WIKE,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. W. B. ALLISON,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. WILSON. At the earnest solicitation of the Senator from Nevada—

Mr. HALE. I can not consent that the bill shall now be embarrassed, and I hope there will be no debate.

Mr. STEWART. There will be no debate.

Mr. HALE. I can not consent. Other Senators have notified me that the point of order will be renewed.

Mr. WILSON. I understand I have the floor. I was recognized by the Chair, and I want to make my statement with the permission again of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I do not object to the Senator, but I can not—

Mr. WILSON. The Senator can not object. He has it not in his power to object until I make the statement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington is in order.

Mr. WILSON. I will make the statement, and then the Senator can object to what I state or make a point of order after I have made the statement.

Mr. HALE. I could cut the Senator off if I wanted, but I do not wish to do so.

Mr. WILSON. I will leave that to the Chair. I addressed the Chair and the Chair recognized the Senator from Washington. The Senator from Maine states that he can cut me off if he wants, but I doubt his power in that respect.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair informs the Senator from Washington that he is in order, and he will proceed.

Mr. HALE (to Mr. WILSON). Go on.

Mr. WILSON. Again I have the permission of the Senator from Maine, Mr. President.

At the solicitation of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] and also the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR], and with the consent of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], I withdraw my point of order on the amendment. I trust that I am in order. I will again ask the Senator from Maine if I am now in order.

Mr. HALE. The Senator has my entire good will and permission to go on or to stop, as he chooses.

Mr. WILSON. I made the statement as requested by those gentlemen, with the consent of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. GEAR. I ask unanimous consent to offer the amendment. I will say that if it gives rise to three minutes' debate I will withdraw it.

Mr. HALE. If one word of debate is made upon that or any amendment, I shall insist on the point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa will offer his amendment.

Mr. GEAR. I will state that the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] has an amendment which he wants to make limiting the time, which we accept and will be glad to have adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, after line 21, insert:

SETTLEMENT WITH THE CENTRAL PACIFIC AND WESTERN PACIFIC RAILROADS.

That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Attorney-General, and their successors in office, be, and they are hereby, appointed a commission with full power to settle the indebtedness to the Government growing out of the issue of bonds in aid of the construction of the Central Pacific and Western Pacific bond-aided railroads, upon such terms and in such manner as may be agreed upon by them, or by a majority of them, and the owners of said railroads: Provided, That any and all settlements thus made shall be submitted in writing to the President for his approval or disapproval, and unless approved by him shall not be binding.

That said commission shall not agree to accept a less sum in settlement of the amount due the United States than the full amount of the principal and unpaid interest due at the time of said settlement: And also provided, That said commission are hereby empowered to grant such time or times of payment by installment, and at such rates of interest, to be not less than 3 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, and with such security as to said commission may seem expedient.

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $30,000 to defray the expenses of said commission in making the said settlement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the amendment, and that the amendment may be included in the bill?

Mr. PERKINS. My colleague [Mr. WHITE] has prepared two amendments. He has them in his desk. They were submitted to myself and others and we have approved of them. I am not prepared to offer the amendments in the form he has them.

Mr. GEAR. I will state the amendment.

Mr. WHITE entered the Chamber.

Mr. PERKINS. My colleague is now here.

Mr. GEAR. The Senator from California will offer his amendment to the amendment in regard to the settlement with the Central Pacific and the Western Pacific railroads.

Mr. HALE. I withhold my objection until I see whether the amendment gives rise to any debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. WHITE. I will try and be quite brief.

Mr. HALE. I have said to other Senators that if it gives rise to any debate I shall object.

Mr. STEWART. The amendment has been offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR].

Mr. WHITE. I do not think anybody will question what I say, and therefore it will not be debate. In line 5, page 2 of the amendment, I move to strike out the word "unpaid" before the word "interest."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. Also, in the same line and in the next line I move to strike out the words "due at the time of said settlement" and insert in lieu of the words stricken out the words "and all amounts necessary to reimburse the United States for moneys paid for interest or otherwise."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GEAR. I accept that amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. On line 11, page 2, I move to insert what I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 11, page 2, insert the following proviso:

Provided, however, That in any settlement that may be made the final payment and full discharge of said indebtedness shall not be postponed to exceed ten years, and the whole amount, principal and interest, shall be paid in equal semiannual installments within the period so limited, and in any settlement made it shall be provided that if default shall be made in any payment of either principal or interest or any part thereof, then the whole sum and all installments, principal and interest, shall immediately become due and payable, notwithstanding any other stipulation of said settlement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the amendment to the amendment? The Chair hears none; and the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH. Let the amendment be read as amended.

Mr. WHITE. It is all right.

Mr. ALDRICH. It is a very important matter. It may be all right, but I should like to hear it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment as it will read as modified.

Mr. HALE. Let that clause of the amendment be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

That said commission shall not agree to accept a less sum in settlement of the amount due the United States than the full amount of the principal and interest and all amounts necessary to reimburse the United States for moneys paid for interest or otherwise: And also provided, That said commission are hereby empowered to grant such time or times of payment by installment, and at such rates of interest, to be not less than 3 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, and with such security as to said commission may seem expedient: Provided, however, That in any settlement that may be made the final payment and full discharge of said indebtedness shall not be postponed to exceed ten years, and the whole amount, principal and interest, shall be paid in equal semiannual installments within the period so limited, and in any settlement made it shall be provided that if default shall be made in any payment of either principal or interest, or any part thereof, then the whole sum and all installments, principal and interest, shall immediately become due and payable, notwithstanding any other stipulation of said settlement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I desire simply to say with reference to the amendment just adopted at my suggestion, and which is now in this bill, that while I do not approve of any deferring of payment at all, I have deemed it best to perfect the amendment, or to get it as near perfect as practicable, and with that view have proposed the amendment which has been accepted.

Mr. BACON. I desire to ask the Senator from California a question, for all the explanation we have had on this matter has necessarily been limited to one reading of it. I desire to know whether, under the provisions of this amendment which has been adopted, the parties who are charged with the responsibility and power of this settlement will be authorized to take anything less than the amount of the principal and interest?

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. BACON. I ask for information, as I could not judge from the reading.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to say to the Senator from Georgia that as the amendment is now amended it provides for the payment of the full amount, and another amendment, which was adopted by the Senate at my suggestion, limits the final payment to ten years, and a default as to any payment of principal or interest will make the whole due and payable forthwith.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass? The bill was passed.

QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT, UNITED STATES ARMY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4809) to increase the efficiency of the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, and requesting a conference with the Senate thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives and accede to the request for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. CARTER, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

SUBSISTENCE DEPARTMENT, UNITED STATES ARMY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4810) to increase the efficiency of the Subsistence Department of the Army, and requesting a conference with the Senate thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives and accede to the request for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. CARTER, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 10424) to provide for a temporary increase in the Inspector-General's Department of the Army;

A bill (H. R. 10561) to increase the force of the Ordnance Department;

A bill (H. R. 10685) fixing pay and allowances of chaplains for volunteer regiments; and

A bill (H. R. 10805) to amend the act relating to pay of volunteer soldiers.

ANNEXATION OF THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 259) to provide for annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, when I concluded my remarks yesterday afternoon I was discussing the testimony respecting the proposition that the Hawaiian revolution of 1893 was procured and carried to a successful consummation by the use of the military forces of the United States. I had cited the testimony of a number of witnesses, all of whom were adherents of the provisional government installed in the manner stated. I have consumed considerable time of the Senate in reading, or in having read, the testimony of these witnesses. I will refer to their testimony further, and will ask that the testimony be incorporated in the RECORD without reading, unless specially demanded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Is there any objection to the request made by the Senator from Louisiana? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CAFFERY. From this memorandum of Smith, Castle, Cooper, and others, written down at the time of the occurrences which it narrates by one of the participants in the revolution, it appears that the committee of thirteen was a self-constituted body, and met at the office of Mr. Smith on 15th of January, 1893.

It was admitted by and among them that they had neither arms nor organization, and that the Queen had all the force and organization there was on the island.

The first thing discussed was the question of a protectorate by the United States through the military forces on the Boston, and the next was to send a committee to Minister Stevens to find out what aid he could render. Without waiting for his colleagues on the committee, Mr. Thurston immediately waited on Minister Stevens, informed him of the revolutionary plans, and desired to know what he could do. Mr. Stevens told him that whatever government was established and was in possession of the government building, executive departments, and archives, "and in possession of the city, that was a de facto government, proclaiming itself as a government, would necessarily have to be recognized."

I desire to offer the testimony of Judge H. A. Widemann, detailing the circumstances of the Queen's surrender and the quiet of the city of Honolulu at the time of the surrender, to be found on page 535, Executive Document No. 47, Fifty-third Congress, second session, House of Representatives.

The testimony referred to is as follows:

Interview with Judge H. A. Widemann, Honolulu, May 20, 1893.

Mr. BLOUNT. Judge, where were you born?

A. Hanover, Germany.

Q. How long have you lived here?

A. Forty-seven years.

Q. What offices have you held in that time?

A. I have held every office this country can give. Sheriff of the island of Kana'i in 1854; circuit judge there in 1863, and deputy governor of that island at the same time. I held, also, a great many smaller offices from 1854 to 1865—tax collector, school inspector, road supervisor; chief clerk of the interior office in 1865; associate justice of the supreme court in 1869; minister of the interior in 1874. During those years I have been privy councillor, member of the board of health, and member of the board of education. I was a noble from 1881 to 1887, appointed by the King. I was elected noble in 1887 to 1892. February, 1892, I was taken ill and Mott Smith took my place, and when he went to Washington I got well and took the place back. That brings us up to date.

Q. On January 17, 1893, it is reported that the ministers of Liliuokalani, with the Hon. S. M. Damon, went to the palace and held a consultation with the Queen on the subject of her yielding to the movement for a provisional government. Were you there?

A. I was there at the Queen's request.

Q. Will you be kind enough to tell me in a general way what was said and done?

A. There were present, besides the ministers, Samuel Damon, Judge Carter, Paul Neumann, and myself.

Q. What was the subject-matter of the interview?

A. It was a communication from the provisional government touching her being turned out of office, her deposition, which had been sent her in the course of the day. I objected to reading the document; I didn't know but it might be insulting. The Queen's Government was then in possession of the barracks and the police station where the arms and ammunition were. The question was whether she should make opposition to the provisional government. The advice given was that we were too weak to oppose the United States forces, and consequently that she should surrender. The police station was surrendered immediately after the consultation. We were there perhaps an hour in this consultation. Whilst we were Mr. Stevens's letter to the Queen's ministers, saying he had recognized the provisional government, was read by Sam Parker. Her Majesty's minister of foreign affairs, Mr. Neumann and Joe Carter were appointed a committee of two to draw up a protest for Her Majesty. We waited until they had done so. We all approved of that protest, and then the Queen signed it.

Q. Was it dark then?

A. It was after dark; lamps were lighted.

Q. What was the condition of the city as to quiet when the troops were landed on the day before?

A. There were no people on the street. It was as quiet as things could be. I went to the palace to speak to the Queen. I told her that the soldiers had landed and were coming toward the palace. Fearing lest they should attack the palace, I advised Her Majesty to be ready to go with them if they should come to her and ask her to go with them. I said this in my consternation upon seeing foreign troops landed in a peaceful country when there was no show of any disturbance.

Q. Was that consternation pretty general?

A. Most decidedly it was.

Q. Did that state of mind continue until the dethronement of the Queen and the surrender of the barracks and station house?

A. Yes; until we heard of the establishment of the provisional government, and then we knew what was what.

Q. Everything quiet after that?

A. Everything was quiet. There was not a dog bark or a cock crow.

Q. Were you in the legislature in 1892?

A. I was a member by appointment as a minister.

Q. Will you be kind enough to tell me how many parties were represented in that Legislature and by what names they were designated?

A. Three parties and some Independents, National Reform, Reform, and Liberal.

Q. How many members had each of these?

A. Nine National Reform; 14 Reform; 21 Liberals, and 4 Independents.

Q. Who were the 4 Independents?

A. R. B. Hind, J. Marsden, W. H. Cornwell, and A. Drier.

Q. How do those four gentlemen stand on the subject of annexation?

A. At the present moment?

Q. Yes.

A. Marsden is an annexation man. Hind is not, Cornwell is not, and Drier is not. I am sure of those two. I am not sure of Hind.

Q. Twenty-five was a majority of the legislature?

A. Yes.

Q. Did any one of these parties have that number?

A. No.

Q. How did it happen that so many cabinets were nominated and voted out on want of confidence in 1892?

A. In the beginning of the session there was no possibility for uniting the parties to vote out a ministry. The first cabinet held until September. In September W. A. Whiting, attorney-general, resigned, and Paul Neumann was appointed in his place. E. C. Macfarlane, with several others of the National Reform party, sided with the Reform party, and got also a few of the natives to side with them, and voted out the first cabinet.

Q. Why did Macfarlane make this move?

A. He objected to Neumann, a party member, going into the cabinet without the consent of the party.

Q. What party did Neumann belong to?

A. The National Reform. The Neumann cabinet did not meet the approval of the Reform party.

Q. Who were at the head of the new cabinet?

A. Sam Parker, Neumann, Macfarlane, and a man by the name of Gulick. It did not meet the approval of the Reform party, and, in consequence, after a week or two they were voted out.

Q. By what parties in the legislature?

A. Then it was a conglomeration, party lines completely gone. Macfarlane burst the party lines. They were voted out after a fortnight. The Reform party laid down the principle that the Queen should appoint a cabinet from the members of the party that voted out a cabinet. The Reform party never voted out any cabinet because they could not on account of lack of numbers. Then the new cabinet was appointed. They lasted about half an hour or twenty minutes. They were voted out again. A new cabinet was appointed which satisfied the Reform party.

Q. Was that the Wilcox cabinet?

A. Yes. When I returned from San Francisco—I was gone about two months—they were voted out. They got just 25 votes to vote them out.

Q. What party voted them out?

A. The Liberal party—the native element.

Q. They must have had some other party to help them.

A. The National Reform party.

Q. Then a new cabinet was appointed?

A. Yes.

Q. Was that ever voted out?

A. No.

Q. It was appointed the day before the Legislature was prorogued?

A. Yes; on Friday.

Q. What was the cause of all this turning out of cabinets?

A. The great desire on the part of a great number of the members of the house to get into the cabinet themselves.

Q. The hope of getting into the cabinet made these combinations possible and successful?

A. Yes.

Q. Who were the members who wanted to be ministers?

A. John Ena, E. C. Macfarlane, A. P. Peterson, J. A. Cummins, J. N. S. Williams, Paul Neumann, J. Marsden, Alex. Young, W. H. Cornwell, W. C. Wilder, C. W. Ashford, R. W. Wilcox, J. E. Bush, J. Nawahl, William White, and W. O. Smith.

Q. Was the last Wilcox cabinet constituted wholly of Reformers?

A. Yes.

Q. This left out of the cabinet any representation from the National Reform or Liberal parties?

A. Yes.

Q. Did that produce any dissatisfaction among aspirants for cabinet places?

A. Decidedly. It produced strong dissatisfaction among the Liberal party. They had been told before they would come in. Bush would have cut his throat before he would have sided with the Reformers but for the idea that he would get in himself.

Q. Is he an annexationist now?

A. No; he is an antiannexationist.

Q. On the voting out of the second cabinet, I think, you said they went all to pieces; there were no parties?

A. Yes.

Q. Am I to understand that they just turned loose in a sort of scramble for cabinet places?

A. That was the simple reason for it.

Q. Was there ever a time when the Reform party had anything like a majority of that body?

A. Not in 1892.

I have read the foregoing and pronounce it an accurate report of my interview with Mr. Blount.

H. A. WIDEMANN.

HONOLULU, June 10, 1893.

Judge Widemann, June 15, 1893.

Chief Justice Judd, who understands the native language, says "he heard the Queen's speech on the 14th of January. She said to the crowd she would proclaim a new constitution hereafter." She used the words "ma kela man la." These words may signify a few days, a few months, or a few years. The term is indefinite. It may be one hundred years. It is equivalent to the expression, "one of these days."

This conversation was at noon on Monday, January 16, 1893.

H. A. WIDEMANN.

No. 55.

Interview with H. A. Widemann.

I beg to state that I lived in Honolulu in January and February last past and took due notice of all the events that took place during those months. In the latter days of January and on the 1st of February everything was as quiet as could possibly be, and there was no reason whatsoever to fear or be apprehensive of danger to property or danger to life or limb of any man, woman, or child.

I did consider then, and do consider now, that the hoisting here of the American flag at that time for the protection of life and property was absolutely unnecessary.

H. A. WIDEMANN.

HONOLULU, July 15, 1893.

Mr. CAFFERY. I also offer the statement of the Hawaiian Patriotic League, commencing on page 445 of the same document. The statement referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE HAWAIIAN PATRIOTIC LEAGUE.

His Excellency GROVER CLEVELAND,

President of the United States of America.

SIR: The undersigned are the officers and executive committee of the Hui Hawaiian Aloha Aina (Hawaiian Patriotic League), a political association, with branches in every district of the Kingdom, representing, together with a large following of foreigners, over 7,500 native-born Hawaiian qualified voters throughout the islands (out of a total of 13,000 electors), and to which is annexed a woman's branch of over 11,000 members.

This league was formed for the purpose of uniting the efforts of all who love this country as an independent Commonwealth, and of insuring by all legitimate methods the perpetuation of the autonomy of the Hawaiian Kingdom and the restoration of its legitimate sovereign, Queen Liliuokalani, who was ruthlessly and wantonly deposed by a mob of foreign flibusters, abetted by the United States minister resident and shielded by the United States forces, which were by him landed on their behalf, in violation of all international laws.

The Queen, though having ample force to quell the insurgents, yielded her throne, not to them, but "to the superior forces of the United States," in order to avoid useless bloodshed. She then appealed to the Government of the great Republic for justice and redress, and she carefully instructed her people to quietly submit to the rule of the usurping provisional government pending the result of her appeal.

Our patriotic league, following the sovereign's intentions, has also repeatedly warned its members to keep the peace, under every provocation, and wait with patience the judgment of the United States Government; and while we can boast of having up to the present time successfully subdued every popular tendency for agitation or armed resistance, we must also proclaim, to the credit of the Hawaiian people, that they have behaved with a discipline, a decorum, and a forbearance which we believe no other nation on earth would have shown under similar circumstances, that of a country not conquered, but confiscated by a faction of aliens.

But it is now already several months that the provisional government have assumed the reins and instated, under the protection of the American flag, a true pretorian tyranny, without any regard for popular rights and wishes or for constitutional principles. And the people's patience is wearing out, looking anxiously for a solution from the United States Government (hitherto our great friend and constant protector) and expecting by every incoming mail some action, no sign of which is yet forthcoming.

In the meanwhile the situation here is growing highly unsatisfactory—every day worse—and loud complaints are heard from all sides. The provisional government have succeeded in making themselves unpopular even with their adherents, and their rule is becoming daily more odious to the natives, who are not even granted the shadow of a representation in their councils. The Hawaiians generally are being dismissed from public service to make room for hungry foreigners, adherents of the provisional government; and, as if to incite a revolt, the native feelings have been purposely aggravated by the desecration of the royal palace, and by numerous other instances of petty despotism, which can not fail to be galling to the real citizens of this country. In their administration they are exceeding all the possible rights of a provisional government in repealing statutes made by the lawful representative legislature, and enacting an interminable string of new laws, some of which are simply useless or childish, though vexatious, others really obnoxious. In their financial policy the provisional government compromise the future to meet the present extravagant wants, hoping that "Uncle Sam will pay the bills."

All public works and improvements are virtually at a standstill, whilst they are squandering the public funds in the maintenance of a mercenary soldiery, recruited from runaway sailors, escaped criminals from other countries, or other bad characters from the slums of San Francisco, who are extravagantly paid and live luxuriously at the expense of the honest taxpayer. And the money thus wasted could be used to much better advantage at the present time by furnishing useful work to the deserving and suffering laboring classes.

All these and other substantial grounds for the general discontent make it an incontrovertible fact that the provisional government are incapable of maintaining themselves in power except through the help and propping up of the United States Government. Left to their own resources they would not be saved, even by their large force of alien mercenaries, who are their only supporters, but who remain so prudently, cautiously, intrenched in the royal palace, trembling every night for fear of some attack, the idea even of which has never yet been entertained by the royalists.

But the obvious and utter weakness and unpopularity of our self-assumed administration have thrown a general veil of uncertainty and uneasiness on the whole country, whereby all transactions are paralyzed and the value of real estate reduced to naught, even the government bonds, which have always been above par, having lost nearly 10 per cent. Every kind of business has become seriously depressed, the working classes are suffering for want of work, and the wheels of progress and industry are stopped, threatening stagnation and disaster, whereby all classes are becoming impatient, the natives chafing under the insults of the provisional government and beginning to talk of revolt, and the foreign element of our league beginning to press for relief from a situation which has evoked many bitter enmities.

To render the matter still more serious the time is waxing near when the taxes are becoming due, and there is a general disposition to refuse to pay any money to the present Government until things are settled by the United States' decision. Of course a general refusal of taxes would precipitate serious complications; but, as the situation is now, already it is only through the greatest vigilance that the patriotic league manages to repress the feelings of its members. And if the present condition continues a while longer, the result may be an outbreak that the patriotic league, hitherto the leading influence of the country, will be unable to prevent, and lives and property may be jeopardized.

Truly, therefore, may it be said that the situation is growing intolerable and delay unbearable; and there will be, there can be, no relief until the United States Government has determined our future, and thereby a permanent legal government has been put in power here.

Under the circumstances, which the public press openly and justly qualifies as "disastrous and deplorable," we, the undersigned, are moved, in answer to our league's wish, to take the liberty of addressing your excellency, through your accredited minister here, Hon. J. H. Blount, and of respectfully saying that since the fate of our little Kingdom and its inhabitants is in your hands, we do humbly pray that a speedy solution may be reached to avoid impending calamities, and so that we may once more enjoy the blessings of peace, prosperity, and a proper government.

That the natives have as yet been quiet, apparently apathetic, must not be construed as meaning that they are gradually accepting the new order of things, by which they are deprived of all their rights in their own country. They are simply waiting, in their simple faith in the generosity and honor of the most liberal and honorable Government of the world; and they expect justice, id est, restoration of their legitimate sovereign. And the American Government must now be sufficiently well informed of the enormous injustice committed against this defenseless and peaceful nation, so that it seems to us that little or no doubt can yet be entertained by any impartial mind as to what ought to be the proper course for dealing with the "faits accomplis" here, and no doubt as to the true royalist sentiments of the large majority of our people.

But owing, as we represent, to the gathering storm, all good citizens are anxious that no more delay than actually unavoidable should now occur in the settling of this matter; and, therefore, if it is considered by your Government necessary for the question to be referred to Congress, we do respectfully, but most earnestly, fervidly beseech, in the name of our people, that it be submitted, if possible, to this now coming extra session.

And we further pray that Almighty God will vouchsafe you and your Government His divine guidance in assisting you to deal fairly and justly with an unhappy nation whose sole hope lies in you.

Most respectfully, your excellency's humble servants,

J. A. Cummings, honorary president; Joseph Nawahi, president; Jno. E. Bush, vice-president; J. W. Bihikana, vice-president; John Lole Kaulukou, vice-president; J. E. Kaunaulano, vice-president; James K. Merseburg, John Kapumawaho Prendergast, Abraham K. Palekaluhi, Sam'l K. Aki, H. S. Swinton, Jas. K. Kaulia, secretary; S. M. Kaaukai, W. L. Holokahiki, Jno. Sam. Kikukahiko, L. W. P. Kanealii, J. Kekipi, F. S. Keiki, J. Mahiai Kaneakua.

HONOLULU, July 15, 1898.

Mr. CAFFERY. I also offer the testimony of Mr. F. Wundenberg, clerk of the supreme court, who was offered the collectorship of the port of Honolulu under the new government. His testimony is on page 90 of the same document.

The testimony referred to is as follows:

INTERVIEW OF MR. WUNDENBERG.

MAY 15, 1898.

Q. Where were you born?

A. On the island of Kauai.

Q. How long have you lived in the islands?

A. I was born in 1850 and have lived here ever since.

Q. What are you engaged in?

A. At present I am deputy clerk of the supreme court.

Q. Have you been recently offered the position of collector-general of customs?

A. I have.

Q. Did you decline it?

A. I did.

Q. I see in the correspondence between the American minister at this point and the State Department the allegation that Mr. Wilson is the paramour of the Queen. What knowledge have you of the relations between these parties?

A. Queen Liliuokalani, before she was Queen, was in the habit of providing for a number of Hawaiian girls, in some cases educating them at her own expense, bringing them into society, and teaching them manners, dancing, and all that sort of business, and providing them with suitable husbands. Miss Townsend, the present wife of Wilson, is one of her beneficiaries, and her marriage with Wilson was brought about in the same way. Mrs. Wilson was Emmeline Townsend. She was a particular personal friend of Liliuokalani, always attended her, acted as a sort of maid of honor, and that relation has existed right up to the present time.

Wilson in that way became the intimate acquaintance and friend of Liliuokalani, and he also was the personal friend of Dominis. Wilson was fond of horse racing and fond of shooting and rowing—and the old governor was a great sportsman. He was fond of boats; he had the best boats. He tried to have the best horses; prided himself on the best guns. Wilson was an admirer of all that sort of thing, and they naturally drifted together in that way. That was prior to Liliuokalani being Queen. After she became Queen, Dominis was in ill health, and the revolution of 1887 had taken place; the Wilcox riot had taken place, and the woman was in constant dread of something of the kind, and Wilson, being near to her person, and a reliable friend of hers, and a man of known courage, it was the most natural thing in the world that she would want him to be marshal. She insisted upon it.

Loper at that time was marshal. Loper, as well as most of us, had taken a hand in the affair of 1887. She wanted things in shape that she could feel she had control of things. The station house was an arsenal. They kept arms there, and ordnance; cannon, Gatling guns, etc., had been removed in 1887 down there and placed under the charge of Marshal Loper, who was in sympathy and connection with the 1887 party. So when she came in power it was one of the first demands she made, that some of her friends should be placed in charge of that institution. I was postmaster then, and one of the demands made was that I should be removed, and I was removed on account of my affiliation with the 1887 party.

Q. The change from Loper to Wilson gave offense to the other side—the Reform party?

A. There was a little interregnum in which another man named Hopkins was put in temporary charge before Wilson formally took office, but practically Wilson followed Loper. This little administration of Hopkins did not amount to anything.

Q. Wilson going in there gave offense to the Reform party?

A. No; nothing seemed to be said about it. After they began to find things were going against them, and the results of the elections of 1890—the National Reform party swept the field—then they began their old games of attacking through the press. They attacked everybody and everything—not only Wilson, but everybody. If a chicken thief was caught, Wilson was held up for ridicule. For every drunk, robbery, etc., Wilson was blamed. They attacked him broadcast through the press.

Q. Any efforts made to impeach him?

A. I do not think so; not to my knowledge.

Q. Where was he born?

A. Wilson is the son of the English consul at Tahiti, by a Tahitian chieftess.

Q. Did he come here as a boy?

A. Yes. He is about the same age I am. I am rather better informed than anybody else regarding Wilson. My mother, the daughter of missionaries, was born in Tahiti and was well acquainted with the Wilson family.

Q. How old was he when he came here?

A. His father was interested in shipping ventures, and among other places of trade, I think, either owned totally, or in connection with other parties, Fanning's Island. He had interests there, and it was in one of these trading voyages that he was lost. Old Captain English, who is here now, took the two boys—the brothers—and carried them to Fanning's Island. They lived there, and when they were old enough the old man brought them here and put them to school. That was in the early fifties. I think they went to school with Captain Smith.

Q. How old would that make him?

A. About 43 years old. As was usually the case with half-whites of that class, they did not have the best opportunities for education. After they got the ordinary rudiments they would be put to a trade. He was put to a trade. He learned the blacksmith's trade. He was a man of strong character and ability. He dropped that and went into Government employ. He was made superintendent of waterworks and made a good one.

Q. What sort of marshal did he make?

A. An exceptionally good one.

Q. Was that generally the opinion?

A. I do not think they have ever had a marshal here at any time who could equal him, and I think it would be a hard matter to get anyone—with this one exception—like most of the natives Wilson was careless in money matters. I have to admit that Wilson was careless.

Q. Behind in his accounts?

A. In his business arrangements he has been careless. When he was superintendent of waterworks he got behind considerably. I saw his difficulties. There was a shortage of something like nine or ten thousand dollars. We advanced the money for him—myself and the present Queen. That transaction was open to explanation. I think Wilson was made residuary legatee of a long series of old fossils. It had been considered a place of no importance. They kept accounts very badly. They kept a system of receipt books with stubs. The investigation was held by Gulick. These stubs were added up and Wilson was made to account for it. I can not say whether he was responsible for it.

Q. Did he ever live in the palace with the Queen?

A. I do not think Wilson ever lived in the palace. Wilson and his wife occupied the bungalow.

Q. How far is that from the palace?

A. It is located in the corner of Richard and Palace Walk, in the palace yard. I know that Wilson and his wife occupied some of the apartments. The other apartments were occupied by others of her household, servants and retainers. She occupied the palace herself, or lived in her own place, at Washington place.

Q. How far is the bungalow from the palace?

A. Sixty or 100 yards. I used to visit him at times. The palace stands in the middle of the square.

Q. Have you ever heard it stated from any reliable source that Mr. Wilson was lodged in the palace?

A. Never.

Q. How was the Queen received here in society?

A. She was always received here with the greatest respect.

Q. Please illustrate what you mean by that.

A. No entertainment of any importance—reception, ball—was considered complete without the presence of the Queen. The chief justice on one occasion gave a ball or entertainment of some kind; I think it was a reception to Armstrong. I was present. The Queen was there. The chief justice was very attentive to the Queen. W. B. Castle gave an entertainment not a great while ago at his residence to some children, which the Queen attended. Castle was extremely attentive to her. In fact, whenever the so-called missionary party gave any entertainment they were always desirous of having the Queen. She received the most marked attention from them.

Q. Were these ladies active in social life about the place?

A. Yes; whenever the Queen would give entertainments these people always attended.

Q. With as much freedom as other classes of people?

A. I think so.

Q. You spoke of the Queen educating Hawaiian girls. At what school?

A. At a number of schools. The school I am most acquainted with is Kawaiahae Seminary.

Q. Who were the teachers there?

A. Miss Bingham was the principal. Latterly they have been compelled to send abroad to get assistance. The management was always in the hands of the missionaries. It is a missionary institution.

Q. Did she generally prefer that institution for these girls?

A. I think most of the girls have been educated there. I think she has had several educated at Maui, at Makawao Seminary, another institution.

Q. Are you a man of family?

A. No, sir; I am not a married man. We are a very large family. I have a number of sisters living here.

Q. Did they associate with the Queen without reserve, as other people here?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you feel like they were with a reputable person?

A. Yes; I never felt anything out of the way. In fact, I know that a great many people at times would feel slighted if they did not receive invitations to attend entertainments there.

Q. Were you one of the active participants in the revolution of 1887?

A. I was an active participant in the events of 1887. I was not a leader.

Q. Please tell me the cause of that revolution.

A. I want to say that the reasons and causes that actuated different participants were no doubt numerous. The mainspring was the same missionary party. They were smarting under defeats they had sustained repeatedly from Gibson. They had used large amounts of money in attempting to control the elections, but Gibson seemed to have a strong influence on the King and defeated them and held his power. I think, over a period of six years, and the King, under his direction, was allowed to go into all kinds of follies. This "Kaimiloa" escapade was one. The King had the idea in his head for some time previous of causing a confederation of the Pacific islands. I have never heard him say he was ambitious of becoming emperor of the Pacific, as has been attributed to him.

Gibson, who was too astute and farseeing to believe in anything of the kind, still felt it was necessary to humor him in a number of these projects, of which this was one. That escapade is familiar with everybody. They sent Bush down there and it resulted in disaster. That was made one of the ostensible reasons. Also the opium scandal. There had always been a great deal said regarding the opium business; some thought it should be entirely prohibited, others thought it was impossible to do so. They favored licensing the business. A bill passed the Legislature authorizing licenses. Then the Chinese began to bid for these licenses and that resulted in what is known as the Ah Ki scandal, in which it is claimed that the King received sixty or seventy thousand dollars to let a certain Chinese firm have the license. That was another cause put forward.

Q. Did they make him pay that back?

A. Yes; his estate paid that back, eventually.

Q. Was it generally believed that he acted corruptly in that matter?

A. Yes; those are the ostensible reasons put forward, and general extravagance and mismanagement of finances. That led up to this business.

Q. What do you mean by ostensible reasons; were there any other reasons behind these?

A. I do not know that I would have any right to put forward convictions and beliefs which lead from way back. I do not think that these reasons, though they were powerful agents at the time, were the only cause. I think it was the persistent determination of a clique here to get the power again which Gibson had wrested from it.

Q. They had been directing public affairs up to Gibson's time?

A. Yes.

Q. And during that time lost control?

A. Yes. To go back a little farther, the same party had held power in various forms and degrees up to about 1833. I think then that the decline of Dr. Judd's power began. He held despotic sway under Kamehameha III. In 1833 a committee of thirteen, representing people who had become tired of this arbitrary rule of Dr. Judd, waited on the King and demanded his removal from power. From that time, over a period of twenty years, is where the country received the very best administration it ever got, from men like Robert C. Wiley, Judge Lee, and, in later days, Harris and Hutchinson—men of that style. That carried through the reigns of Kamehameha IV and V. The missionaries were out of power. These men would not tolerate them at all.

Q. Was there extravagance then?

A. That was the very best period of Hawaiian history. That was the foundation of the Hawaiian Islands being received into the family of nations. She took her standing under the guidance of Wiley and Harris. At the death of Kamehameha V. Lunalilo came in and the missionaries regained their power through him. He was the highest chief living, but an intemperate fellow. He was as good a fellow as ever lived. He was a drunkard. Missionaries went into power under him. He lived a year, then came Kalakaua. They continued their hold on affairs during the early part of Kalakaua's reign, until Gibson came in. He overthrew them, I think, in 1880. Gibson reigned supreme in 1880. He was returned to the legislature in 1880 and held power to 1887. Kalakaua was extravagant, and Gibson, in order to hold his power, had to yield to a good many of the King's follies in that way. If Gibson had received generous support from outside he would have been able to hold the King in check, but in order to hold his power he had to yield to the King in order to hold his position against opposition. The chamber of commerce, the Planters' Labor and Supply Company—everything combined against him. It is a marvel how he managed to hold his own against the tremendous odds that were used against him.

While the natives had, as a rule, generally yielded the Government into the hands of the whites, still they always felt that they should have some sort of representation in the Government, and a native Hawaiian usually occupied one of the cabinet positions. In addition to the native Hawaiian there was a new element coming on the field, which consisted of native born of foreign parents, and somewhere around about 1884 we began to feel that we should have representation as well as the foreigners, and placed the proposition before Kalakaua. He recognized the justice of this, and C. T. Gulick was made minister of the interior in compliance with the wishes of this element. This cabinet was overthrown in 1886 by Mr. Spreckels's influence. Mr. Spreckels had advanced large sums of money to the Government, and demanded the deeding over of the wharfrage, the city front from the Pacific Mail to the Oceanic docks, the Honolulu waterworks, and other governmental property in town.

This proposition was acceded to by Gibson, but resisted by Gulick, who succeeded in frustrating the whole scheme, but which resulted in the overthrow of the cabinet finally through Spreckels's influence. Spreckels was instrumental in forming a new cabinet composed of Gibson, John T. Dare (a lawyer he brought from San Francisco), and, I think, Robert Creighton, and they put one Hawaiian in—some old dummy, I forget now who he was. This was naturally offensive to the Hawaiian element previously alluded to, and we reproached Gibson for his action in the matter, and when the events of 1887 turned up a large majority of the element alluded to joined the movement to overthrow Gibson, and of course the other party were only too glad to have additions to the strength of their party. I think that answers the question why I joined the movement of 1887.

Q. What was the demand made upon Kalakaua as far as a new constitution went?

A. They made a demand that he should grant them a new constitution, which he agreed to immediately.

Q. And that is the present constitution?

A. Yes; that is the present constitution.

Q. What sort of cabinet did he appoint then?

A. He appointed a cabinet to their dictation: L. A. Thurston, W. L. Green, C. W. Ashford, and Jonathan Austin.

Q. Is Mr. Thurston native born?

A. Yes.

Q. Educated here?

A. Yes; most of his education. He went abroad to study law.

Q. His life has been spent here?

A. Yes; he is identified with this community.

Q. Has he been an active member of the Planters' Labor and Supply Company?

A. He has always been invited to their meetings. He never was a planter.

Q. Might he not have owned stock?

A. He may have owned some little stock.

Q. He is not an American citizen?

A. No, sir; he is a Hawaiian.

Q. Where is Mr. Green from?

A. He is an Englishman. He came here in early days. He is head of the firm of Janior, Green & Co.

Q. Where is Mr. Ashford from?

A. Ashford is a Canadian. He arrived here in the early part of 1880.

Q. Was he especially active then in military movements?

A. Yes; very active in 1887.

Q. He commanded troops?

A. His brother, Volney V. Ashford; he was the man who put it through.

Q. What do you mean when you say that he was the man who put it through?

A. V. V. Ashford was the organizer and guide of the whole of the movement, which was expected to have operated in the event of any open resistance having occurred. Of course the Missionary party—Thurston, Smith, Dole, and others—were organizers of the movement, but when it came down to actual working V. V. Ashford was one. He was colonel of the existing forces—four or five companies of Hawaiian rifles, and this raffia that you find around the provisional government to-day—that was the crowd that flocked in around them. They were the ones that would have been used. Whenever danger was in the way they were scarce, but when it came to asking positions they were there.

Q. Who was Jonathan Austin?

A. He was an American—a New Yorker, I think. He was a brother of H. L. Austin, of Hawaii. He was comparatively a newcomer.

Q. None of these were of native blood?

A. None of them.

Q. They continued in power how long?

A. From immediately after the 30th of June, 1887, up to the legislature of 1890. The elections were in February. The house met in April or May, 1890. Shortly after the house went into session they passed a vote of want of confidence.

Q. The reform element had been beaten in elections?

A. Yes.

Q. And that brought about an anti-reform cabinet?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, in the legislature of 1892 there was a continual turning out of cabinets; was that a struggle for power?

A. It was a struggle for power. This same reform or missionary element was fighting to regain the reins of government. They united with a faction known as Liberals. These two elements put together could vote out the other crowd, and they voted them out until the G. N. Wilcox cabinet was formed.

Q. With this cabinet the Reform party was content?

A. Yes.

Q. How did the Liberals take it—did they get offended?

A. Yes.

Q. Did they make a combination with the National Reform party?

A. Yes.

Q. Was the Wilcox cabinet voted out as a result of that combination?

A. Yes.

Q. The Wilcox cabinet was voted out on the 13th of January, 1893?

A. Yes.

Q. The Legislature was prorogued on the 14th?

A. Yes.

Q. If this cabinet had not been voted out before the prorogation of the Legislature, the Reform element, through this cabinet, would have had control of the Government for two years?

A. Yes.

Q. How did they receive the voting out of the Wilcox cabinet?

A. It was not liked.

Q. Did they feel like they had lost power?

A. Yes.

Q. Were you at Mr. W. O. Smith's office at the meeting on Saturday, January 14, 1893?

A. Yes; I was there in the afternoon.

Q. Was the subject of the dethronement of the Queen discussed?

A. No.

Q. Was the subject of annexation discussed?

A. No.

Q. What was in the mind of that meeting; anything definite?

A. No; nothing definite. The idea was that this attempted proclaiming of a new constitution was the cause of unsettling affairs, and that there was danger for the public safety. This committee of public safety was organized for that purpose.

Q. Anything said about landing troops?

A. No.

Q. There were subsequent meetings of the committee of safety. Did you attend any of them? Were you invited?

A. I attended one that was held at Henry Waterhouse's on Monday evening, the 18th.

Q. Did you attend any of any earlier date?

A. I attended one at Thurston's house on Saturday evening.

Q. Was the subject of the dethronement of the Queen discussed there?

A. I would not like to give any information regarding anything that took place at Thurston's house that night, as I considered it as confidential. Thurston reposed confidence in me, and I should not like to betray it.

Q. Where was the other meeting?

A. The only other meeting I attended was the meeting at Waterhouse's.

Q. Who was present? Any members of the present provisional government?

A. Most of the members of the committee of safety were there.

Q. Please give the names of such as you can remember.

A. H. E. Cooper, I think, was there; Andrew Brown was there; J. A. McCandless was there; T. F. Lansing was there; I think John Emmeluth was there; C. Bolto was there; Henry Waterhouse was there; F. W. McChesney was there; W. O. Smith was there; C. L. Carter was also present.

Q. Any others connected with the Government?

A. Mr. Dole was sent for and invited to be present, and he attended.

Q. Was there anything said at that meeting on the subject of aid by the troops of the United States and the American minister?

A. Yes; the general impression and the general talk all through the business was the fact that they would obtain or receive both moral and material assistance from the United States minister and from the troops from the Boston.

Q. Did they expect to fight?

A. No; I do not think they did.

Q. Their idea was that the sympathy of the American minister and troops was with them?

A. Yes; the people knew if the United States minister, or any vessel in port, moved in the matter that would be the end of the matter. If they sent one marine ashore it would end the matter.

Q. Was that the drift of the meeting?

A. Yes; everybody knew that and felt that.

Q. Was there any portion of that meeting that went to see the American minister?

A. Yes. Mr. Loper was offered the position of commander-in-chief of what forces they might get together. He did not see his way clear; he did not want to assume any position which was not tangible, and the arguments put to him were about this support we would receive.

Q. What sort of support?

A. The support from the United States minister and from the Boston. Loper still hesitated. He did not feel satisfied with the assurances. It was suggested that he go over and see the minister himself, which he did in company with some of the others. I think C. L. Carter was one—I do not know for certain.

Q. Henry Waterhouse was one?

A. I think so, but I do not know. I have an impression that Waterhouse and Carter went there.

Q. Did they come back?

A. Yes.

Q. What did they report?

A. I understood them to say that Mr. Stevens had told them that if they would take possession of the Government building and read their proclamation he would immediately recognize them and support them, or, failing to get the Government building, any building in Honolulu. They deny that, but I understood any building in Honolulu. Anyway, from what Mr. Loper heard he was satisfied and accepted the office.

Q. Was the city quiet when the troops came in?

A. Yes; quiet as Sunday.

Q. Women and children on the streets?

A. Yes; the public at large did not know what was going on. The band played at the hotel. I do not think anyone knew what was going on except the politicians and those who were behind the scenes, as you might say.

Q. How long after the proclamation was read before Mr. Stevens recognized the provisional government?

A. That I do not know. The current report around there was that it was between 3 and 4 o'clock. I understood the United States minister had recognized the Government.

Q. Who said that?

A. It is impossible for me to say. It was common talk.

Q. How long after that before the station house and barracks were surrendered?

A. Somewhere, I should judge, between 6 and 7 o'clock. The lamps were lighted. Loper said Wilson had agreed to turn over the station house. He said: "Will you go down and take possession?" I said: "No; I have nothing to do with this concern." He said: "We must have someone to go down there. I said: 'Take some of your own folks; take McCandless down.'" He did. He had not been gone long before he telephoned up: "I want you. You must come down. McCandless won't stop." I think before I started I met McCandless. He said: "Loper wants you down there. I don't want to stop there." I considered the matter. A number of friends of mine wanted me to go. They said: "It is a critical moment. We want a Hawaiian who can talk to the natives and prevent any friction between the natives and foreigners." I said: "In the interest of law and order I will go down." I went down. Most of the force that Wilson had was retiring. This guard of 20 men that Loper had taken down of this "German 500" had marched in. I went in and was placed in charge. The street lamps were lighted.

Q. What was the occasion of your separating from the people who were at the meeting at Mr. Waterhouse's?

A. The first proposition was made by Thurston himself. He asked me if I was willing to stay in the movement for maintaining law and order, and try to preserve the fundamental law of the land? I told him I would. We went over to the attorney-general's office and met the cabinet, who had come over from the polls. I heard the statements of Parker, Peterson, and Colburn. It was then proposed by Thurston and others that we should support the cabinet against the overt acts of the Queen, and that meeting at Smith's office was for that purpose. Peterson went there.

Q. You separated from them, then, when it was developed that they meant to overthrow the Queen?

A. Yes. I stopped on Wednesday, when I found it began to develop. I began to be suspicious. I simply went to this meeting at Waterhouse's and was a listener. I was interested in affairs of the country.

Q. You took no part in the organization of the provisional government?

A. None whatever.

Q. How many troops did they have there at the time the proclamation was read?

A. When the proclamation was read there were two policemen taken off an ammunition wagon and put at the front door.

Q. How many troops did they have at the close of the reading of the proclamation?

A. None, excepting those two.

Q. How long after that before other troops arrived?

A. Just about 3 o'clock. This Captain Zeigler, with about 30 men, marched in the back way, indifferently armed.

Q. Then other troops came in afterwards?

A. After that another body of similar number—25 to 30—made up of young fellows from around various offices, marched in. That was all there were. It was not until it was generally known that the United States minister had recognized the Government that the crowd came flocking in—mostly men discharged from the station house by Wilson. They jumped in there with a view of being paid. They enlisted after being discharged by Wilson.

Q. Are those fellows in the service now?

A. Yes.

Q. Making part of the provisional forces at this time?

A. Yes; and a great many of the citizens, those who compose the Annexation Club, when they saw the thing was sure, the United States forces within pistol shot, and that Wilson had given up the station house, and that the barracks would be surrendered, then they wanted to be on the top side. They came in.

Q. Before that they had been quiet?

A. Yes; then they rushed in.

Q. Were you at the mass meeting on Monday?

A. Yes.

Q. How many people were there?

A. I should judge about 700 or 800, possibly 900.

Q. What nationalities?

A. Heterogeneous.

Q. Many Portuguese?

A. A great many.

Q. How is the white population in this city on the subject of annexation?

A. It is very hard to arrive at an exact statement. You can only get it by making your own views known. You will find out that men who are pretending to be in with a party are really at heart opposed to it.

Q. How many people are not pretending to be with the party in power and are opposed to annexation?

A. I should judge about half and half.

Q. People who are frank about their views?

A. Yes. You take the independent Americans who are not under the influence of the missionary faction, they are as a rule opposed to it, as are most of the English people and some Germans, and almost all foreigners outside of the particular American class who are under the influence of the missionaries and planters.

Q. What part of the United States is this American element who favor annexation from?

A. The New England States, generally.

Q. Are they in point of numbers in a majority of the Americans here?

A. I do not know. I do not think that they are, but their influence is the largest on account of wealth.

Q. And intelligence?

A. I won't add intelligence; I beg to be excused from that.

Q. Do you know whether or not the committee that went up and organized the provisional government sent anybody to the Government building to see if there were any soldiers there or not?

A. I can not say that. I remained in my office until I felt something was going on, and then I walked out on the street. What they did after leaving Waterhouse's I don't know.

Q. Was everything quiet at the government building at the time the proclamation was read?

A. Oh, yes. All the offices were running right along very quietly; nobody knew anything.

Q. None of the officers knew of the movement?

A. I do not think they did. Everything was going on just the same as usual. They knew there were rumors, but I do not think much attention was paid to it. The presence of the United States troops was a matter of curiosity and comment.

Q. Well, then, so far as the reading of that proclamation dethroning the Queen was concerned, it was known to very few people that it was to be done?

A. I do not think it was known to anybody except themselves. The whole thing was a surprise to everyone. Wilson might have had some inkling of it. He was trying his best to keep posted, but of course his actions would have been guided entirely by what information he got regarding the attitude of the United States troops.

JUNE 5, 1893.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Wundenberg, I omitted to ask you as to the feeling of the natives on the subject of annexation at the former interview. Please tell me now.

A. To the best of my knowledge and belief—and I am well acquainted with the natives—I do not think there is a native in favor of annexation. Many may have declared themselves so, but it is my belief that they have done so under pressure; that is, their interests were controlled by those who desire annexation; they are afraid of offending them and of being deprived of privileges they now possess.

Q. What sort of privileges?

A. In a number of cases they have stock running on lands of large land-owners, who would make them remove them, and that would deprive them of their means of livelihood. Some of them hold positions under planters and others.

Q. Any of them in government employ?

A. A good many of them are in government employ. There is only one that I know of who openly comes out and advocates annexation—a young man by the name of Notley, who is employed in the waterworks. Others do it in a subdued manner. If they advocate the matter at all, they do it as a matter of policy. The natives have the same love of country as you will find anywhere. The term they use is "Aloha aina."

Q. Are there any whites in the islands against annexation?

A. A great many.

Q. What proportion of them—I mean Americans and Europeans?

A. I think if a fair canvass was made that you would find fully one-half opposed to it.

Q. Suppose the question of annexation was submitted to the people of these islands, or such of them as were qualified to vote for representatives under the constitution just abrogated, and with the Australian ballot system which you had adopted; what would be the result of the vote?

A. It would be overwhelmingly defeated—almost to a man by the native Hawaiians, and I think a great many of the foreigners who now are supposed to be in favor of annexation would vote against it.

Q. What would be the proportion of annexationists to anti-annexationists?

A. All the native voters, with very few exceptions, would vote against it. I think most of the native born of Hawaiian parents would vote against it.

with the exception possibly of those few that are mixed up in the annexation movement here. I think most of the foreign element that are independent and outside of what is known as the Missionary party would vote against it, and I think a great many of those who are now on the rolls of the Annexation Club would vote against it. Their names appear there simply for policy.

I have carefully read the foregoing and find it to be an accurate report of my interviews with Mr. Blount.

HONOLULU, June 5, 1893.

F. WUNDENBERG.

Mr. CAFFERY. I also offer the testimony of Mr. Waterhouse, one of the members of the committee on public safety, and identified with the revolutionary movement, to be found on page 47 of the same document.

The testimony referred to is as follows:

INTERVIEW BETWEEN MR. WATERHOUSE AND MR. BLOUNT.

HONOLULU, May 2, 1893.

Mr. BLOUNT. How long have you lived in Honolulu?

A. I came here in 1851.

Q. Born where?

A. In Tasmania.

Q. What nationality were your ancestors?

A. My father and mother were from the old country—from England.

Q. How old were you when you came here?

A. Six years old.

Q. You have lived here ever since?

A. Yes.

Q. In this city?

A. Yes, in Honolulu.

Q. Where were you on January 14, 15, 16, and 17, 1893?

A. I was in Honolulu.

Q. What was the cause of the revolution that resulted in the dethronement of Liliuokalani?

A. It started from the lottery bill and the opium bill and the bribery and corruption we had heard of. It came to me first through Minister of Finance John F. Colburn. That was the first intimation I had. There was no idea of the dethronement of the Queen at that time. That did not come until after the committee of safety was formed on Saturday. That was the first time we anticipated anything of the kind, but before that, on Tuesday, we called upon Mr. P. C. Jones, minister of finance. I told him what was going to happen. This information came from Mr. Colburn, the last minister of finance. I do not know that I ought to mention it. It came from Marcus Colburn, brother of John F. Colburn. He was feeling troubled. He said, "I want to tell you, Henry, that it is of importance that the ministry should understand what John, my brother, is up to. Do not give me away. If you do, I will be discharged from the office."

He said in substance that Mr. P. C. Jones was to receive an anonymous letter from his brother, and he wished me to say to Mr. Jones not to be alarmed, but at the same time not to tell who it was that gave him this information; also that the Queen was going to promulgate a new constitution, and in case she was not able to get out the Wilcox ministry the plan was, after the prorogation of the Legislature, to invite the four ministers over there—that is, the Wilcox ministry—and lay before them a constitution that she had prepared, and in case they didn't sign they would be held prisoners. That was the information I gave to Mr. Jones. Of course he acted upon it.

The ministry after that was put out by a vote of the legislature. I can state right here that the vote was carried by bribery. The money was placed in Mr. Sam Parker's hands, some $7,000, to assist in voting them out. Quite a number of members of the Legislature (Hawaiians) came down to talk to me, those who were against putting out the ministry, and also those who were in favor of doing so. One in particular (Hosopoli) told me what he wanted was good, stable government, and he felt sure if we kept the Wilcox ministry in we would have it. He was sent for by the ex-Queen and she persuaded him. She said if he had any love for her that he would vote against the ministry. Quite a number of the other members came and asked if I would assist them in money; said that they were getting short; had been down here so long. I told them no; that was not my business. I did not propose to advance them any money. A few days after they all seemed to be quite flush; and after the Legislature was prorogued they went home. They had new furniture and seemed to be well provided for in every way.

On Saturday, about 10 o'clock, John Colburn, minister of finance, came down to the office.

Q. What office?

A. My office on Queen street. He was very anxious to talk with me. I was out. When I came back I went over to his office. He had left word with his brother to say that the Queen was going to promulgate a new constitution immediately after the prorogation of the Legislature, and wanted me to know. Between 1 and 2 o'clock I was up near W. O. Smith's office. That seemed to be the center then to get the news. News came down that the ex-Queen was attempting to force the ministry to sign the new constitution.

Q. Who did this news come by?

A. It was sent by Mr. Colburn to the office of W. O. Smith.

Q. By whom?

A. I can not state. There were so many there at the time. They met in the back office of W. O. Smith. There were a great many in front of the office at the time to talk over the situation. I sat beside Paul Neumann. We were all very much excited, feeling that our rights were being taken away from us, and we decided then and there we would not submit to it. After a short time we heard that the ministers had gone back to the Government house. The way they put it—they ran away. The parties who came from the Government house put it in that way. I remember stating to Mr. Neumann that I was glad we were at least of one opinion. He said this was a thing we ought not to tolerate. After discussing the matter for some time John F. Colburn and the attorney-general, Mr. Peterson, both came down. Mr. Colburn made a statement that the ex-Queen had got them into the room and had requested them to sign this new constitution, and, after talking with her some time, he said they had asked her for half an hour's time to think over it. In the meantime the natives were talking quite loud, and as Mr. Colburn expressed it, he thought it was about time for him to get out of it. So they went out the back way to the Government house.

Q. The back way was the direct way to the Government house?

A. No; but if they had gone out the front way the natives were all in front, and they were afraid. He wanted to know if the merchants would support them in their position. After discussing the matter there was a committee of safety appointed. They considered it very important that such a committee should be appointed. There was a great deal of talk that came to the ears of certain parties in regard to the way in which the natives had been talked up—inflammatory talk—and we all felt that it was very important we should keep a strict watch on their movements.

Q. Did you think they were in sympathy with the Queen?

A. There was what they called the Hui Kalaiala, a lot of old men. They formerly met right opposite our office, on Queen street. They were in sympathy with her principally. After the committee of safety had been appointed we met and talked over the situation and decided to call a mass meeting.

During the meeting on Monday we were threatened that if we held any more meetings we would be arrested. Marshal Wilson came right up and said to Mr. Thurston that we would be arrested. Mr. Thurston answered right up and said if he wished to arrest us we were ready. We were not doing anything against the Government, that it was for the interest of the country that we had been appointed as a committee of safety. All that we were doing was talking in regard to a mass meeting. We had not decided when it was to be held. We decided afterwards to call a public meeting on Monday afternoon at 2 o'clock—that was the 16th.

Q. You mean you decided that on Saturday?

A. No; we decided that on Sunday after talking it over. It was to talk up the situation and to make a report from the committee of safety. The meeting was held at 2 o'clock Monday. In the meantime Marshal Wilson had sent around to all Government employees to muster in the station house, and after the meeting they all seemed to be quite demoralized on account of the number that turned out and was in sympathy with the committee of safety. The question that was uppermost in their minds was stable government. They had fully made up their minds not to allow their rights to be trampled on. After the meeting the committee of safety met again to consider what should be next done, as power had been given them by the meeting which had been held that afternoon. After discussing the matter we decided that the only course to do was to call out those who were in sympathy with us and take possession.

Q. Of what?

A. Of the Government house and take possession of the Government. That was on Monday afternoon. Monday evening we met again at my house on Neumann avenue. We there planned what should be done on Tuesday, the 17th. We met again on Tuesday morning, when the proclamation was discussed for the first time. That was the first time we had it before us. I do not remember having it before. Of course we had a committee to frame the proclamation. We met again on Tuesday morning and decided to take possession at 2 o'clock that afternoon. At 2 o'clock we marched up to the Government house, expecting to have them resist us, as we had heard the report that there was to be a hundred men up there under Mr. McCarty. We arrived up there and took possession. While we were going into the door the various volunteers kept coming into the yard with their rifles. That is as far as I know of that. Where do you want me to go from there?

Q. Just go on and tell the whole story.

A. Then the council met, after we had taken possession of the Government house, and decided to take the station house. We had only possession of the Government house and had to take the station house, where all the arms were. They had taken all arms there from various houses, so as to have them on hand. After discussing it we sent word. I think Mr. Damon went down and had an interview with the four ministers in the station house.

Q. You were not present?

A. No, I was not present. I know nothing in regard to that. Afterwards part of the ministers came up to the Government house to talk to the council.

Q. You were a member of the council?

A. I am. I was then. I was a member of the committee of safety also. They agreed to give up the station house. We took possession.

Q. Do you mean that that happened just that way? That they agreed to give it up and you took it? Do you mean that those things followed right after one another just as quick as you relate them?

A. No. Mr. Damon had to go down to the station house and Hopkins came up. The ministers were afraid to come up. They thought that it was a trap to get them up there. When they came up they said: "It does not seem to us that we need be afraid. You seem to be acting in a square, friendly manner in regard to treating us as men." They spoke of that at the time. The first thing that was done we declared martial law. That was one of the first acts.

Q. Do you know what hour the station house was given up?

A. I can not say. I was very much excited that day. I think it was somewhere near 5 o'clock.

Q. Have you anything to help you fix 5 o'clock in your mind?

A. I know we were afraid of its getting dark, and it would be much harder for us to take the building after dark, and we were planning what to do in case of darkness. That is what makes me think it was somewhere near that time.

Q. You spoke of the causes of the revolution being lottery and opium legislation and bribery. Now, as to the lottery bill, do you know of money being used there?

A. Of course I could not go on the stand and say that there was, but men who ran it were very flush.

Q. Is that what you judge from?

A. Yes.

Q. The same as to the opium bill?

A. Well, that was supposed to be a measure from the outside, as some of those in the legislature expected to get money from the Chinese.

Q. Was that a supposition, or did you have any evidence of the fact of the use of money to pass the opium bill in the way of bribing members?

A. That is just a supposition.

Q. You spoke of money being used for purposes of bribery. Did you mean in the sense that you just stated—that it was supposition that it was done?

A. I stated it from what a party said, who could substantiate what he said.

Q. Who was he?

A. Cecil Brown.

Q. Did he tell you he would be able to prove that money was used for the purpose of getting out the ministry?

A. Yes.

Q. Did he tell you who furnished the money?

A. From the ex-Queen.

Q. He told you it came from her?

A. Yes.

Q. Have you had any knowledge of any money being used by the other side—by the Reform party—in controlling votes at any time on any of these questions or any question?

A. Only what I saw in opposition papers. I do not know anything of my own knowledge.

Q. Do you know it on any information you had from others?

A. John Colburn told me that he had used money.

Q. Who did he say he got it from?

A. It was from his own money. He was trying to get the McFarland cabinet out.

Q. He was acting as a Liberal?

A. Yes.

Q. And the Liberal and Reform party were acting together in the matter of getting out this cabinet?

A. I do not know about the Reform so much. I dropped out from the Reform party when they joined with the Liberal. We were all split up then.

Q. Could you have voted out that cabinet unless you had had the Reform party and the Liberal party combined?

A. We could not. It took both parties to vote them out.

Q. Did Colburn tell you he was using his own money?

A. He claimed that he had promises from other parties.

Q. Who did he say they were?

A. He did not give me names. I was going away to the States at the time.

Q. You say on Monday Wilson came and notified the committee of safety through Mr. Thurston that he intended to arrest them?

A. He did, and Mr. Thurston replied; told him to go ahead if he saw fit to arrest us.

Q. Your statement was that he could arrest you if he wanted to; that you were doing nothing against the Government?

A. Yes; I said that. We were only discussing the meeting.

Q. Were you discussing the question of the dethronement of the Queen?

A. We were not then. We were discussing in regard to the meeting to be held.

Q. Had you in your Saturday's meeting or any time in your meetings debated the matter of the dethronement of the Queen?

A. I think we had spoken of it. We all felt we could not stand the monarchy. We had made up our minds to that.

Q. Then the expression that you were doing nothing against the Government was a strategic expression?

A. Yes. Wilson, of course, wanted very much to declare martial law then, but Cleghorn declined to sign the declaration.

Q. Who was Cleghorn?

A. He was governor.

Q. You held a mass meeting at 2 o'clock?

A. Yes; 2 o'clock on the 18th.

Q. There was no declaration for dethronement in that meeting?

A. I do not know if it came out. You could understand by expressions that they were all there for good government. Of course, they did not come right flat-footed out.

Q. How many troops had you then organized and armed; can you state accurately?

A. I can not.

Q. About how many; have you any information?

A. I have not. We were backed up by the mass meeting. Nearly all were ready at a moment's notice. Those who backed up the committee of safety were willing to back them up in everything they did.

Q. Did you poll the meeting to see how many would support you?

A. I think so. I think that they got the signatures of quite a number.

Q. How many?

A. I can not tell you.

Q. You could not say that the whole of the mass meeting signed?

A. I could not.

Q. Could you say that as many as half the mass meeting signed?

A. I should think so.

Q. Have you examined the signatures?

A. No. There were various committees. I was a committee for a portion of the rally and went around to their residences to see what arms they had and if they were prepared in case of trouble.

Q. In case of any trouble, did you tell them that you were going to dethrone the Queen and ask if they would be ready in case of resistance? Did you say that when you got signatures?

A. When I went around I didn't get signatures. I got it verbally from them to find out if they had arms and were ready to support the committee of safety.

Q. Did you mention to them the purpose to dethrone the Queen?

A. That was understood.

Q. Did you communicate to them in reference to arms?

A. The fact of the case is I did not know exactly what we were going to do.

Q. So that when you went around, you simply wanted to know if they had arms, in the event of trouble?

A. Yes.

Q. It was in that way that you judged of their sentiments in the matter of supporting the committee of safety in the effort to dethrone the Queen?

A. Yes.

Q. After the mass meeting what did the committee do?

A. The committee of safety met that afternoon shortly after the mass meeting.

Q. What did you do in that afternoon meeting?

A. We discussed the matter. We did not have a very long session in the afternoon. In the afternoon, at first, we were all going right up then and there, but afterwards considered it. The fact is, we hadn't our papers all ready. It was getting dark. We thought it was better to have daylight on our side. We decided to meet again on Monday evening and get everything in shape. It was after the mass meeting that we fully decided to take the step.

Q. What hour of Monday did you determine to take the step?

A. It was immediately after the mass meeting.

Q. Did anybody communicate the determination to the American minister?

A. I can not say. He must have seen by the way the people were excited that day, and the incendiary talk among certain of the other side in regard to their setting fire to buildings.

Q. How many times did you hear it?

A. A great many times.

Q. How many?

A. People would keep coming into the office and meet me and say, "We are going to have trouble."

Q. Did you hear any persons say they proposed to fire the town?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many; I mean the people opposed to you?

A. No; I didn't hear the people actually say it. It was rumors from outside. It was not direct from them or they would have been locked up.

Q. You do not know anything at all of anybody having talked to Mr. Stevens about the situation on Monday in regard to the movement that you were all making or contemplated making? Was there anybody who said in the meeting that Mr. Stevens knew anything of what was going on?

A. I guess he must have kept posted.

Q. I want to know whether there was anything said by Thurston or anybody else of Mr. Stevens's knowledge of the movement?

A. I can not say positively.

Q. What is your impression?

A. My impression is that there was. I can not remember what it was that was said.

Q. Was it to the effect that he had knowledge of the movement of the reform party?

A. I do not remember. It just comes upon me as a flash.

Q. What is the impression you say you have?

A. I do not see how he could have helped it.

Q. I will ask you again. In the meeting of the committee of safety in the afternoon of Monday, after the mass meeting had adjourned, was there anything said on the part of Mr. Thurston, or any other member of the committee of safety, indicating that the American minister knew anything of the movement of the reform party?

A. Yes; I should say that there was.

Q. By whom?

A. Either Carter or Thurston.

Q. What did they say?

A. I can not state. There was something said. It does not come to my mind now.

Q. Was the purport of it that he knew of the movement?

A. Yes, it was; that is, after the meeting.

Q. How did they know that he knew of the movement?

A. I suppose they had had an interview with him. I can not say for certain.

Q. Did they say as much?

A. That is what I understood at the time.

Q. Well, now, in that meeting was the subject discussed of asking him to land the American troops?

A. I think that was done by the committee of safety before.

Q. Were you present when they asked for the troops to be landed?

A. I was.

Q. The troops were ordered here on Monday and this mass meeting was on Tuesday?

A. No; the mass meeting was on Monday; the troops came on shore Monday evening just about dark. I might say that it was a surprise to us to hear that the troops were coming on shore.

Q. You expected them to come ashore later?

A. No; I didn't know when they were coming ashore.

Q. But you expected them to come ashore?

A. Yes; I expected they would come.

Q. By reason of any communication with the American minister?

A. No; I think it was by request of the committee of safety.

Q. I have a copy of the communication from the committee of safety of January 16, 1898—Monday.

A. Yes; Monday afternoon.

Q. What time Monday afternoon?

A. After the mass meeting.

Q. How long after?

A. I think about 5.

Q. It was after the adjournment of the mass meeting you say the request to land troops was made?

A. I think it was about 4 o'clock.

Q. What time did the mass meeting adjourn?

A. A little after 3.

Q. And then the committee of safety met?

A. We met immediately; walked down from the meeting to Smith's office.

Q. And then you took up the subject of calling on the American minister to land troops?

A. Yes.

Q. Who took that communication to him?

A. I think it was Charlie Carter. I can not be positive.

Q. Is he one of the present commissioners?

A. Yes.

Q. How long was he gone?

A. Not long.

Q. What did he say when he came back?

A. He said the marines would be landed.

Q. Did he say whether they would support the provisional government movement if they took the public buildings?

A. He came back and said the troops were coming ashore. That was as far as I could remember now.

Q. He brought no response in writing?

A. I do not think so.

Q. Did the committee of safety want the troops brought on shore?

A. They felt that it would be for the welfare of the town to have them ashore. We felt as a committee of safety that we had this matter in our hands and would be held responsible.

Q. Did you expect that the presence of the troops on shore would have a quieting effect on the natives and prevent any demonstration?

A. It was thought so.

Q. That was your idea?

A. Yes.

Q. You expected that when they got on shore any hostile movement would be brought to a standstill by their presence?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Suppose they had not come on shore, would you have been able to protect yourselves?

A. I think so; but I think there would have been a great deal of bloodshed.

Q. Did not you always expect that American troops would be landed in case of conflict or threatened conflict?

A. Yes.

Q. And therefore you did not much expect a conflict after they landed?

A. No; I thought that, naturally, Wilson would try to do something. I expected there would be bloodshed before we got through.

Q. Unless American troops were landed?

A. Yes, sir. Of course I didn't know whether they would attempt it then.

Q. You had a meeting, you say, on Monday night, at your house. Who was present?

A. There were the committee of safety.

Q. Who were they?

A. Cooper was there. I think Wilder was not there. There was Brown, Smith, and Lansing. I do not think Suhr was there. Dole was there. We sent for Dole. Carter and Loper were there.

Q. What was the object in sending for Mr. Dole?

A. To ask him if he would accept the position he now holds.

Q. What did he say?

A. He debated in his mind. He wanted to think over it until morning.

Q. What was Loper doing there?

A. Loper was invited there. He was to take charge of the forces.

Q. Was that agreed upon that night?

A. That was agreed upon.

Q. Did you and Mr. Loper and Mr. Carter go to the American minister that night?

A. I didn't.

Q. Did anybody go from your meeting?

A. Nobody that I know of. If anyone went, I know nothing about it.

Q. Was there any hesitation on the part of Loper to take command that night?

A. Yes; he did hesitate.

Q. What reason did he give?

A. That he would rather be with the marshal.

Q. Was there anything said as to the probability of a conflict the next day?

A. We talked over the matter with Loper; discussed what could be done. He started out to get the men together.

Q. After he left the committee of safety?

A. Yes.

Q. Where were they to be placed?

A. They were to meet at the old armory here, and from there go right down to the Government house.

Q. Didn't you think the impression that these marines would have on the natives would be that they would not be in sympathy with them, and that they would be in sympathy with the white people?

A. That is what I think.

Q. You were amongst the committee of safety that went up to take charge of the Government house?

A. Yes.

Q. How many of you were there?

A. I think there was fourteen, but we did not all go up.

Q. Where did you start from?

A. We started from W. O. Smith's office, on Fort street.

Q. Which street did you go up going to the Government building?

A. We went up Queen street and up to the Government house—Mr. Wilder and myself.

Q. What street did the others go on?

A. They went on Merchant street.

Q. When you got to the Government building who was the first person you saw?

A. Hassenger.

Q. Is he a porter?

A. He is first clerk of the interior department.

Q. When you got there was the proclamation read immediately?

A. The proclamation was read by Mr. Cooper.

Q. Were there any troops there during the reading of the proclamation?

A. I could see one or two coming in.

Q. By the time it was concluded how many men did you have?

A. It would be impossible for me to say how many. I was so excited at the time.

Q. Do you remember the bringing of a paper to the provisional government, dated January 17, 1893, signed by Liliuokalani and her several ministers, and printed in this document (Senate Executive Document No. 53, Fifty-second Congress, second session)?

A. I do.

Q. You were then in possession of the Government building?

A. We were.

Q. Any other buildings at that time?

A. Only the Government building at that time.

Q. How long after that before you got Mr. Stevens's letter of recognition?

A. It was shortly after the station house was given over.

Q. Are you not mistaken about that?

A. No; I believe I am not. I do not think I am.

Q. What about the barracks; had they been given up?

A. They had.

Q. Who were at the barracks?

A. Nowlein.

Q. Where was Wilson?

A. He was at the station house.

Q. And he gave that up before you had notice of the recognition?

A. According to my best knowledge and belief.

Q. Was there any communication, by writing or by word, from any member of the committee of safety, or any other person by their authority, to Mr. Stevens that you planned taking the Government building?

A. Not as far as I know. It is from hearsay.

Q. Who did you hear say it?

A. It would be impossible for me to answer that.

Q. Was it understood in the committee of safety on Monday night, by anybody, that he knew you intended to take the Government building?

A. Not unless somebody left the meeting afterwards and told him.

Q. Was there anything said by any person at the meeting at your house the night before the building was taken indicating that Mr. Stevens knew of the move to take the Government building the next day?

A. I do not remember.

Q. What was your impression—did you think that he knew of your movement?

A. I did; I was in hopes that he did.

Q. Why did you think he knew of your movement?

A. It was common talk.

Q. Common talk Monday, as well as Tuesday?

A. Yes.

Q. It was common talk before the troops were landed on Monday?

A. It was common talk that we were going to make a move—that the committee of safety were urged upon to make a move.

Q. Did you all understand that Mr. Stevens's sympathies were with you?

A. Yes.

Q. How did you get the idea that his sympathies were with you?

A. From remarks made by different persons in regard to certain matters that had come up; and we felt that we had been wronged.

Q. What matters do you refer to?

A. All during the last few days and also during the session of the Legislature.

Q. He would manifest his approval and disapproval of acts of the Queen and her adherents in matters of legislation?

A. Whenever it was against the interests of the American people. Of course, a few days before that, up to Saturday, he was not here. We had a great deal of talking during that time. He lost all that.

Q. He participated freely in political discussions without exciting comment?

A. I do not know that he discussed it. People would naturally come and talk to him and open their hearts to him.

Q. And in that way they got to feel that he was in sympathy with them?

A. Yes.

Q. Was there ever any suggestion on his part to the committee of safety to desist from their movement against the Queen?

A. I have never heard of any.

Q. Was there any expectation when the troops landed that they were to enforce the authority of the Queen in bringing order in the city on the part of the committee of safety?

A. I did not hear any rumor that led me to think that. The way I understood it was that they were here to preserve order.

Q. Now, in the matter of preserving order, if the Queen's forces and the provisional government forces got to fighting, would that mean that he was to interfere and stop the fighting?

A. I thought he was only to protect American interests here.

Q. How would he go about it?

A. I suppose that most of the Americans would naturally go for protection on American ground, and I suppose that would be up at his place or around the consulate.

Q. You expected he would protect them in those places?

A. Yes; I might say, after the meeting on Monday, there was a falling off in the ranks of the Queen's party and they felt that the stronger elements were against them. The mass meeting brought things to an issue.

Q. You anticipated that the American troops expected to protect at the consulate and American legation American citizens who resorted there for protection?

A. That is what I expected they would do, but I did not know how far they would have gone in case there was bloodshed.

Q. Did you expect them to confine themselves to operations around the legation and consulate?

A. No; I would have expected if the Queen's people overpowered us that they would, of course, have to protect her. If we came out on the top and asked for protection we would get the protection, and we felt we would be strong enough.

Q. You expected him to land his troops and protect American people at the legation and consulate until you whipped the Queen or the Queen whipped you?

A. I do not know that.

Q. Did you expect him to do more than protect American citizens who resorted to the consulate or legation for protection?

A. That in case there was any bloodshed that they would, if called upon, protect the party in power, and I expected we were going to be in power forthwith.

Q. How did you expect to get into power without a little bloodshed?

A. We knew the feeling of those who were in power then—that they were cowards; that by going up with a bold front, and they supposing that the American troops would assist us, that would help us out.

Q. Assist whom?

A. The committee of safety.

Q. That was the general calculation?

A. Yes.

Q. In the conference?

A. Yes. They felt that their being there would be a great help to them. Even their presence ashore would have done that.

Q. When did you first determine to take the building?

A. Monday.

Q. Did you talk over it at Monday afternoon session?

A. Yes.

Q. And did you then determine to do it?

A. That afternoon. We were on the point of going up that afternoon, but things were not ready and it would take until dark and we thought we had better wait until the next day.

Q. Was that the purpose you had, to get the influence of the troops for the purpose of preventing resistance on the part of the Queen's Government?

A. That was not in my mind at all.

Q. What did you want troops for? What was in your mind?

A. In my mind it was going to stop bloodshed. The very presence of them here.

Q. You expected, then, if you got them on shore that you could go on with the plan of taking possession of the Government building and other properties without bloodshed? That was your idea?

A. That was my idea.

Q. Was that the impression of the committee of safety?

A. I think that they felt just the same as I did in regard to it.

(Before leaving Mr. Waterhouse was shown the letter of January 16, from the committee of safety to Mr. Stevens, and identified it.) The letter is as follows:

HAWAIIAN ISLANDS, Honolulu, January 16, 1893.

His Excellency JOHN L. STEVENS,
American Minister Resident:

SIR: We, the undersigned, citizens and residents of Honolulu, respectfully represent that, in view of recent public events in this Kingdom, culminating in the revolutionary acts of Queen Liliuokalani on Saturday last, the public safety is menaced and lives and property are in peril, and we appeal to you and the United States forces at your command for assistance.

The Queen, with the aid of armed force, and accompanied by threats of violence and bloodshed from those with whom she was acting, attempted to proclaim a new constitution; and while prevented for the time from accomplishing her object, declared publicly that she would only defer her action. This conduct and action was upon an occasion and under circumstances which have created general alarm and terror.

We are unable to protect ourselves without aid, and therefore pray for the protection of the United States forces.

THEO. F. LANSING,

JOHN EMMELUTH,
WM. R. CASTLE,
J. A. McCANDLESS,
Citizens' Committee of Safety.

I have read the foregoing carefully, and pronounce it a correct report of my interview with Mr. Blount.

HENRY WATERHOUSE.

Mr. CAFFERY. I also offer the testimony of Mr. Damon, who is also a member of the committee on public safety, commencing on page 39 of the same document.

The testimony referred to is as follows:

INTERVIEW BETWEEN MR. DAMON AND MR. BLOUNT.

HONOLULU, April 29, 1893.

Mr. BLOUNT. How long have you lived here?

Mr. DAMON. I was born here in 1843. I have been away several times—perhaps to the extent of three or four years in that time.

Q. Where were you on the 14th of January, 1893, at the time the proclamation deposing the Queen and establishing the provisional government was read?

A. I was at Honolulu. I was one of the members of that body who went up.

Q. The paper was read by Mr. Cooper?

A. By Judge Cooper.

Q. How many of you were there in that body which went up—about?
A. The whole body. There would be four of the executive and fourteen of the advisory.

Q. Please look at this paper and see if they are the persons [Senate Executive Document No. 70, Fifty-second Congress, second session].
A. Thurston was not present, and I do not think Wilhelm was there.

Q. Where did you start from?

A. From W. O. Smith's office on Fort street.

Q. And what street did you take going from there?

A. We walked up directly to the Government house on Merchant street. It was suggested that a part should go by the way of Queen street, but a majority of us went by way of Merchant street.

Q. What was the idea for dividing the committee?

A. So that it should not attract so much attention, and it would be safer, perhaps, to have it divided than going in mass.

Q. Was it because it occurred to them that it might invite attack if they went in mass?

A. That was partly the idea—that it was more prudent. I think we, most of us, walked together—not compactly, but together.

Q. Any crowd following you?

A. No; the crowd was attracted to the corner of Fort and King streets, owing to the shot that was fired by Mr. Good at a policeman. In fact, the crowd cleared from the Government house and was attracted there. From all directions they centered at the corner of Hall's store.

Q. You found, then, scarcely anyone at the Government house when the committee arrived?

A. Scarcely anyone there except porters. After Mr. Cooper began to read the proclamation—then different ones came out of the offices—clerks and officials—while the proclamation was being read.

Q. Some of the provisional government troops, or rather troops raised at the direction of the committee of safety, came on the ground before the reading of the proclamation was finished?

A. When we arrived there was but one man with a rifle on the premises, Mr. Oscar White; but some little time later they commenced to come in from the armory, troops that were under the supervision of Colonel Soper.

Q. Was that before or during the reading of the proclamation?

A. During the reading. Toward the end of it.

Q. How many troops came in? Do you have any knowledge of the number you had enlisted?

A. There were enough came in to make us feel more decidedly at ease than before they arrived.

Q. You could not say how many there were?

A. No; they kept coming in right along. They got to be quite a body.

Q. After the reading of the proclamation the late ministers were sent for?

A. After the reading of the proclamation we adjourned to the office of the minister of the interior, and then we commenced to formulate our plans and get ourselves into working order. Mr. Dole was at the head. While we were there in consultation Mr. Cornwell and Mr. Parker came up there from the station house and held a conference with us.

Q. What was the purport of that conference?

A. The result of that conference was that Mr. Bolte and myself were requested to return with Mr. Cornwell and Mr. Parker to the station house and recommend and urge upon the parties in power at the police station to surrender to the provisional government. We had a conference with the ministers in the room occupied generally by the deputy marshal. There were present Messrs. Peterson, Colburn, Parker, Cornwell, Bolte, and later Mr. Neumann, who was asked to come in. After consultation of the matter of their yielding up their power to the provisional government, they asked to be let alone for a few moments, and I went into one of the rear cells in the corridor with Marshal Wilson, and urged him very strongly to give up any hope or any thought of making any attack, or resistance, more properly.

Q. What reason did you give him?

A. I can not remember at the present moment giving him a reason, but I remember distinctly saying to him: "Now, if you will cooperate with us, if in future I can be of service to you, I will do so."

Q. Was there any suggestion of sympathy on the part of the United States minister in your movement?

A. While I was in the station house, a man by the name of Bowler said to me: "We are all prepared, but I will never fight against the American flag."

Q. Was there anything in the conversation between you and him in which any intimation direct or indirect that the United States minister was in sympathy with you, or the United States troops and officers?

A. I can not remember any definite thing, but from Mr. Bowler's remark they must have thought that the United States troops were here for some purpose.

Q. Was Mr. Bowler with the Queen's party?

A. He was. He was part of the force in the station house.

Q. Did you say anything at all indicating an opinion that there was any sympathy on the part of Mr. Stevens or Captain Wiltse with the movement for the new government?

A. I can not remember. I may possibly have said so.

Q. Did you think so at that time?

A. I may have had an impression, but I know nothing about it.

Q. What was your impression?

A. My impression was, seeing the troops landed here in this time of excitement and turmoil, that—well, I suppose I might say that they could not stand it any longer—the Americans could not stand it any longer.

Q. Your impression, then, was that the American minister and Captain Wiltse and the troops were in sympathy with the movement of the white residents here in the pending controversy between them and the Queen?

A. While we were in the Government building and during the reading of the proclamation and while we were all extremely nervous as to our personal safety, I asked one of the men with me there: "Will not the American troops support us?" Finally I asked one of the men to go over and ask Lieutenant Swinburne if he was not going to send some one over to protect us? The man returned and said to me: "Captain Wiltse's orders are 'I remain passive.'" That is all I know of what passed between us.

Q. You speak of your impression. That relates to a particular conversation between two or three persons; but what was your impression as to the matter of whether or not the American minister and the American naval officers were in sympathy with the movement?

A. I was perfectly nonplussed by not receiving any support. I could not imagine why we were there without being supported by American troops, prior to the troops coming from the armory. We were not supported in any way.

Q. You had not been in council with the committee of public safety up to that time?

A. No.

Q. Well, the troops were how far off from the reading of the proclamation?

A. They were over in that yard known as Gilson yard, in the rear of the music hall. They were quartered there.

Q. Any artillery?

A. I think they had a small gun—Gatling gun and howitzer.

Q. Where were they pointed—in what direction?

A. I can not tell you.

Q. You were surprised that they did not come into the grounds while the proclamation was being read. Is that what you mean by not supporting you?

A. I had no definite information what the movement was, as I told you before in a private interview, but knowing that they were on shore I supposed that they would support us, and when they did not support us, and we were there for fifteen or twenty minutes, I was perfectly astonished that we were in that position without any support.

Q. How far would you say, in yards, it was from where the proclamation was being read to where the nearest troops were?

A. I think about 75 yards.

Q. Was there a piece of artillery in the street between the building the troops were stationed in and the government building?

A. The only piece of firearms of any kind in that street was Oscar White's rifle. We met him as we came around the corner.

Q. Did you have occasion to look there to see?

A. We stopped before turning into the side gate to converse with Oscar White before proceeding into the government building.

Q. Are you sure there was not a piece of artillery in that street before the reading of the proclamation?

A. I can not tell you; but the only gun I could see was Oscar White's. I remarked: "Oscar, this is not so very prudent for you to be here with only one rifle in this street."

Q. Where did you see the troops first?

A. I came up from Monolaius by a back street and turned into Nunana street, one house above Mr. Stevens's, and as I turned the corner I saw the American troops marching up toward Mr. Stevens's house, and directly in front of his house.

Q. Did you meet Mr. Henry Waterhouse?

A. I met him there at that time.

Q. What conversation passed between you?

A. I think I said: "Henry, what does all this mean?" If I remember rightly now, he said: "It is all up."

Q. And what did you understand by the expression, "It is all up?"

A. I understand from that that the American troops had taken possession of the island. That was my impression.

Q. And was that favorable to the Queen or favorable to the other side, as you understood it?

A. That was distinctly favorable to the foreign element here.

Q. You mean the movement for a provisional government?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you see Mr. Stevens that day?

A. No; I did not see him that day.

Q. What is Mr. Waterhouse doing now?

A. Henry? He is a member of the council.

Q. Was he a member of the committee of public safety?

A. If I remember right, he was.

Q. Is that his signature [exhibiting letter of committee of public safety to Mr. Stevens]?

The letter is as follows:

His Excellency JOHN L. STEVENS,
American Minister Resident.

A. Yes, it is.

Q. Did he seem then pleased or alarmed?

A. He was very much strained and excited. There was no pleasure in it, but still there was a feeling of security. That was it. He evinced a feeling of security. He was not smiling or joking.

Q. It was not a joking time. Well, you say there was nothing in the first visit of yours to the station house to indicate any impression on your part that you believed the United States minister or the United States troops, or both, were in sympathy with the movement of the committee of safety?

A. I was nonplussed. I did suppose they were going to support us.

Q. You did not say anything to the people in the station house to lead them to suppose you were hopeful of aid?

A. I can not remember saying it now; I might have done so.

Q. Did you say it at any place?

A. I do not remember; I may have said it.

Q. Was there an effort on the part of those who were moving for a change of government to make that impression?

A. I think there was.

Q. Was that impression among the whites generally?

A. That I can not say. I know there was that impression. Some of the members tried to convey that impression.

Q. On what occasion?

A. Many occasions. One particular occasion was while we were in the Government building the day the proclamation was read.

Q. What was said, and who said it?

A. Charles Carter said to me: "After you are in possession of the Government building the troops will support you." I think that was his remark.

Q. Was he on the committee of public safety?

A. I think so.

Q. Was he in the party that went up to read the proclamation?
 A. He was present there during the time it was read. Whether he went up with us or not I do not remember.
 Q. It was during that time he made that remark?
 A. Yes.
 Q. Was he an active promoter of the movement?
 A. I think he was.
 Q. Has he any connection with the government to-day?
 A. No, except he is one of the commissioners in Washington.
 Q. You have been in previous revolutions here?
 A. I have been in the Wilcox revolution. I took quite a prominent part in its suppression. I was one of the ministers at the time.
 Q. You had a conversation with Mr. Carter about the time the proclamation was being read?
 A. Yes.
 Q. You were somewhat anxious as to whether or not you would be supported by United States troops?
 A. Yes.
 Q. Did you express any fear in the presence of Mr. Carter?
 A. Well, no man likes to tell he was afraid.
 Q. I do not mean in a cowardly sense.
 A. Well, with others, I was convinced that we were in a position of danger.
 Q. What did Mr. Carter say?
 A. He gave me to understand that we would be protected.
 Q. By United States troops?
 A. Yes; and when we were not protected by them I wanted to know the reason why.
 Q. Do you mean by that that you expected them to march over?
 A. I was under the impression that they would.
 Q. What did you accomplish by that first visit to the station house—any agreement?
 A. We accomplished this—that it was a virtual giving up.
 Q. What was said? What did the ministers say?
 A. This is my impression of it to-day: That if they had only to contend with the provisional government and the forces of the provisional government that they would not give up. That was the impression that I gathered from them; that they felt themselves equal to the occasion so far as the provisional government went.
 Q. Then, having that sort of feeling, what did they propose to do?
 A. They proposed to immediately deliver up. Then they went up, four of them, and had a parley with Mr. Dole and the provisional government. They agreed to desist, but said they must go to the Queen and get her to concur with them.
 Q. So far as they were concerned they were willing to yield, provided the Queen was?
 A. Yes. Then I went along with them to the palace. We all met in the blue room. There were present the Queen, two young princes, the four ministers, Judge Widdeman, Paul Neumann, J. O. Carter, E. C. McFarland, and myself. We went over between 4 and 5 and remained until 6 discussing the situation.
 Q. In that conversation you asked for a surrender of the forces, and the ministers advised it?
 A. The different ones spoke, and they all recommended it. Each one spoke. At first Judge Widdeman was opposed to it, but he finally changed his mind on the advice of Mr. Neumann. Mr. Neumann advised yielding. Each one advised it.
 Q. Was this advice of Neumann and the cabinet based on the idea that the Queen would have to contend with the United States forces as well as the forces of the provisional government?
 A. It was the Queen's idea that she could surrender pending a settlement at Washington, and it was on that condition that she gave up. If I remember right, I spoke to her also. I said she could surrender or abdicate under protest.
 Q. And that the protest would be considered at a later period at Washington?
 A. At a later period.
 Q. Did the cabinet in recommending her to yield to the provisional government give her to understand that they supposed that the American minister and the United States troops were in sympathy with the provisional government or with the committee of public safety?
 A. I know it was the Queen's idea that Mr. Stevens was in sympathy with this movement.
 Q. But I am asking now as to what reasons the ministers gave for her acquiescence.
 A. It was their idea that it was useless to carry on—that it would be provocative of bloodshed and trouble if she persisted in this matter longer; that it was wiser for her to abdicate under protest and have a hearing at a later time; that the forces against her were too strong.
 Q. Did they indicate the United States forces at all in any way?
 A. I do not remember their doing so.
 Q. Do you know whether or not at that time they were under the impression that the United States forces were in sympathy with the revolution?
 A. Beyond an impression I know nothing definite.
 Q. What was the result of this conference with the Queen? What was agreed on?
 A. She signed a document surrendering her rights to the provisional government under protest.
 Q. Is this the protest on page 22, Executive Document No. 53, Fifty-second Congress, second session?
 A. Yes. This was written out by Mr. Neumann and J. O. Carter while we were present. She was reluctant to agree to this, but was advised that the whole subject would come up for final consideration at Washington.
 Q. Did you at the time consent to recommend this proposition or not?
 A. I was there as a member of the provisional government, but I did not advise as to the wording of it. I did tell her that she would have a perfect right to be heard at a later period.
 Q. By the United States Government?
 A. Yes.
 Q. You yourself at that time, before consulting with your colleagues, were favorably impressed with that settlement?
 A. Well, it was the only settlement that could be brought about. Personally I was satisfied with it.
 Q. And you took that back to the provisional government?
 A. Yes.
 Q. And they rejected it?
 A. It was received and indorsed by Mr. Dole.
 Q. Now, was there any message sent to the Queen after that?
 A. No.
 Q. No message declaring that they would not accept it?
 A. No.
 Q. The surrender was then made on that proposition?
 A. Yes; well, then she sent down word through Mr. Peterson to Mr. Wilson to deliver up the station house. That wound up the whole affair. We immediately took possession of it. It was not delivered up until after this conference.

Q. Now, how long after that was it before the provisional government was recognized?

A. Mr. Stevens sent Cadet Pringle, his aid, and Captain Wilcox sent one of his officers to personally examine the building and report if the provisional government was in actual possession of the Government building. That was done that afternoon.

Q. What time?

A. Between 4 and 5.

Q. What time was the interview with the Queen?

A. After 4, and ended at 6.

Q. You took reply?

A. Mr. Neumann took the reply to Mr. Dole.

Q. Now, when this interview was going on between you, the cabinet ministers, and the Queen, it was known then that the Government had been recognized?

A. That the Queen knew it? I do not think she was told. I do not remember of it being spoken of.

Q. Didn't you know it?

A. I think I knew it.

Q. Didn't these ministers know it then?

A. They may have been present. I can not say. The provisional government were all present when Mr. Stevens recognized it as the de facto government.

Q. What I mean is this: Before you took the message of the Queen back—this protest—the provisional government had been recognized?

A. Yes; that is my impression.

Q. Had that been done at the time you left the Government house to go with the cabinet ministers to talk with the Queen?

A. If my memory serves me right, it had.

Q. Did not the cabinet officers know of it at this time?

A. I can not say.

Q. What do you know about the contents of the constitution she wanted to proclaim?

A. It is too long to write down. I can tell you my connection with it.

Q. Have you seen it?

A. No.

Q. What is the aspiration of the native mind as to the form of government?

A. I think that their ambition is to obtain the power through the vote. They have tasted what it is to hold the control by the vote, and they are very tenacious of that right. They are to a certain extent clanish in that idea; but the trouble comes in that they have not used that power wisely, and it is the fact of the Polynesians combining in their votes to retain the power—and forgetting the intelligent power of the Anglo-Saxons, even when in a minority—that has caused the trouble. The real break in the Hawaiian system of government commenced at the time of Kamehameha V, when he took away their old constitution and gave them a constitution of his own making. That started revolutions in this country. There is the starting point where the roads diverged which has brought about the succession of unrest in different governments from that day to this.

Now, the Hawaiians from that date, or within close proximity to it, commenced to feel what it was to have the vote, and what influence they could exert, and naturally the Hawaiian, as the weaker race, have attempted in every succeeding Legislature to work together; but there has always been a disintegration in every Legislature. They could not hold themselves together compactly as a body. Whenever they have had the opportunity to exercise this power it has not been at the level of the intelligent Anglo-Saxon idea of making laws or carrying out a system of government. It has chafed the Anglo-Saxon. He would not tolerate it. He has found that he could control it indirectly, if he could not directly, by his superior education and intelligence. The Hawaiians had grown to a feeling of independence, and in company with the Queen they wanted to throw off that Anglo-Saxon domination which has been with them and controlled them all these years. When it came to that point that they felt that they could do it, then the clash came. Of course there are other reasons which brought it about. But it is the clashing of two nationalities for supremacy.

Q. That was the great underlying cause? The financial questions were incidental question?

A. That was the underlying cause—the Hawaiian thinking, because he had a majority of votes, that it gave him power. He didn't recognize that the intelligence and strong will of the Anglo-Saxon would beat him every time.

Q. The Hawaiian Almanac and Annual for 1891 states that in the general election for 1890 the total vote for nobles throughout the islands was 3,187, and that the total vote for representatives was 11,671. That is about correct?

A. I should judge so—that is a very correct source of information.

Q. That would make 8,484 more for representatives than for nobles?

A. Yes.

Q. Does that difference grow out of the fact that there is no moneyed qualification to vote for representatives, but for nobles there is required a property qualification of $5,000 (unencumbered) or an income of $600?

A. Unquestionably. That disparity of numbers, if it had been carried to a fine point, would have been very much larger, but there was and is a laxity in the admittance of many people to vote for nobles.

Q. Now, that 3,187 votes for nobles was generally a white vote, was it not?

A. There was a good many Hawaiians in that vote for nobles.

Q. What proportion would you say as between whites and natives?

A. I think those statistics could be got for you. It would not be wise for me to say. I should think about 25 per cent.

Q. Native vote?

A. Yes.

Q. The balance was a white vote?

A. Yes.

Q. It was in the power, then, of the whites united to elect the body of nobles, was it not?

A. The whites as a rule used all their influence to control the noble vote.

Q. Why did the whites use all their influence to control the noble vote?

A. Because it was their only hope of controlling or influencing legislation.

Q. How many nobles and how many representatives were there under the constitution?

A. Equal—about 24 each.

Q. If the whites could get the 24 votes of the nobles, then they had an absolute bar to any action by the representatives or the King?

A. That was the intention.

Q. If they got two or three representatives they had control of legislation so far as that legislative body was concerned?

A. If it had been carried out to its logical conclusion, it would have been so; but, as the result proved, they were not able to entirely control the noble vote.

Q. Now, if they had been able to entirely control the noble vote, and to get some of the representatives, they could have determined the question of the cabinet?

A. Yes.
 Q. They could have removed any cabinet that did not suit them?
 A. Yes; provided all the whites had banded together.
 Q. I suppose sometimes the whites didn't keep banded together—and the natives in all things?
 A. Yes.
 Q. You had within yourselves those sources of power?
 A. Yes.
 Q. That was the principal cause of agitation for many years in elections?
 A. Yes. Where the Hawaiian felt that his cause was weak, and it was to that point that, so far as they were able, they were striving so as to maintain the control.
 Q. Now, Mr. Damon, do you think that you could have good government here on the basis of an educational qualification for voters, so as to allow everybody who could read and write to vote?
 A. Yes; provided there was some strong power, as one might say it—as in an unruly school—to preserve order.
 Q. Do you think that you could maintain a state government like the States of the American Union with that sort of suffrage?
 A. My personal opinion is that we could grow up into that by a period of trial, until the voter appreciated what a vote really meant.
 Q. How long do you think that would take to get the native population up to the high standard of the whites on that question? Can you see any time definitely or clearly?
 A. I am of this opinion—that they have had so much given to them in this country—everything has been so free to them, that they have not appreciated the advantages that they have; but when they get to be deprived of the franchise for a period of, say, five years, until they have wrestled for it and waited for it, that when it is given to them eventually they will appreciate it.
 Q. Do you think that in five years after annexation you could give to every native who could read and write the right to vote?
 A. Yes; provided the franchise was extended to other nationalities here.
 Q. What other nationalities here?
 A. There is a growing Portuguese element here. There is a growing intelligent Japanese element here of the better classes, and those Chinese who are born in the country and have interests here.
 Q. What sort of interests?
 A. Either commercial, agricultural, or professional.
 Q. You make the same qualification as to votes for all of them?
 A. Yes.
 Q. Suppose the Chinese were not allowed to vote—then what?
 A. They have not the same desire, except in isolated cases, for voting that the Hawaiians, Portuguese, and Japanese have. They have not been accustomed to it.
 Q. Do you allow any Japanese to vote here now?
 A. No; not at present.
 Q. I mean, before the revolution?
 A. No.
 Q. Any Chinese allowed to vote?
 A. No.
 Q. Is there anything you desire to say, Mr. Damon, other than what you have said?
 A. I would say that I was born here, brought up here, and have a sincere regard for the Hawaiian people, because they have many good traits. They have shown a desire, especially the generation which is now and that which is coming on, to put themselves forward if they knew how, and though they may be a diminishing race they are a hopeful race that have not given up the struggle to keep up the Hawaiian name. If we are going to educate them it is just so much thrown away unless they can have some hope held before them that they will be recognized as men in future, and if there is anything I could do to assist them, especially the young and upright Hawaiians, I would like to do it, because they have invariably treated me—whether sovereign, chief, or common Hawaiian—with such invariable kindness that I should be lacking in manhood if I did not want to help them up if possible.
 Q. As to integrity in business matters, how do they compare with people in their condition in life generally?
 A. I think the mistake has been made that you take a Hawaiian and compare him with the Anglo-Saxon standard and expect him to be up even with him when he has not had time and opportunity to fit himself for that standard. You should compare the Hawaiian with what he is to-day and what he was fifty years ago.
 Q. It is better to compare him with some race that exists to-day.
 A. He does lack what is called backbone to carry out to a finish any project that he has.
 Q. Business or otherwise?
 A. Yes.
 Q. But would you say that generally he was an honest man?
 A. I should say so; yes.
 Q. Is there any fear of violence to the persons of women on the part of the natives?
 A. I think he is in advance of what is called the ordinary white man in that respect.
 Q. That is a striking feature in his make up, and that is always appreciated by the best elements here?
 A. Yes; and why it is so is that it is only a few years since he looked to the white men as a superior race, and he at heart feels that they are a superior race to-day.
 Q. Now, is that entirely correct?
 A. A more powerful race, perhaps.
 Q. Well, now, as to another point let me ask you: Wilson lived in the bungalow with his wife and children?
 A. His son is in California. He has no other child.
 Q. He lived with his wife then?
 A. Yes. I have heard that he had a strong influence over the Queen for many years, because Dominis, her husband, was a weak man. Wilson is a strong-willed, powerful man, and she has looked to him as a protector.
 Q. He was in command of the police force?
 A. Yes; at the time, and ever since she was Queen.
 Q. The palace gates have been guarded?
 A. Always.
 Q. Who commanded the guards?
 A. Nowlein and Wilson commanded the police force. Both were intimate friends of the Queen.
 Q. He lived in the palace?
 A. He lived in the bungalow—report said so. He has his own dwelling about a mile from here.
 Q. You do not understand that he and his family lived in the palace proper, with the Queen?
 A. No; they had a house in the yard.
 Q. If the question of annexation was submitted to the people of these islands, with no property qualifications, but only the qualification that the elector should read and write, and conducted on what is sometimes termed the Australian-ballot law, what do you think would be the result of a free expression of the people in the matter of annexation at this time?

A. The sentiment is a growing sentiment, but at this time I think a majority would not vote in favor of it, but, given time to realize it, they would.

Q. How much time do you think would be necessary to bring about such a condition of things in these islands?

A. I think if the provisional government is kept in very long they will come to it very quick. They do not like the provisional government, for the reason that it is a government that has not been placed there by their votes. I am quite sure I have given you a correct answer.

Q. At the time of the dethronement of the Queen was it known in the other islands?

A. No.

Q. They knew nothing of it until after it was accomplished?

A. They did not.

Q. Then it was accomplished by the Honolulu movement?

A. Yes.

Q. What is your condition here as to the matter of acquiescence of the natives with existing authority—their observing order?

A. If they had a real, able leader, in whom they had perfect confidence, he could collect quite a force to follow him.

Q. To attack the existing Government?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you not apprehend any such movement?

A. No, unless that in a period of excitement it should spring up; and, therefore, I have advised a strong force being retained, because we did not know but in some moment of excitement somebody would take advantage of it and make trouble.

Q. What number of troops have you under pay?

A. One hundred and seventy in all. The artillery is hardly to be spoken of—but one company.

Q. How many pieces?

A. They have some eight or ten pieces, but, from motives of prudence, they have locked up the intricate parts in vaults.

Q. So far as you know, the natives have no artillery?

A. No.

Q. No arms?

A. No great quantity. They have scattered rifles and pistols.

Q. Do they amount to anything in case of contest?

A. We have no means of telling at this time.

TUESDAY, May 2, 1893.

Q. Mr. Damon, at the time of the writing of the protest of the Queen on the 17th day of January, 1893, signed by herself and ministers, had the provisional government been recognized by the American minister, Mr. Stevens?

A. It is my impression that it had been, but I can not say positively.

Q. Would the conversation you had with the Queen on that day aid you in determining that fact?

A. I do not think it would.

Q. In referring to Mrs. Wilson living with the Queen, in a previous part of this statement, did you mean to say that she stayed with her at night?

A. I meant to say that she was with the Queen a great deal of the time—both day and night.

Q. As a companion?

A. Yes; as a personal friend and companion.

Q. But where do you suppose she slept—at the bungalow or palace?

A. My impression is that her quarters were with her husband in the bungalow.

I have carefully read through the foregoing and pronounce it an accurate report of the two interviews between Mr. Blount and myself.

S. M. DAMON.

Mr. CAFFERY. I then offer the protest of the governor of Oahu against the landing of troops, to be found on page 572 of the same document.

The protest referred to is as follows:

OFFICE GOVERNOR OF OAHU, Honolulu, January 16, 1893.

SIR: It is my duty to solemnly protest to your excellency against the landing this evening, without permission from the proper authorities, of an armed force from the U. S. S. Boston. Your excellency well knows that when you have desired to land naval forces of the United States for the purpose of drill, permission by the local authorities has been readily accorded. On the present occasion, however, the circumstances are different, and ostensibly the present landing is for the discharge of functions which are distinctly responsible duties of the Hawaiian Government. Such being the case, I am compelled to impress upon your excellency the international questions involved in the matter and the grave responsibility thereby assumed.

While solemnly protesting to your excellency against this unwarrantable proceeding to which I have referred,

I have the honor to remain, sir, your excellency's obedient and humble servant,

A. S. CLEGHORN,
Governor of Oahu.

His Excellency JOHN L. STEVENS,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary,
United States of America.

Mr. CAFFERY. I desire also to insert Minister Stevens's reply to the governor's protest, to be found on page 572 of the same document.

The statement referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES LEGATION, Honolulu, January 17, 1893.

SIR: Yours of yesterday, the 16th, regarding the landing of the United States naval forces in Honolulu, is received. I have carefully read its terms and import. My responsibility as the United States minister plenipotentiary at this critical time in Hawaiian affairs it is impossible for me to ignore. I assure you that in whatever responsibility the American diplomatic and naval representatives have assumed or may assume, we shall do our utmost to regard the welfare of all present and interests concerned.

Yours, sincerely, and with the kindest consideration,

JOHN L. STEVENS.

Hon. A. S. CLEGHORN,
Governor of Oahu.

Mr. CAFFERY. I offer the testimony of Mr. Boyd, consular clerk, commencing on page 265 of the same document, showing the quiet condition of the islands at the time of the revolution.

The testimony referred to is as follows:

Interview with W. Porter Boyd, consular clerk, Honolulu, Tuesday, June 13, 1893.

Q. Mr. Boyd, what is your occupation?
A. I am in the consular service.
Q. In what position?
A. I am a consular clerk and vice-consul-general at this place.
Q. Were you at your office on the 16th of January, 1893?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Were you on the streets on that day?
A. Not until the afternoon about the time of the meeting.
Q. Where was the meeting held?
A. At the armory.
Q. Was there any signs of disturbance on the streets?
A. No, sir.
Q. Business going on as usual?
A. Yes, up to the time of the mass meeting, when they closed to go there.
Q. Women and children on the street as usual?
A. I think there were very few women and children about.
Q. Was there any excitement looking like disorder?
A. No; I do not think there was. I didn't see any of that.
Q. Was there any suggestion of disorder except what might come from the movements of the committee of safety?
A. So far as I know there was not.
Q. What I wish to know—was there anything exciting the public mind except those events growing out of the movement of the committee of safety?
A. I should say there was not.
Q. Was there any indication of hostility manifested by the carrying of arms or threats on the part of what may be termed the royalists?
A. To my knowledge there was not.
Q. Did you attend the mass meeting?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. As an observer?
A. Yes.
Q. How many people do you suppose were there?
A. I should say from eleven to twelve hundred.
Q. Many Portuguese there?
A. I can not answer. I do not know.
Q. What did you understand to be the object of that mass meeting from what you saw and heard?
A. It was first to hear the report of that committee of thirteen, and then take other steps for the protection of the persons and property of citizens of the islands.
Q. What did you understand them to mean by the protection of the persons and property of citizens?
A. I understood that it was to prevent the change of the constitution.
Q. Did you understand that it was to dethrone the Queen and set up another government?
A. That was not my understanding at the time.
Q. Was that the understanding in the community so far as you can gather from contact with people?
A. I should say that of the very pronounced annexationists that was their wish—that was their object—but whether this meeting was for that purpose I do not know.
Q. There was no expression in the crowd, so far as you could gather, containing the idea that this was a movement to dethrone the Queen and set up another government?
A. No, sir.
Q. Had you heard of any meeting of the committee of safety before that meeting?
A. I had heard that they had had meetings, and that they had a report to make.
Q. Did you hear what it was to be?
A. No, sir; and I do not believe anyone else did.
Q. After the mass meeting, what did the people do? Did they go to work again that afternoon?
A. I think they did—I think the stores were open.
Q. Don't you know?
A. No; but that is my impression now. On second thought I am sure that they opened their places again.
Q. Do you think that the crowd that came to that meeting and then went away and went back to their business had any impression that the Queen was going to be dethroned the next day?
A. I do not believe that they thought that. Everything was left in the hands of the committee. The mass meeting gave the thirteen power to go ahead and do what they thought best; and only that thirteen know, so far as I can learn.
Q. But there was no mention that the power to do what they thought best went so far as to dethrone the Queen?
A. Not any further than the way they denounced the action of the Queen on the Saturday before.
Q. But would that indicate that they meant to dethrone her by denouncing her action?
A. Yes; it was my impression that it would be either that or she would remain on the throne under certain restrictions.
Q. Was there any excitement when the troops landed that evening other than that growing out of the fact of seeing troops landed?
A. Yes; of course much more than if troops had been landed, as they have been before, for drill.
Q. Were many people down at the wharf when they landed?
A. I do not think so. They did not seem to know until the troops were landed. Both central offices rang us up and asked us why the Boston troops were landed.
Q. Was it understood that they landed at the request of the committee of safety?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Why did the committee of safety want them to land if everything was quiet?
A. They knew what they were going to do, and they feared some trouble or some interference in their plans.
Q. Now, was it understood, so far as you could gather, by both annexationists and anti-annexationists, that those troops were friendly to the movement of the committee of safety?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Was it encouraging to one side and depressing to the other?
A. I should say it was—for the reason that it was at the request of this committee, and the others did not know what it was for.
Q. Did anti-annexationists seem to be depressed when they found the troops had been landed?
A. Yes.
Q. Were they apprehensive that they would be favorable to the other side?
A. I should say they were.

Q. Was this a continuing feeling up to the dethronement?
A. Yes.
Q. Now, Mr. Boyd, in view of what you have stated and what you observed that day, would you suppose that this feeling restrained action on the part of the Queen and her friends against the committee of safety?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you see Mr. Stevens on Monday, the 16th of January?
A. Yes.
Q. Had he been aboard the Boston?
A. I was told he had been there all afternoon.
Q. By whom?
A. Mr. Severance.
Q. How did Mr. Severance know it?
A. Mr. Stevens, I believe, had told him.
Q. Did he say what he was there for?
A. No, he didn't.
Q. Was Mr. Stevens at the consulate?
A. Yes. He said the Boston boys were going to land and would detail a guard for the consulate.
Q. Had Mr. Severance any desire for it?
A. No; it was the first knowledge he had of it.
Q. Had you any uneasiness at the consulate-general?
A. None whatever.
Q. Did you hear anything from the telephone or otherwise in reference to the landing of the troops?
A. Only that they were landing, and asked why they were landed.
Q. Who asked?
A. The central office asked first.
Q. Did the people in the city make any inquiry?
A. Yes; some.
Q. Did it seem to be a surprise generally?
A. Yes.
Q. Was it a surprise to you?
A. It was.
Q. There was nothing in the city to indicate the need of military forces, so far as you could see?
A. Nothing, so far as I could see.
Q. Did you have any conversation with Judge Hartwell January 14, 1893; did you hear any conversation between him and Lieutenant Young?
A. Not further than that he said that something would drop about 3 o'clock, and asked if he was going to be aboard. He said all the officers will know.
Q. Are you sure that was on Saturday?
A. That was immediately after the prorogation on Saturday.
Q. Did Mr. Atherton say anything on the day of the proclamation dethroning the Queen? What did he say?
A. Mr. Draper, I think, Mr. Severance, and myself were with some others in the office, as was Captain McCullough, of the W. G. Irwin. We were all impatient. Everybody was anxious to know what was going to happen. He said something was going to happen about 3 or 4 o'clock.
Q. He didn't say what it was?
A. No. I had no idea what it was. Of course I had some idea.
Q. Were you not thinking about dethronement?
A. Yes, I was.
Q. Is this Mr. Atherton the man in whose yard the Boston men stopped when they first landed?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. After they landed they went up by the palace?
A. Yes. The main body went on up to Atherton's yard. They stopped there a few hours. It was after dark before they went back to Arion Hall—back of the opera house.
Q. Did Mr. Atherton seem to be satisfied over what was going to happen?
A. Yes. He seemed to be satisfied that everything was coming out as he wished.
Q. Any excitement on the street before the pistol shot?
A. No; just the ordinary crowds walking about.
Q. Did they seem to know what was going on?
A. No.
Q. Were the stores open?
A. Yes.
Q. Any ladies on the street?
A. Very few.
Q. Any children?
A. I do not know that I noticed any children.
Q. What time did they close the stores?
A. They closed them when the report of the pistol was heard, so far as I remember.
Q. What did they do then?
A. They went out on the street, toward where the shot was fired.
Q. Did they go armed?
A. Not to my knowledge.
Q. As if they were going to fight, or only as if to see what was going on?
A. Just for curiosity.
Q. No manifestation of any hostile movement?
A. None whatever. A Mr. Paria, connected with the Advertiser, was our authority. We used to question him, and he used to tell us what was going on. In the afternoon he told us there were three different places where they were enlisting to support any movement the committee wished to make.
Q. Did those men who were enlisted have arms?
A. He didn't say so, or where they were going to get them.
Q. Was that after the proclamation or before?
A. It was before.
Q. Did he say what they were enlisted for?
A. To carry their point. He did not say what it was.
I have read the foregoing and it is a correct report of my interview with Mr. Blount.

HONOLULU, June 13, 1893.

W. P. BOYD.

Mr. CAFFERY. I also offer the statement of Chief Justice A. F. Judd, being a history of the constitutions of Hawaii, to be found on page 362 of the same document.
The statement referred to is as follows:

Interview with Chief Justice A. F. Judd, Honolulu, May 16, 1893.

Q. Please state where you were born.
A. In Honolulu, January 7, 1838.
Q. Has this always been your home?
A. With the exception of four years in the United States, two at Yale and the other two at Harvard law school, and on occasional visits to the States and a trip to Europe. I entered the practice of law in this country in 1864, and was elected twice to the Legislature, in 1868 from South Kona, Hawaii, and again for Honolulu in 1870, and in 1873 I was appointed attorney-general by Lunalilo, and on his death in 1874, on the election of Kalakaua, I went onto the bench as associate justice of the supreme court. I continued on the bench until now, having held different positions. I took the position of first associate justice in 1877, and was appointed chief justice in 1881. I have been in judicial life since my first appointment as judge in February, 1874, and have had my office in the Government building during all that time, and am somewhat familiar with political changes that have taken place.

Q. How were your judges selected prior to the constitution of 1887?

A. They were appointed.

Q. How selected prior to 1887?

A. They were appointed by the King. The supreme judges have always been appointed in that way, and, whatever has happened to this country, I think the sovereigns have always aimed to give us good men as judges.

Q. Who did Kalakaua appoint first as judges?

A. Judge Allen was chief justice under a former appointment—he being in the United States at the time of Kalakaua's election, of course was merely continued in office. The other judges were Hartwell and Widemann. Hartwell was appointed attorney-general and Widemann as minister of the interior. Judge Harris was then made first associate justice and I second associate justice.

Q. None of these were men of native blood?

A. None.

Q. Were they men of substantial character?

A. Yes; all of them. We have had two judges of native blood on the bench.

Q. Appointed by whom?

A. By Kamehameha III and Kamehameha V. The first was Judge H. He was a pure native. The other judge of native blood was R. G. Davis. He was half-white.

Q. How was your Legislature made up prior to the constitution of 1887?

A. It consisted of one body; nobles appointed by the Crown and representatives elected by the people.

Q. How many nobles?

A. Twenty.

Q. How many representatives?

A. It seems to me twenty-four—perhaps twenty-six—I do not know positively.

Q. The number of representatives exceeded the number of nobles prior to 1887?

A. I do not remember, but I think so.

Q. How were nobles selected?

A. Appointed by the King on nomination by the cabinet.

Q. And the representatives were—

A. Elected by the people.

Q. What suffrage qualification had you?

A. Under the constitution of 1852 there was no property qualification. The legislature consisted of two houses that sat separately. King Kamehameha V refused to take the oath to that constitution when he took the throne in the fall of 1863, and he called a convention of delegates to revise the constitution, with the purpose of limiting the power of the people and strengthening his own prerogatives. I was secretary in that convention, and after a very warm discussion the King was unable to agree with the delegates as to the measure of that property qualification. He then dismissed the convention and proclaimed the constitution of 1864, which prescribed a small property qualification for voters.

Q. What was the amount of that property qualification?

A. Two hundred and fifty dollars a year, I think.

Q. Was that property qualification for voters the main point on which the King and the convention disagreed?

A. It was.

Q. Prior to that there was no property qualification?

A. No.

Q. This constitution of 1864 then came by virtue of a proclamation of the King?

A. It did. The people acquiesced in it after awhile, and, although there was a good deal of dissatisfaction felt, the people voted under it and agreed to it, and a good many believed that it was wise—that is, making the Legislature of one house and not of two.

Q. Prior to the constitution of 1864 how were nobles appointed?

A. By the King.

Q. What support had the King in reducing the franchise of the native population of the islands?

A. He had the support of his cabinet, and I think that is about all.

Q. What was the disposition of the more intelligent people here?

A. They considered it very arbitrary. The King at that time was very much opposed to the growth of American influence and republican ideas. He was very bitterly opposed to the influence of the Americans, and especially American missionaries. His aim was to strengthen the royal prerogatives.

Q. But if he cut off the number of native votes by property qualifications, would he accomplish any addition to his strength?

A. He had one house then only, and there could be no negative action on any affirmative action of his. It was not necessary for him to have a majority of each house.

Q. Were the bodies equal in number?

A. I think not; I think the representative body was larger. It was proportioned according to the population of the districts.

Q. Under the constitution of 1864 did you have a property qualification?

A. We did for a while.

Q. How long?

A. For several elections. It was finally eradicated by amendments to the constitution.

Q. In what year?

A. I can only speak from memory, but certainly before 1870, but I certainly can not say without reference to books.

Q. How was that brought about? What state of opinion brought that about?

A. It was mainly the feeling that this was an encroachment. Public sentiment did not feel the necessity for it. Demagogism was then not prevalent. I think the Hawaiians voted better then than they do now. That is, demoralizing influences had not set in.

Q. At that time, I suppose, it was somewhat of a struggle between the King and the people?

A. Yes, precisely.

Q. And they were attempting to recover a part of the power they had lost under that constitution?

A. Yes.

Q. I see in the compilation of your laws, page 230, section 790, the following: "For the island of Hawaii, eight, that is to say:

"One for the district of North Kona, beginning at and including Keahualono, and extending to and including Puuohao; one for the district of South Kona, beginning at Puuohao and extending to and including Kaheawal.

"One for the district of Kau.

"One for the district of Puna.

"Two for the district of Hilo.

"One for the district of Hamakua.

"One for the district of Kohala.

"For the island of Maui, seven, that is to say, two for the district composed of Lahaina, Ukumehame, and Kahoolawe.

"One for the district composed of Kahakuloa and Kaaanapali.

"One for the district beginning with and including Waihee and extending to and including Honouliuli.

"One for the district beginning with and including Kahikinui and extending to and including Koolau.

"One for the district beginning with and including Hamakualoa and extending to and including Kula.

"Two for the districts composing the islands of Molokai and Lanai.

"For the island of Oahu, eight, that is to say, four for the district of Honolulu, beginning with and including Maunaloa, and extending to and including Moanalua.

"And one for the district composed of Ewa and Waianae.

"One for the district of Waiailua.

"One for the district of Koolauloa.

"One for the district of Koolaupoko.

"For the island of Kauai, three, that is to say: One for the district of Waiimea, beginning with and including Nualolo and extending to and including Hanalei, and also including the island of Niihau.

"One for the district of Puna, beginning with and including Wahiawa, and extending to and including Wailua.

"One for the district of Hanalei, beginning with and including Kapaa, and extending to and including Awa-awa-puhi."

Please say how many representatives you had under that?

A. Twenty-six.

Q. When was that established?

A. There have been laws of this character altered little by little, but a law of this general character has been in existence from very early times—that is, from 1852. There would be occasional changes, adding one representative to one district and taking one away possibly from another district.

Q. I ask your attention to section 774 of your compilation of laws:

"The house of representatives shall be composed of not less than twenty-four nor more than forty members, who shall be elected biennially."

Prior to 1887 you had in a legislative body twenty-six representatives?

A. Yes.

Q. Was it ever larger than that?

A. I think not.

Q. That gave them a popular element in the Legislature—a majority over the power of the King as represented in the nobles?

A. That is the way it was generally exercised. The King never appointed his full number.

Q. But the constitution itself provided that he might appoint thirty and that the representatives might be forty?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. The fact was he generally appointed twenty, and the representatives were twenty-six?

A. Yes.

Q. So that there remained from this an excess of political power in the representatives in the legislative body as against the Crown?

A. That is true; but they rarely ever divided on that issue—nobles on one side and representatives on the other. Some of our best legislation was accomplished through the nobles. They were excellent men.

Q. What class of men generally?

A. Such men as Mr. C. B. Bishop, S. G. Wilder, and Mr. Dowsett. They were appointed by Lunalilo, who filled up the body to twenty.

Q. Were they generally appointed from the class of men who represented the intelligence and wealth and morality of the community or not?

A. In those days they were nominated to the King by his cabinet, and they were representative of the property of this Kingdom, combining also a fair representation of character and intelligence, until the middle of Kalakaua's reign, when, as vacancies occurred, he would appoint natives generally, who did not have these characteristics of wealth, character, and intelligence.

Q. How was a ministry appointed and removed?

A. Under every constitution prior to 1887 the ministers were appointed by the King and removed by him; but until Kalakaua's reign it was a very rare thing that any King changed his ministry. They had a pretty long lease of political life. My father was minister for nine or ten years, and Mr. Wyllie for a longer period. It was a very rare political occurrence, and made a great sensation when a change was made. Under Kalakaua things were different. I think he had twenty-six different cabinets during his reign.

Q. How long was his reign?

A. From 1874 to 1891.

Q. What were the property qualifications of electors prior to 1887?

A. None—no property qualification.

Q. They had to be 20 years of age, and to be able to read and write?

A. If born since 1840, they had to be able to read and write; but this test was rarely applied. If born before that, there was no qualification at all.

Q. Under the constitution of 1887 the same qualification of an elector for representative was continued?

A. Yes; substantially the same.

Q. Was there any very considerable change in the matter of the qualification of a voter for representative under the constitution of 1887 in the matter of allowing foreigners to vote?

A. There was.

Q. Please state it.

A. Previous to that time only citizens could vote—that is, native born or naturalized, or those who had received letters of denization. The constitution of 1887 allowed all residents, if they had those qualifications, excepting Asiatics, and they were not allowed to vote, even those who were citizens by naturalization.

Q. Did that cover the Portuguese element?

A. We allowed Portuguese to vote.

Q. Then the races that were excluded under that from the privilege of voting were the Chinese and the Japanese?

A. Yes.

Q. How about the qualifications to read and write for that class of voters—I mean the Portuguese, Americans, and Europeans who were allowed to vote? Did the qualifications as to reading and writing apply to them?

A. It did.

Q. Were there many Portuguese then voting under the constitution of 1887?

A. A good many voted. Not having the statistics before me, I can not say what proportion.

Q. Under that constitution of 1887 were the number of nobles and representatives the same?

A. Exactly the same—twenty-four nobles and twenty-four representatives.

Q. The cabinet was appointed by the Crown?
A. Yes.
Q. And how removable?
A. Only by vote of want of confidence passed by a majority of elected members.
Q. What was the character of the increased power of the cabinet under the constitution of 1887 over that of 1864?
A. It made the ministerial responsibility clearer, I think, than it existed under the constitution of 1864.
Q. In what way was it made clearer?
A. By express provision after 1887, if I mistake not, saying that whenever any act was to be done by the sovereign it was to be done by and with the advice of the cabinet. That the supreme court has held to be the advice of a majority of the cabinet.
Q. Would that be so in the matter of the exercise of the veto power?
A. We thought not. That is, the justices of the supreme court thought not. Under the constitution, which made the legislative power consist of the King and the Legislature, we felt that this act in approving or vetoing a bill was a legislative and not an executive act.
Q. What did the word signify, then, in relation to the power that the King could only do it with the advice of the cabinet?
A. We construed that power of the King which could only be exercised through the ministry as applying solely to executive and not to legislative acts.
Q. He could do nothing, then, without the sanction of a majority of the cabinet in the matter of administration?
A. No, sir.
Q. A single member of the cabinet would not answer?
A. No, sir. The Thurston ministry broke up on that principle, Ashford advising the King, contrary to the advice of the supreme court, that he was not bound to act unless all the members of the cabinet advised a certain measure. That led to a serious difference in the cabinet, which resulted in breaking it up.
Q. The court held that it required a majority?
A. Yes.
Q. Which Ashford was that?
A. C. W. Ashford. After his return from Canada he seemed to be very much changed.
Q. Your house of nobles was equal in number to the representatives. What was the qualification of an elector for nobles?
A. The property qualification was an income of $600 a year, or unencumbered real property of the value of $3,000. We held that where a man was paid wages and his board, that his board was not to be included; that he must have a clear income of $600.
Q. I wish to ask you the reason for these changes—what they were intended to accomplish—and I wish to ask you because of your high official position as chief justice and because of your high character?
A. The main grievance was this: The Legislature was composed of officeholders. I mean the representatives prior to 1887. The district justice, nominated by the governor of each island, would use his judicial influence by making it very easy with the offenses of the people. The same thing was true of deputy sheriffs, tax assessors, tax collectors, and all minor officials. When once in the Legislature they could be very easily controlled either by threats of withdrawing the offices from them, or by promises of other offices. As was well expressed by Mr. Gibson, who was premier at one time, the King was the larger part of the Legislature. That is, his influence exerted through these agents became paramount. He could accomplish, against his ministry even, almost any measure he chose.
Q. Did he appoint all these officers to which you referred?
A. Not directly, but the governors, being appointed for four years, and being his favorites, would appoint any officials he suggested, and as a matter of fact, Kalakaua nominated, directly or indirectly, the mass of the officials in this country.
Q. Do you mean to say that by the appointment of governors who were personal friends of his there came to be appointments of subordinate officers who were in sympathy with the King in his political views and his general wishes?
A. I do, and more especially to carry out the money votes which he was very eager for in order to pay his debts, the expenses of his tour abroad, of his coronation, of the military embassy to Samoa, and other extravagances which every respectable person thought very unwise. I recommended in my report to the Legislature a change in this respect, i. e., in the qualifications of candidates to the Legislature, excluding judges, etc. Another cause, hardly second in importance, was the matter of the removal of ministries. I have said that up to that time there had been twenty-six changes of cabinets. It had unsettled the community so greatly and gave opportunity for what is called "backstairs cabinets" by adventurers and others that there was very little stability in the Government. It was almost impossible for any ministry to carry out any settled policy, certainly any policy that did not please the King.
Q. You changed the constitution so as to guard against that improper mode of the appointment of inferior officers?
A. It forbade any person being appointed to office during the whole time for which he was elected, and also forbade the election of anybody who held any office under the Government.
Q. Then you cut off that power of the King in the use of his patronage?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. As to the appointment of nobles, the idea was to take that away from him?
A. The nobles were elected by what was supposed to be the wealthy and influential class.
Q. That was taken away from the King and placed among the wealthy and influential classes?
A. Yes; so that they could have representation in the Legislature.
Q. Under that a minority of the natives only could vote for nobles?
A. Only a minority of them could vote; it gave them great dissatisfaction.
Q. Any other changes of consequence?
A. I think not.
Q. You say this new manner of selecting nobles gave the natives great dissatisfaction?
A. It did. The first election held under the constitution was very satisfactory. The natives voted well. Good men were elected. Then they were told that the white people had advantages, by reason of their wealth, over them, and this idea at election time, that they were put in an inferior position, was always forced upon them.
Q. Will you be kind enough to state how this new constitution was established?
A. The two events which brought this matter to a culminating point were (1) the opium deal of $71,000, by which a Chinaman named Aki was made by the King to pay him a bribe of $71,000 of hard coin in order to obtain the exclusive franchise for selling opium, and (2) the expense of the expedition to Samoa in the Kaimion. A secret league was formed all over the islands, the result of which was the King was asked to promulgate a new constitution containing those provisions that I have before alluded to. It was very adroitly managed by the Ashfords, and more especially by V. V. Ashford, who obtained the confidence of the King and Mr. Gibson. He was the colonel of the rifles, and he assured them that if he was paid a certain sum of money and made minister to Canada that he would arrange it so that the movement would be futile.

Q. How was he to do that?
A. By preventing the use of the military, I suppose. And he arranged with the military authorities and Captain Haley that they should be called out to preserve public order, although it was this large and well-drilled force which made the King fear that if he did not yield things would be very critical for him.

Q. Was that a Government force?

A. It was organized under the laws.

Q. A volunteer organization?

A. Yes.

Q. So that the men in sympathy with the movement of this secret league went into it and constituted it under form of law?

A. Of course I do not know what was told the King privately, but I know that he felt it would be very dangerous to refuse to promulgate the new constitution. I have no doubt that a great many things were circulated which came to his ears in the way of threats that were unfounded.

Q. What was the outside manifestation?

A. One great feature of it was its secrecy. The King was frightened at this secrecy. It was very well managed. The judges of the supreme court were not told of it until just before the event took place. I think it was the 2d or 3d of July, 1887.

Q. Was there then a mass meeting?

A. There was a large mass meeting held, and a set of resolutions was presented to the King, requiring that a new ministry be formed, by Mr. W. L. Green and one other person whose name I have forgotten.

Q. Was there any display of force?

A. The Honolulu Rifles were in detachments marched about in different portions of the town, having been called out by the legal military authorities.

Q. Who were the legal military authorities?

A. The governor of the island, Dominis, and Capt. H. Burrill-Haley, the adjutant-general.

Q. Were they in sympathy with the movement?

A. No, sir; the officers of the corps were in sympathy with the movement.

Q. Who were they?

A. Ashford and Hebbard; I do not remember all.

Q. Did the governor order them out, not knowing of this state of things?
A. I think he did. I think he knew it; but it was to prevent, as I believe, something worse happening. As I said, there were threats made.

Q. Of what sort?

A. I understood that at one time there was a very strong feeling that the King should be forced to abdicate altogether, and it was only the more conservative men born here who said that the King and the Hawaiians should have another opportunity.

Q. Were there not two elements in that movement, one for a republic and the other for restraining the power of the King?

A. Yes.

Q. Were there not two forces in this movement cooperating together up to a certain point, to wit: those who were in favor of restraining the King by virtue of the provisions of the constitution of 1887, and those who were in favor of dethroning the King and establishing a republic?
A. I understand that there were, and that the more conservative view prevailed.

Q. And the men who were in favor of a republic were discontented at the outcome?

A. They were, and they didn't want the Hawaiians to vote at all; and the reason that the Portuguese were allowed to vote was to balance the native vote.

Q. Whose idea was that—was that the idea of the men who made the new constitution?

A. Of the men who made the new constitution.

Q. It was to balance the native vote with the Portuguese vote?

A. That was the idea.

Q. And that would throw the political power into the hands of the intelligence and wealth of the country?

A. That was the aim.

Q. How was this military used?

A. It was put about in squads over the city.

Q. The officers of the corps were really in favor of the movement for the new constitution, and were called out by Governor Dominis to preserve order?

A. Yes. After the affair was over he was thanked by a military order from headquarters.

Q. Do you suppose he was gratified with thanks, under the circumstances?
A. Haley said to me when he showed me the order, "It is a little funny to thank a man who kicked you out, but I suppose I've got to do it."

Q. The King acceded to the demand for a new constitution and of a cabinet of given character?

A. In the first place he acceded to the proposition to make a new cabinet named by Mr. Green. The former cabinet, consisting of Mr. Gibson and three Hawaiians, had just resigned a day or two before. In three or four days the cabinet waited upon him with the constitution.

Q. What cabinet?

A. The cabinet consisting of Mr. Green, minister of foreign affairs; Mr. Thurston, minister of the interior; Mr. C. W. Ashford, attorney-general, and Mr. Godfrey Brown, minister of finance. I was sent for in the afternoon of July 5 to swear the King to the constitution. When I reached the palace they were all there, and the King asked me in Hawaiian whether he had better sign it or not. I said, "You must follow the advice of your responsible ministers." He signed it.

Q. This ministry had been appointed as the result of the demand of the mass meeting?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And then, having been appointed, they presented him with the constitution of 1887?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And he signed it?

A. He did.

Q. Was that constitution ever submitted to a popular vote for ratification?

A. No; it was not. There was no direct vote ratifying the constitution, but its provisions requiring that no one should vote unless he had taken an oath to support it, and a large number voted at that first election, was considered a virtual ratification of the constitution.

Q. If they voted at all, they were considered as accepting it?

A. Yes, sir. I do not think any large number refused to take the oath to it.

Q. It was not contemplated by the mass meeting, nor the cabinet, nor anybody in power, to submit the matter of ratification at all?

A. No; it was not. It was considered a revolution. It was a successful revolutionary act.

Q. And therefore was not submitted to a popular vote for ratification?

A. Yes, sir. It had mischievous effects in encouraging the Wilcox revolution of 1890, which was unsuccessful. I think it was a bad precedent, only the exigencies of the occasion seemed to demand it.

Q. Was there discontent with that constitution on the part of Kalakaua? Was he ever satisfied with it?

A. He was very skillful in concealing his views. I do not think he was satisfied with it.

Q. Was the ex-Queen ever satisfied with it?

A. I think much less satisfied with it than he was, and commenced movements against it even before her brother died—while she was princess. From my intimate acquaintance with her, I knew that she ran away with the idea that she was Queen only of the native Hawaiians and not of the whites, even though born here.

Q. Have the natives as a race been discontented with these changes?

A. As shown in their public utterances in the Legislature, at election times, and through their native newspapers, I should say yes; but from my acquaintance with them personally, I am unable to see that it has worked to their injury, and I do not see evidences of their dissatisfaction.

Q. Were they in this secret league to which you had made reference?

A. I think there was only one person of mixed blood in the league.

Q. Did your politics take on anything of a racial form at any time? If so, when?

A. Occasionally a native in the Legislature would lose his head and say severe things against the whites as a class. It is generally frowned down upon by the most respectable of the natives and the foreigners. It has, however, been made a much more prominent feature in politics of late.

Q. Did Gibson use that race feeling to obtain power and to maintain himself in it?

A. He did; and he also used flattery to the King to exalt his position. He fostered in the King's mind the idea of proclaiming himself emperor of the Pacific in connection with the Samoan affair.

Q. But in dealing with the natives in the matter of suffrage did he play on the matter of race feeling?

A. Somewhat. His emissaries generally looked to other means—gin among them.

Q. Was he in the habit of abusing the whites, those who are called missionaries?

A. Yes. The first mischief he did was in thwarting the treaty of reciprocity.

Q. In what year was that?

A. In 1873.

Q. Before Kalakaua was King?

A. Yes; and the ministry of which I was a member, Mr. Bishop being leader, owing to the fact that King Lunalilo was in consumption, felt that it was prudent to abandon it.

Q. You were going to speak of race feeling in regard to politics?

A. It has been almost impossible to elect any kind of a decent white man in Honolulu for many years.

Q. Why?

A. I once had a conversation with a very prominent native and asked him why they never succeeded in electing a good white man in Honolulu. He said:

"The man whom you regard as the best man the natives oppose just because you want him elected."

Q. I suppose you were not with the committee of safety during the late revolution?

A. I was not informed of any of their proceedings. They kept me out.

Q. Did you know that a constitution was going to be proclaimed in 1893 before it was done?

A. I had heard hints during some years before that the Queen was anxious to proclaim a new constitution, but I did not hear of her present intention until the morning of Saturday. Shortly before the prorogation, at 10 o'clock in the morning, a gentleman told me that immediately after the prorogation Mr. William White, the lottery advocate in the legislature, was going to the palace with a large number of people and that the Queen was going to proclaim a new constitution. I mentioned it to my associates on the bench. They didn't credit it. I mentioned it to a few others, among them the French consul. It disturbed me very much. Immediately the legislature was prorogued I looked out from the balcony and saw a large number of natives dressed in black and wearing beaver hats and marching over to the palace with banners and carrying a parcel.

I said to myself that is the new constitution. Being invited by the chamberlain to go over there, which is customary after prorogation, I urged my associates to accompany me. Judge Dole had an engagement and could not go. Judge Bickerton and I went over. We stayed until 4 o'clock and saw the whole thing, except we were not in the private room with the Queen when she had her ministry there. The speech that she made, when she said she had designed to promulgate a new constitution but had met with obstacles and was prevented for the present, I wrote from memory. She said it in Hawaiian. I went home that evening, wrote it down from memory, and furnished it to the press.

Q. What was the point of it?

A. She was under great emotion. I never saw her in such a state of agitation. At the same time she controlled herself. It was really a magnificent spectacle. She said she had listened to thousands of voices demanding a change in the constitution—demanding a new constitution—and she thought the opportune moment had come. The constitution was very defective, and she turned around to defer to me as her witness, because I had had occasion so often to construe it. She had prepared a new constitution which she thought would meet the purposes required and would please the people; but she said with great sorrow: "I am obliged to tell you that I can not do it now. I have met with obstacles, but I ask you to go home; continue to love me, and I will continue to love you, and in a few days you will have your wishes gratified." Immediately a member of the Legislature, the throne room being full of the Hui Kalaialaas, turned around and said: "What shall we do with these men who prevent the gratification of our wishes?" meaning the ministry. We hushed him up; told him to keep quiet, and I left the palace.

Q. What do you suppose she meant, that in a few days they would be gratified?

A. She hoped to overcome the objections of her cabinet. Parker told me that the reason he stayed by her without leaving her all that afternoon was that he was afraid she would break away from the cabinet, go out on the balcony, and say to the people: "The ministers won't approve it, and my chief justice won't swear me to it. Here is your constitution. Now look out for these men." We stayed there not under any physical compulsion. I sent in two messages by the chamberlain asking to be excused, but she sent word asking me to remain. Evidently she expected that thing done then and there. Mr. Wilson, the marshal, was in a great state of excitement, and told me that he had been fighting the battle alone all the morning with her, and wanted me to go in and use my influence to prevent her from doing it. I said that if the Queen asked me to come into her council I should be glad to do it, but I could not swear her to the new constitution.

Q. Have you any personal knowledge of improper relations between Wilson and the ex-Queen?

A. I know this as a fact, that when the supreme court decided that on the death of Kalakaua she could require the resignation of the cabinet appointed by him and could appoint her own cabinet, that she made three conditions with the new cabinet, and one of these conditions was such that Mr. Peterson would not consent to resume office under her. The three conditions were these: That Wilson was to be marshal, a native boy named Joe Aea was to be made turnkey of the prison, and that Wundenberg was to be dismissed as postmaster-general. Wundenberg had dismissed Henry Poor from a clerkship in the post-office, whose mother, living on Emma street, was a very strong friend of the Queen.

They were schoolmates together with me, and she, Mrs. Poor, is in charge of two boys. One of the boys is Dominie's own son by a woman named Mary Purdy. She is married to the messenger of the foreign office, named Kamiki, and the other child is a son of Joe Aea, and rumor says it is the Queen's own child. I do not know whether it is the Queen's child or a child of Aea's wife. I got it from Kamiki, who was deprived of the service of his wife from being Dominie's mistress. When Dominie died he died with one hand in the hands of the Queen and the other in Mary Purdy's hands. On one occasion I went to her about the morality of the palace, and she professed to me to be in favor of religion and morality. I went to her on account of a great deal of scandal in regard to the character of the palace invitations.

Q. Did Wilson live in the bungalow?

A. Yes.

Q. And when she went back to Washington Place he always had a cottage there?

A. Yes.

Q. He was marshal?

A. Yes; he had been clerk of the waterworks before that.

Q. Judge, you have a good many races of people here. Could you establish stable government here on the basis of a qualification that they should read and write the English language?

A. That would limit the number qualified to vote very much. It would exclude nearly all the old Hawaiians. It would exclude the Portuguese, except the younger class that have been to school here, and, of course, the younger Hawaiians, who are now taught English exclusively.

Q. What would be the proportion between the white and native vote, putting the English test?

A. I can not say.

Q. Would it leave the native vote in excess or not?

A. I think it would.

Q. Now, on the basis of reading and writing English, could you establish a permanent form of government?

A. I doubt it very much.

Q. Could it maintain a government such as obtains in the States of the United States—New York, for instance?

A. It depends upon the character of the imperial government over it.

Q. What do you mean?

A. I mean that a republic of our own would not be at all successful.

Q. Why?

A. Because our natives are so likely to be influenced by demagogues, and more especially such influences as obtained in the last Legislature, such as the lottery—such schemes as that. The natives joined with the lower class of whites. They have not sufficient character to resist.

Q. Could you establish one that would make life and property safe and preserve order?

A. I doubt it very much.

Q. Would you be willing to take your chances on that sort of government?

A. No, sir. As a property holder and a man of family I would not like to take my chances.

Q. Could you maintain a good government here as a State in the Federal Union, like the State of New York?

A. I have not thought that was possible, because I do not suppose the United States would ever consent to have two Senators from a place like this.

Q. I am not talking about what they would consent to, but as to what you consider the qualifications of the Hawaiians to vote. I do not want to imply that the Government of the United States means to do anything.

A. Yes; I believe we could.

Q. What is the character of the Hawaiian as a voter? Is he an intelligent voter?

A. That is a matter of comparison, of course. He is easily influenced.

Q. In what way?

A. When his prejudices are excited, and when he is told the usual election stories; that something is going to happen unless they vote for such and such a man.

Q. Is he in the habit of selling his vote?

A. I believe there has been a good deal of bribery in this way, paying a man's taxes for him—there being a qualification that a man shall have paid his taxes.

Q. Are they influenced much in elections by liquor?

A. Until the Australian ballot went into effect. The election of 1896 was largely managed by gin.

Q. What is their character as to honesty?

A. So far as they are concerned, they are not especially addicted to larceny.

Q. Not more than the white race?

A. No; I have lived in my present residence twenty-one years; have never had a theft; we live with our houses very loosely fastened.

Q. What is the moral character of the race?

A. The seafaring class are very much addicted to the use of liquor.

Q. What is the character of the Hawaiian women for chastity?

A. They are not chaste. At the same time they do not expose their immorality to public view. I think strangers would see scarcely anything of it. There is an outward observance of the laws of decency and morality.

Q. Why do they observe it outwardly and not practice it in secrecy?

A. I think it is the influence of their religious teaching. It is a source of profit to them.

Q. How?

A. Sailors and mechanics visit them, and that is what supports their families very largely in the low part of the town.

Q. Is that the character of the Hawaiian women generally?

A. I must except many very good, virtuous women.

Q. I do not mean exceptions.

A. They are accessible.

Q. As a race they are not chaste?

A. Their instincts are toward the sexual desire.

Q. Then the domestic circle is not marked by chaste conversation and life?

A. They are very careless in their conversation before their children.

Q. There is a good deal of intermarriage between the whites and natives here. What is the result of that? Is it a better type?

A. It is a more intelligent type.

Q. Are they not better morally?
A. As a class, no.

Q. Are the half-castes generally the result of matrimonial alliances?
A. There are a large number that are not.

Q. What social recognition have these half-castes?
A. They have always received social recognition. They have always been sought after by strangers.

Q. How in social life here; are they received among the whites?
A. Those of good character are. There are several large families received on terms of perfect equality.

Q. The Portuguese population here, is that leaving much?
A. Yes.

Q. To what extent; rapidly, would you say?
A. Yes; on account of their inability to obtain land.

Q. Why can not they obtain land?
A. A great many lands have been tied up by long leases, although the Government has commenced the system of throwing open lands to homesteaders.

Q. But still the tendency is to leave?
A. Yes; they want to go to California—to America.

Q. Then is it the land only?
A. No; it is the desire to go to America; it is their El Dorado.

Q. The Japanese population is probably your future reliance for labor?
A. Yes; but I think the Chinese make the best laborers.

Q. But the authorities who have been controlling the islands have taken the view that it was best not to allow the Chinamen to come in in large numbers?
A. Yes, sir.

Q. And the action of the Government has been toward restricting that, and looking to Japan for laborers?
A. Yes; that has been the policy of the country for a long time.

Q. Are these Japanese beginning to get the desire for suffrage?
A. I only hear it through the newspapers.

Q. What do you hear?
A. I hear that they will in time demand suffrage.

Q. What do you think of them as voters?
A. I think they would vote as the consul wanted them to vote. They are an inferior class, brought up with the idea that they must obey their superiors.

Q. They belong to the lowest class of the Japanese population?
A. Yes; they have very great deference for their superiors.

Q. Are they learning to read and write the English language to any extent?
A. Those who remain in the field do not have the opportunity. Their children go to school and learn English.

Q. Your native population, do they understand generally how to read and write the native tongue?
A. Lately they are losing the ability to speak Hawaiian well, by reason of their minds being directed in school to English.

Q. What books have they in the Hawaiian language?
A. Very few books outside of schoolbooks and religious books, and a few trashy novels.

Q. They have the Bible and the Pilgrim's Progress?
A. Yes.

Q. You indicated a desire to make a statement in reference to certain occurrences in the legislature of 1892.

A. The body of Kalakaua arrived here on the 29th of January, 1891. At 2 o'clock that day Liliuokalani took the oath to support the constitution of 1887, which I administered. Kalakaua's cabinet consisted then of Cummins, C. N. Spencer, Godfrey Brown, and A. P. Peterson. There was a great deal of discussion and wire pulling as to whether that cabinet should have the right to continue. Finally the opinion of the court was asked and it was held that she had liberty to ask for their resignation. They resigned and she appointed Parker, minister of foreign affairs; Widemann, finance; Spencer, interior, and Whiting, attorney-general.

At the general election which took place in 1892 all the representatives of the island of Oahu were elected from the Liberal party, of which Robert W. Wilcox was the leader (with one exception, W. R. Wilder), who was elected for one of the districts of Honolulu. The Legislature was opened on the 20th of May. On the 6th of June a vote was taken to expunge MacFarlane's resolution, which was directed against Minister Stevens, which was carried by 33 to 15. On the 30th of August the Parker ministry was voted out by 31 to 10. There was no new cabinet appointed until the 15th of September. That was E. C. MacFarlane, minister of finance; Parker, foreign affairs; Gulick, interior, and Neumann, attorney-general. On the 15th of September there was another vote of want of confidence in the MacFarlane cabinet. It received 21 votes against 21. The question as to whether that was a sufficient constitutional number to pass it was referred to the judges of the supreme court, who decided that 25 votes were necessary.

Meanwhile, on the 4th of October, there was a special election held on this island, and Malle, a native from the fish market, and Hopkins, a half-white, were elected as nobles, by a very large majority, over two very respectable men, M. P. Robinson and H. Waterhouse, by the so-called lottery faction; that is, people who were bound to carry the lottery bill through.

On the 17th of October there was another vote of want of confidence introduced in the MacFarlane ministry, and it passed—33 to 15. On the 1st of November, at 10 o'clock in the morning, the Queen appointed Cornwell minister of finance, Gulick minister of the interior, Nawahi minister of foreign affairs, and Creighton attorney-general. At half-past 12 they were voted out—20 to 15, the same day. The 4th of November, rumors prevailed that the Queen would agree to appoint G. N. Wilcox minister of the interior, Cecil Brown attorney-general, P. C. Jones minister of finance, and M. C. Robinson minister of foreign affairs.

On the 8th of November this cabinet was appointed and sworn in. Then the country felt easy. The next important event was on the 6th of December, when the Legislature sent a request for an opinion to the justices of the supreme court upon the question whether an amendment to the constitution which had passed two successive Legislatures required the approval of the Queen. We answered that it did not.

Q. What was the constitutional provision?
A. It was something with reference to allowing legislation restricting the residence of Chinese here. The idea was that any laws that might be passed restricting terms of residence or rights of Chinese here would not be held unconstitutional.

Q. At that time was there any restriction on Chinese immigration?
A. Oh, yes; there were restrictions that had passed the Legislature with reference to their entering the Kingdom, but when once in the Kingdom they had the rights of all residents under Hawaiian law, and by our constitution no class legislation would be permissible under the constitution. The object of this amendment was to allow legislation of that character.

Q. Do you have reference to legislation providing that the Chinese should not reside here after the contract term had expired?
A. Yes; I think also as to the character of the employment they should engage in. It was the desire to pass that law which gave rise to this submission to the court. The constitution of 1887 left out all the provisions which had previously existed as to the sovereign signing an amendment to the constitution. The only popular reference was that any amendment that had passed one Legislature would have to be published three months previous to the election, and then if it passed the second Legislature it became a law.

Q. Was there no direct submission to the people?
A. Only in that way. On the 21st of December this ministry, which had the confidence of the people, began to have difficulty with the Queen with reference to the appointment of circuit judges under the new act.

Q. In what way?
A. They nominated Mr. Whiting and Mr. Frear.

Q. And she was not willing?
A. At first she was. The appointment of circuit judges was not to go into effect until the 1st of January, but it was deemed advisable that these gentlemen, who were in the practice of law, should be notified beforehand to arrange their business, as terms of the circuit court would begin with the new year. She first agreed that she would make these appointments. Then she said she did not care to appoint Mr. Frear, but wanted Mr. Rosa. I had a long talk with her. I told her that Mr. Rosa's habits would make him unfit; that he got drunk. She finally on the 3d of January appointed those two judges. On the 29th of December there was talk all over town and in the lobby of the legislature that there would be a vote of want of confidence against the Wilcox ministry, and on the 4th of January Mr. Bush introduced one. It failed, 19 to 23. On the 10th of January the lottery bill, which everyone supposed was dead, was moved up by C. L. Hopkins, who had just been elected by the lottery people.

Q. What is he doing now?
A. He is in the fishing business. I can not say he is in the opium business. It passed on the second reading, to the astonishment of everybody, by 20 to 17. It was hurried right along and passed its third reading on the 11th of January, 23 to 20. Six of the members of the house had gone home. On the 12th at half past 1 Kapahu introduced a vote of want of confidence in the Wilcox cabinet, and it passed, 25 to 16. Noble C. O. Beyer being the twenty-fifth man, and he voted that way because Mr. Widemann was promised by the Queen that he should form a new cabinet. On the 13th of January there was no quorum in the morning. At half past 2 the cabinet came in—Parker, Cornwell, Peterson, and Colburn. That was Friday. That night quite a number of members tried to get their forces together to introduce a vote of want of confidence in that ministry. People said no, it is no use. Saturday morning Mr. Peterson announced to the legislature that the Queen had signed two bills that had interested the community for a long time—the bill licensing the sale of opium and the establishing of smoking joints, and the lottery bill, giving an exclusive franchise to these individuals for a term of twenty-five years to establish a national lottery, for which they were to give the Government $500,000 a year.

Q. Did the bill provide how it should be used?
A. It provided that a certain sum should be used for the laying of a cable between here and San Francisco.

Q. Any other public work?
A. I do not now remember.

Q. Did you participate in the meetings of the committee of safety on 14th, 15th, 16th, and 17th of January?
A. I did not, being a judge.

I have carefully read the foregoing and pronounce it an accurate report of my interview with Mr. Blount.

A. F. JUDD.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, lest my position be misunderstood on the question of the constitutionality of the admission of new States under Article III of the Constitution from what I may have said in my opening remarks, I will restate that position, not at any great length. I stated that the framers of the Constitution, when this section authorizing Congress to admit new States was adopted, had in mind the admission of States to be carved out of the Northwestern Territory. I think that is clear from the surrounding facts attending the adoption of the Constitution, especially the cession from different States of that territory to the United States. But I did not mean to be understood that the United States had not the power to acquire new territory and to admit that territory as new States under the Constitution.

My sole contention was that the admission of new States must perforce be limited to the States contemplated by the framers of the Constitution to be made out of the then existing territory, or new States made out of other territory that might be subsequently acquired. I do not think that, under that article of the Constitution allowing Congress to admit new States, we can take States foreign to our country, States not carved out of territory theretofore acquired by treaty, and admit them under the operation of a joint resolution. In other words, sir, I believe that the power of acquiring territory by treaty, as that is one of the usual functions of a treaty-making power, resides fully with the Executive in conjunction with the Senate.

I argued, and I will reargue, that, in my opinion, to allow the Congress of the United States, under the article of the Constitution allowing Congress to admit new States, so as to embrace territory not theretofore acquired by us as territory, was to completely absorb the treaty-making power and render that power utterly nugatory in the hands of the Executive and the Senate, for if, Mr. President, this pending joint resolution is firmly founded upon the Constitution and is a constitutional means of acquiring territory, Congress can admit any territory anywhere and then create a State out of it. I say that the President and the Senate are set aside in one very high function conferred upon them by the Constitution, if this be true.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator what he says now about the admission of Texas? Was that a legal admission or not? Is Texas in the Union or is she out? She is a sovereign State, as all the world recognizes.

Mr. CAFFERY. In my opinion, Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States was violated in the admission of Texas under a joint resolution. In my opinion, the only way that the territory of Texas could have been acquired was by the treaty-making power, and, after having been thus acquired, it could have been erected into a new State, but primarily we could not constitutionally admit Texas as a new State from the beginning. That is my view of the Constitution.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator does not answer my question. Is Texas in the Union or out of it?

Mr. CAFFERY. Texas is certainly in the Union.

Mr. TELLER. How did she get in?

Mr. CAFFERY. She got in by a violation, in my opinion, of the Constitution; but it being a question of a political character, it can not be adjudicated on by the courts. That is the same proposition which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] put to me—precisely the same. It is no answer to the constitutional argument to say that because Texas came in unconstitutionally, and is in, therefore she properly got in. That is a non sequitur.

Mr. TELLER. Do I understand the Senator to say that there is no provision in the Constitution of the United States, then, for taking in an independent State?

Mr. CAFFERY. None whatever, as a State.

Mr. TELLER. There certainly is not any, I think the Senator will admit, under the treaty-making power.

Mr. CAFFERY. I mean foreign states.

Mr. TELLER. Foreign states. There certainly is none under the Constitution for taking them in as Territories.

Mr. CAFFERY. Clearly there is power to take in territories as Territories.

Mr. TELLER. Where?

Mr. CAFFERY. Under the treaty-making power.

Mr. TELLER. The Constitution of the United States says that the treaty-making power is lodged in the President of the United States and in the Senate. That is all it says upon that question. Will the Senator show me any constitutional provision which says that we may properly acquire jurisdiction over territory through the treaty-making power? True, we have been doing it.

Mr. FAULKNER. The decision of the Supreme Court in the Utah case settles that.

Mr. CAFFERY. In answering the question of the Senator, on general principles I will say that the Constitution, giving the treaty-making power to the President and the Senate, does not say what the Executive and the Senate can do under that power. It does not say, for instance, that we can enter into treaties of amity and commercial intercourse; but that power carries with it everything, every concomitant, every result, every operation which can be performed by the treaty-making power; and I say that among nations the most usual application of the treaty-making power is to acquire territory. Therefore, when that power was given over by the Constitution to the President and the Senate, it necessarily followed that the President and the Senate could negotiate treaties acquiring territory.

Mr. TELLER. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Louisiana, who is a Democrat, to Mr. Jefferson's statement. I want to assert that there is no reason in the world to say that the power is conferred by any constitutional provision whatever to acquire foreign territory by a treaty, and if there was to be any interpretation of it, it must be taken to mean treaties of a commercial character and not of acquisition.

Mr. Jefferson, when he took in the territory of Louisiana, expressly declared that he had taken it in violation of the Constitution; and in the letter which he wrote to Mr. Nicholas on September 7, 1803, he said, when that question came to be discussed in the House of Representatives with reference to providing a constitutional amendment, the less said about the matter the better it would be. He said in another letter that the whole subject ought to be considered, if possible, in silence, because, he asserted, there was no power given in the Constitution to take foreign territory by a treaty. He asserted, of course, that there was no power to take it at all; and that is true; for when you go to the Constitution, there is not any such power. It must either be taken on the general ground of sovereignty or it can not be taken at all. If it can not be taken at all under constitutional authority, it may be a question how it shall be taken.

I want to read what Mr. Jefferson says about the treaty, because the Senator I am sure has not got from the Democratic idea that Jefferson is good authority.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. Jefferson corrected that later in life, and took the other view.

Mr. TELLER. When John Jay made a treaty with Great Britain, which brought about a great deal of antagonism, Jefferson was against it, and pretty much everybody was against it. The House of Representatives asserted the right to nullify it, and they came very near nullifying it, but finally it was accepted. This was on March 21, 1790. Mr. Jefferson said:

The British treaty has been formally, at length, laid before Congress. All America is a-tiptoe to see what the House of Representatives will decide on it. We conceive the constitutional doctrine to be that though the President and Senate have the general power of making treaties—yet wherever they include in a treaty matters confided by the Constitution to the three branches of Legislature, an act of legislation will be requisite to confirm these articles, and that the House of Representatives, as one branch of the Legislature, are perfectly free to pass the act or refuse it, governing themselves by their own judgment whether it is for the good of the constituents to let the treaty go into effect or not. On the precedent now to be set will depend the future construction of our Constitution, and whether the powers of legislation shall be transferred from the President, Senate, and House of Representatives to the President and Senate, and Flamingo or any other Indian, Algerine, or other chief. It is fortunate that the first decision is to be in a case so palpably atrocious as to have been predetermined by all America.

I want to call attention to this, because I think it is good law—

Mr. President, as I said, the House of Representatives declined at that time to accept and to pass the legislation which was necessary to carry out the treaty, but subsequently they did pass it; and so the treaty went into effect. What I have been particularly anxious that the Senator should illustrate is, how it is that the power that can not admit a State is the only power that can create a relation between our Government and a foreign state so that it may become a State? If the Senator can solve that problem, I shall be, as a lawyer, in better shape than I have been in trying to follow his argument.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, I am perfectly aware that when Mr. Jefferson purchased the province or territory of Louisiana he doubted his constitutional power to do so by treaty.

Mr. TELLER. I think the Senator ought to say that he declared most emphatically that he did not have the power.

Mr. CAFFERY. Very well.

Mr. TELLER. Subsequently he changed his views upon the subject and admitted that it was all right.

Mr. FAULKNER. And that it was constitutional.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. Jefferson, at that period, as the Senator from Colorado says, denied any constitutional power—I will go to the length that he states that Mr. Jefferson did—on the part of the Executive and the Senate to acquire the Louisiana territory by purchase. He afterwards changed his opinion upon that point, and came to the conclusion that the purchase of Louisiana under a treaty between the United States and France was constitutional and valid.

Mr. TELLER. It took him about twenty years to come to that conclusion.

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir. Mr. Jefferson, however, was one of the people who, if it took him half his life to see an error, when he did see it admitted it; and he was in error in this particular, because, it occurs to my mind, that a reflection of any studious mind on what a treaty is designed to do, or what are the workings and operations of a treaty, would convince not only Mr. Jefferson, but anybody else, that every power or every act that could be exercised or performed under a treaty, and which was usually performed in that way—was rightfully and constitutionally exercised by the President and the Senate, and could not be exercised or performed by any other branch of the Government.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator can not find from anything in Jefferson's writings that he ever based his opinion upon that ground, or took the position the Senator takes. Mr. Jefferson simply acquiesced in the doctrine that was promulgated and discussed in 1811 with the greatest particularity in both the House of Representatives and the Senate, that it was a sovereign power and that it could be exerted without constitutional provision; and that is the ground upon which it has been put ever since, I think, by lawyers.

Mr. CAFFERY. Well, Mr. President, if precedent counts for anything, the power of the President and the Senate to acquire territory by treaty is settled. We have acquired Louisiana by treaty, and we have acquired Alaska.

Mr. TELLER. I am not denying that. I am denying that this is an exclusive power. That is the point.

Mr. CAFFERY. Very well. That power has been used to acquire territory. There has not been any other way that we have acquired territory, except by war, than through the treaty-making power.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, yes, Mr. President, the Senator must not forget Texas, for while he may claim that the admission of Texas was unconstitutional, that was one of the precedents.

Mr. CAFFERY. We did not acquire territory when we admitted Texas into the Union. Texas came into the Union as a full panoplied State. It was not a Territory to be regulated and governed under the laws of the United States.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say to the Senator that I am not playing on words, and I am not talking about territory, but I am talking about jurisdiction.

Mr. CAFFERY. Very well.

Mr. TELLER. Territory that comes in under our jurisdiction.

Mr. CAFFERY. I make a great distinction between admitting States and admitting Territories, Mr. President. I do not charge that the Senator from Colorado is making a play upon words at all, but I make a very broad distinction between a Territory unincorporated into a State, and a State with all the powers of an independent sovereignty. Territory may be absolutely uninhabited. The territories which we have heretofore acquired were mostly populated by Indians and uncivilized people.

There is a very broad distinction between a Territory and a State. "Territory" signifies an expanse of country without any settled government. A "State" means a political entity charged with all the functions of government; and, as I said in my opening remarks, the fact that Texas was coterminous with the United States possessions, that it was settled by men of our own kind, a homogeneous race, who had copied exactly the models of our State institutions in forming their own State, largely tended, in my opinion, to obscure the unconstitutionality of the act of Congress admitting Texas into the Union. Besides that—there is no use for me to advert to that political history, for the Senator from Colorado understands it as well as I do—the admission of Texas was a partisan act. It was driven through the two Houses of Congress under the whip and spur of a political majority.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator means a partisan majority.

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, a partisan majority. The treaty for the annexation of Texas failed of ratification in the Senate, as the Senator well knows.

Mr. TELLER. There was no attempt to bring Texas in as a State by treaty, but as a Territory.

Mr. CAFFERY. That is what I say—the annexation of Texas as a Territory. I did not say as a State, of course. That was the issue made. But, being defeated in that mode of admission or incorporation into the United States, then the prevailing political majority at that period forced through the joint resolution admitting Texas as a State, precisely, in my opinion, as the partisan majority is now forcing through the admission of Hawaii, under a joint resolution, without regard to treaty.

We are undertaking to perform by legislative act that which, in my opinion, can only be performed by treaty, agreement, contract. As I have said before, my mind can not apprehend the proposition that when the admission of any foreign territory requires the consensus of two independent parties—requires, in other words, a contract—you can intervene by legislative act—a forcible act—an act which is entirely outside of any contract—and force the admission of any territory into the Union, disregarding the fact that the admission of that territory requires the consensus of two independent minds, of two independent political entities.

Mr. President, the disposition in former times on the part of the United States to annex the Hawaiian Islands has been in every phase paraded before the Senate as a reason why at this particular moment we ought to admit that territory. My distinguished friend the Senator from Colorado has alluded on a number of occasions to Mr. Marcy's consent to the annexation of Hawaii, citing it as good Democratic doctrine, citing it as the doctrine of a progressive and of an advanced character, abreast of the times, as it were, and that the doctrine which Mr. Marcy announced in regard to Hawaii was the correct Democratic doctrine. What did Mr. Marcy say or do in that connection? I will read from Appendix 2, Foreign Relations of the United States, 1894, page 133.

Mr. TELLER. What is the date of the letter?

Mr. CAFFERY. January 31, 1855. It is a letter directed to Mr. Gregg.

Mr. Marcy to Mr. Gregg.

No. 12.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 31, 1855.

SIR: The policy of the United States in relation to the future of the Sandwich Islands is presented in the instructions heretofore given to you. That policy is not to accelerate or urge on any important change in the government of that country, but if it has or should become so far enfeebled that it can not be continued, and the sovereignty of the islands must be transferred to another power, then a state of things will exist in which it will be proper for the United States to have a regard to the future condition of that country.

If the Hawaiian Government and people become convinced of the necessity of such a change, it is probable that they will, if left to their free choice, look to the United States as the country to which they would wish to be united. To a proper arrangement of this kind the Government certainly has no objection.

My dispatch of the 4th of April last has reference to such a contingency which it was then supposed was about to happen. In case a transfer of the islands was proffered to the United States, you were directed to enter into negotiations as to the terms of it and conclude a treaty on that subject. The outlines of such a treaty were contained in that dispatch.

You have apprised the Department that as soon as negotiations were opened you perceived that stipulations different from those indicated in your instructions were insisted on, and you very properly notified the Hawaiian authorities that you could only entertain them as matters to be referred to your Government for its approval or rejection.

The draft of a treaty you have forwarded to the Department has been considered by the President, and he directs me to say that he can not approve of some of the articles. If ratified in its present shape at Honolulu and sent hither, he would not probably submit it to the Senate. There are in his mind strong objections to the immediate incorporation of the islands in their present condition into the Union as an independent State. It was expected that the Hawaiian Government would be willing to offer the islands to the United States as a Territory, and to leave the question in relation to their becoming a State to the determination of this Government, unembarrassed by stipulations on that point. The interests of both parties would seem to indicate this as the wisest course. A treaty which would embarrass the United States in their action on this question would therefore be objectionable.

There are other objections to the draft which you have sent to the Department, though less formidable than that which the second article presents. The amount to be paid as annuities, etc., according to the draft, is much larger than was contemplated.

I think it would be proper that you should inform the Hawaiian Government that the United States would not be likely to approve of a treaty differing in important particulars from the terms contained in the dispatch of the 4th of April.

This Government will receive the transfer of the sovereignty of the Sandwich Islands with all proper provisions relative to the existing rights and interests of the people thereof, such as are usual and appropriate to territorial sovereignty. It will be the object of the United States, if clothed with the sovereignty of that country, to promote its growth and prosperity. This consideration alone ought to be a sufficient assurance to the people that their rights and interests will be duly respected and cherished by this Government.

In presenting objections to the draft of the treaty which you have sent to this Department, the President desires me to assure you that he takes no exception whatever to your course in this difficult and embarrassing negotiation, but, on the contrary, it is highly approved. Your efforts have been properly directed, and your ability is appreciated and commended. It gives me pleasure to concur in and communicate the President's approbation of your conduct.

I am, etc.,

W. L. MARCY.

This distinguished Secretary stated that these islands might be a desirable possession to the United States in a certain contingency; and what was that? In order to prevent other powers from taking them. That was his first statement. His second statement is that the sovereignty of the islands, if transferred to the United States at all, must be transferred with the consent of the people of Hawaii. His third proposition is that the Government could not entertain, even in the contingency mentioned, the proposition to incorporate Hawaii as a State, but in the event that there was any danger of a foreign power taking the Hawaiian Islands, the United States Government would consent to accept them in a Territorial condition.

The contingency of a foreign power, in the language of to-day, grabbing these islands was as remote then as it is now, and more remote. Mr. Webster in 1843 laid down the doctrine of the United States in regard to these islands. He distinctly and emphatically said that the United States Government would extend to the Hawaiian Islands the Monroe doctrine; that no foreign power would be permitted to take the sovereignty of those islands or to control their destiny.

Mr. President, the idea that the nations of the world are hankering after the Hawaiian Islands, in my opinion, is a mere pretext to urge their annexation to the United States. The power of the United States is perfectly competent to keep and to hold those little islands as an independent sovereignty. That was the doctrine of Mr. Webster. That was the doctrine of Mr. Blaine. That has been the doctrine of the United States ever since 1823, when we negotiated the first commercial treaty with them. It is easier, it is better, it is safer to hold those islands under the protecting wing of the Monroe doctrine than to incorporate them as territory into the United States.

Mr. Marcy halted at the idea of these islands becoming a State. He declared that it was repugnant to the principles of this country, or intimated such, at least, that these islands could be made a sovereign State; and there is a respect that must make us all pause. How can these islands be perpetually held as a territory? Sir, when a distinguished member of the House was asked the question, "What are you going to do with those possessions when you have them?" he answered, "I scorn to say what we are going to do with them."

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator has made another proposition, that we establish a protectorate, if necessary, over those islands. Will he point to any provision in the Constitution which authorizes us to assume such an attitude toward any nation?

Mr. CAFFERY. I beg the Senator's pardon. I have made no proposition that we should establish a protectorate.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator said it would be better.

Mr. CAFFERY. I say it is better for us to maintain the Monroe doctrine as applicable to the Sandwich Islands than either to annex them as a Territory or as a State. I have no reference whatever to a protectorate. I do not believe that a protectorate is necessary. I believe that the Monroe doctrine is shelter enough for these little islands to hover under, protected by the enormous strength and resources of the United States. They are safe in midocean from the foreigner. No nation dare grab them, especially after the manifestation of our great military power which we are now putting forth.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me that the Senator is getting away from the legal phase to which I was trying to attract his attention. He is now discussing the policy. I wish to ask the Senator another question. Where does he find authority under the Constitution for the exercise of the Monroe doctrine? What particular provision of the Constitution authorizes it? I am not denying the doctrine. I am a great believer in the Monroe doctrine. I can find plenty of authority, but where does the Senator find it?

Mr. CAFFERY. There are certain rights beyond constitutions. There are certain acts that men can do without being justified in their performance under the municipal law. The Monroe doctrine is founded upon the principle of self-defense. It is founded upon that principle which allows a man, without municipal law or even in a savage state, to protect his person and property against an aggressor; and when the Holy Alliance attempted to interfere in the affairs of the colonies in America that had thrown off their allegiance to Spain and attempted to reestablish a dethroned monarchy right under our doors, then the Monroe doctrine came into existence. It is a doctrine outside of constitutions. It needs no constitution. It existed before constitutions, and it will survive all constitutions.

Mr. TELLER. I agree to that.

Mr. CAFFERY. But, sir, that has nothing to do with the question of incorporating territory. It is not necessary for our self-defense to incorporate these islands. It is necessary for our self-defense to have no foreign power in possession of them, and that fiat of ours is law, because we are able to enforce it. I do not believe there is that rash nation in the world to-day which will attempt, in the face of the declaration made in 1843 that these islands were embraced within the Monroe doctrine, to attempt any aggression upon them in any way, shape, or style.

Sir, we have applied the Monroe doctrine to Cuba. We lately applied it to Venezuela. I would to God that we could stop this aggressive spirit at the terminus of the Monroe doctrine. That doctrine is one of inalienable right to every nationality, to every government. We have a perfect right to insist that nothing shall be done on this hemisphere of a character to threaten the safety or integrity of the United States.

Now, sir, I say that Mr. Marcy stopped at the threshold of this important step of the admission of Hawaii into statehood, and if he had reflected more upon the proposition he would not even have sanctioned the idea of annexation as a Territory. It is utterly impossible, under our republican institutions, to keep provinces or colonies or dependencies under a territorial form of government. In due time, in proper season, the territory must be admitted into statehood or the very genius and spirit of our institutions are violated.

Is it, sir, to be contemplated that we can annex the islands of the sea, foreign possessions here, there, and everywhere over the globe, and hold them as the Romans held their provinces, under proconsuls, hold them under viceroys and captains-general, and establish over them a government of absolute despotic power? I do not believe it, and I do not believe that any territory ought ever to be thought of being annexed to the United States unless that territory is to be incorporated into the United States at the proper time as a State. The Constitution says that the North-western Territory may be made into States by Congress under certain conditions. That power must be exercised in like manner as respects whatever other territory may be acquired.

Mr. President, the land hunger of to-day does not seem to halt at any obstacle. We started out upon a chivalric war of humanity, and it turns out that the chivalric war has for its objective point the absorption of all foreign territory over which our flag is planted. I believe I read in the papers, when General Merritt sailed for the Philippines, a declaration from him substantially to that effect. It is coming from every quarter of the Union that wherever the flag is raised never will it be lowered, and notwithstanding the declaration which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] himself placed upon the Cuban resolutions, that this war was waged for neither conquest nor for aggression nor to absorb territory—that is about the substance of the declaration—yet we find expressions of public opinion from every quarter that the result of the war will necessarily be the acquisition of Cuba.

Mr. President, I for one enter my solemn protest against this spirit of absorption. I do not believe that it consists with the safety of our institutions. I believe that the cultivation of that spirit will drag the Republic down, just as it has dragged down every former republic of the world. Here we are, a compact, isolated country. There never was before, in all the history of the world, a territory so rich, so extensive, so full of resources, and inhabited by so thrifty, energetic, brave, and warlike a people. We are safe within the two oceans and the lakes on the north and the Gulf on the south. No foreign foe would ever have the temerity to invade our borders; and if, sir, we go upon wars of conquest and aggression, they must be made beyond our borders and must be provoked by us. I see nothing but danger in this attempt to introduce Hawaii as a Territory into the United States under the vicious form of a joint resolution.

Is not this but the opening of a grand avenue of conquest and of power? The Philippines next. Part of Asia next. Where will be the limits? Who can set bounds to the vaulting ambition of some: to our wonderful resources; to the military spirit of our people? Sir, it is not the time to cultivate this spirit. It is time to check it, to curb it, to hold it within the bounds of reason, and to hold safe to the republican institutions of ours which will be strained in this crusade of conquest and war. This Hawaiian scheme is but the entering wedge that cleaves a way open for empire. That is the way I look at it. I want none of it.

Mr. President, to show the extent to which this military spirit is driving us I will read an extract from an article dated London, June 22, 1898, printed in the Washington Post of Thursday, June 23, 1898. It appears to be a statement of Dr. Depew, a very distinguished citizen of our country, a man whose public utterances generally carry weight, as they are certainly entitled to, a man universally known as a conservative citizen and an honorable, wise gentleman.

Asked if his opinion on imperial policy had changed, Dr. Depew replied:

"There are difficulties in my position which did not exist when I took it up. New conditions are arising all the while with the progression of the war which make it difficult to keep out or get out of this colonizing business. We must take into view the temper of our people, who would certainly never give any colonies back to Spain. Transferring them or any of them to a European power would lead to a European war in sixty days. It looks as though we would have to paint our white elephant brown and teach him to work."

This distinguished gentleman says that we can not give back to Spain any of the colonies which we may take from her; we can not transfer them to any European power, for that would give cause for war in less than sixty days. He does not say it, but that is to be implied, that we can not let the Philippines, for instance, or even Cuba, remain under the government of the heterogeneous mass of blacks and half whites living in those countries, who he knows are incapable of self-government. The consequence of it is, therefore, that we must keep them. We must paint, in his language, the white elephant brown. That is the only alternative. I read again from a distinguished gentleman, Mr. Grosvenor, in his speech at the Republican convention at Cleveland, Ohio, June 2, 1898, said:

Mr. TELLER. Would it interrupt the Senator if I should ask him whether he agrees with Depew or not?

Mr. CAFFERY. I do not.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator favor turning the islands back to Spain after the war is over?

Mr. CAFFERY. That question requires an answer with a good many qualifications. I will make it before I get through. This is what Mr. Grosvenor said:

I make no prognostication except this: I doubt very much whether you and I will live to see the day when, by order of a Republican Administration, and surely not by the order of McKinley's Administration, the starry banner of your country's glory shall be pulled down from any flagstaff where conquest of arms has placed it.

Those two utterances are significant of the prevailing temper of the time. Both these gentlemen, high in distinction, widely known, both statesmen, concur in the view that we must keep whatever territory we acquire by conquest over which the starry banner of the United States floats or has been erected. That, to me, is a startling proposition.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] asked me whether I would be in favor of giving these colonies back to Spain. That would depend on certain conditions. If, for instance, the Philippine Islands, after we took them—we have not got them yet—should become pacified, and if a settled order of things were to take place in those islands, and there were in those islands an intelligent electorate—I do not know whether there is or not; I hear that most of them are savages; I hear so many things that I hardly know what to believe about those islands—if an intelligent electorate in those islands after their sentiments were properly and correctly expressed, should vote that they desired to return to the allegiance of Spain or to be kept under her allegiance, I should say, for my part, let them go there. That is outside of any question of indemnity that we might exact from Spain for expenses of the war.

Mr. President, are we the custodians of the nations of the earth? I put this case to the Senator from Colorado. Suppose, in due course of time, we rout the Spanish army in Cuba, we take possession of that island, we raise the flag of the United States over it and make that flag supreme, we pacify the island, we restore peace, we cause the people to go into all the peaceful avocations that the condition of affairs there permits, we summon them together, we say to them, "We have not fought a war of conquest, we have fought a war of humanity; the war is ended, peace smiles over your island, the hungry are fed, the naked are clothed, the whole island is in a peaceful, quiet, contented condition."

Now, we say to them, "Choose your own destiny. Do you want a republic? If so, get together your intelligent men and make a government." They say, "We do not want a republic; we want to live under the auspices of Spain." It is ascertained that that is the true voice of the people of Cuba. I want to know whether, in that condition of affairs, the Senator from Colorado would say that we ought to permit them to go back to Spain?

Mr. TELLER. Under what condition?

Mr. CAFFERY. Under the condition that, after being pacified, after peace was restored, after an election held, after the voice of the people of Cuba was expressed unmistakably so that nobody could doubt it, that voice was that they wanted to return to Spain, I ask the Senator from Colorado whether he would sanction it?

Mr. TELLER. The Senator supposes a condition that he knows could never happen. In the nature of things it is utterly impossible that such a thing could ever occur. I say that, so far as I am concerned, I would be opposed to turning them over to the tender mercies of Spain under any circumstances whatever. If we go to war for the purpose of getting Spain out of Cuba, I think it would be our duty to keep her out.

Mr. CAFFERY. Then I understand the position of the Senator from Colorado to be that we must force humanity down the Cubans; that we must compel them—

Mr. TELLER. I object to that. I object to the stating an impossible case and then saying that that is my case. He knows very well there is not one chance out of a million that the people of Cuba would want to return under the control of Spain. It seems to me to be trifling with this question to make such a suggestion here, and because I say it is impossible, then I would not turn them back. I would not turn them back because the people would evidently be insane and wild to think of doing such a thing.

Mr. CAFFERY. I beg to differ from the Senator from Colorado in the statement that I am trifling with the situation. I have seen evidences to convince me that the Spanish blood is a little thicker than water. It would not at all astonish me if the very insurgents themselves should declare that they prefer Spanish rule modified to the autonomous rule of Canada to being incorporated into the United States, nor would it astonish me in the least if after the island was perfectly pacified and they had a choice of government they would choose such a government as that of Canada under the shadowy sovereignty of Spain. That would not astonish me. I beg the Senator from Colorado to know that I do not consider that trifling with the situation at all. I never trifle with a situation. I am not given to joking upon serious matters.

Mr. TELLER. I do not want the Senator to feel that I meant to be offensive.

Mr. CAFFERY. Not at all.

Mr. TELLER. It seemed to me, at least, that he was presenting an impossible case; it may not be so to him.

Mr. CAFFERY. So many strange things have happened in this Cuban war that I am not astonished at any kind of a development. I am not astonished, Mr. President, that the Cubans should turn back to Spain when I see the American nation turning back from its doctrine of humanity and going into a doctrine of aggression and the absorption of foreign territory.

Mr. President, I was discussing the questions arising from this letter of Mr. Marcy to Mr. Gregg as presenting some very serious considerations for the Congress of the United States. Mr. Marcy halted at the idea of statehood in those islands. What made him halt? It must have dawned on his mind that those dusky Polynesian Indians were unfit for self-government. When his mind came to that conclusion it was very easy for him to go a step further and say that they were unfit to be incorporated into the United States, even under a territorial form of government.

That is the point, Mr. President, for us to consider very narrowly, very closely, in regard to the incorporation of those islands into our territory. It is not only that we have the native Hawaiian to deal with now, but we have the Japanese, we have the Chinese, we have the Portuguese from the Azore Islands plentifully interlarded and sandwiched with native Hawaiian lepers. We find aboriginal races, incapable of self-government, to deal with.

Mr. President, we have problems enough of that kind at home to solve. There is not a Southern man in the Senate or elsewhere who does not know the difficulties of solving the race problem. Gentlemen who say that that problem is solved are mistaken in their statement. The black element in the South has been a disturbing element there ever since the war. It will remain a disturbing element there for a considerable period of time, until such time as the blacks are absorbed in the mass of the population of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, what kind of a government are we going to set up in Hawaii when we get it? We will have a quasi-military government. The man who is sent as governor of Hawaii must have a considerable amount of authority. It is necessary to govern that country largely by force. It is so governed now. The constitution of Hawaii is not the constitution of a republic. The oligarchy that succeeded in that country to power have established themselves so firmly that they can never be ousted from power by peaceful methods. We find a constitution that gives the power of appropriating money to an advisory and executive council. We find laws that prevent seditious or indecent publications. We find laws that provide for a system of slavery worse in my opinion than the system of slavery that prevailed in the South.

The contract laborers are all held firmly in the grasp of the criminal law. If a labor contract is violated the violator is punished, he is jailed; he is confined until he obeys the mandate of the sugar planter. The oligarchy that succeeded to power in 1893 perpetuated themselves from 1893 until 1900, and there is no possibility under the constitution of Hawaii of their ever being ousted peacefully. The native population is practically disfranchised. They have no voice; the elective franchise is virtually taken away from them by the qualifications imposed upon the electors and even upon the members of the legislature.

It requires $3,000 of money or a certain amount of real estate for a man to sit in the Senate. It requires a considerable qualification to sit in the lower house. It requires a large qualification for a man to vote for senators. So the constitution of Hawaii is one of the devices of the white man to hold in subjection the black man. That is what it is.

By admitting it as a Territory and governing it according to its requirements we inaugurate in the United States a Persian satrapy.

Then how long, Mr. President, are we to keep those islands in this condition? I am not at all astonished at the reply of Mr. GROSVENOR when he was asked what was going to be done with those countries. He scorned to answer. He simply scorned the idea of telling us how to govern it, as if all we had to do was to take a country and it would govern itself. But that is the material consideration in this matter. What are you going to do with Hawaii when we get her? How are you going to govern her, and how long?

We have the right, I see, under the pending joint resolution, to make special laws in regard to labor. What does that mean, Mr. President? It appears from the testimony and facts that we have before us that the Hawaiian Islands can not be worked without the labor of the black race. The white man can not work there. There is not a solitary white laborer, according to the statistics introduced by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW], in the sugar plantations and the rice plantations of Hawaii.

Mr. SPOONER. And the coffee plantations.

Mr. CAFFERY. There may be some little coffee plantations, but that does not appear from the statistics. Most of the culture there is sugar. There is not a single white farm laborer in the sugar plantations, and there can not be according to the testimony of Mr. Claus Spreckels. It is a subtropical country, and although the climate is an average of 75 degrees, it hardly ever gets down to 60 degrees; it hardly ever goes much above 80 degrees. It is that sort of oppressive climate and temperature that robs a white man of his energy, that robs him of his power of endurance, that robs him of his power to till the soil. The fact is, that white laborers are not there.

Now, here is what the President of the United States says upon that point:

What the conditions of such a union shall be, the political relation thereof to the United States, the character of the local administration, the quality and degree of the elective franchise of the inhabitants, the extension of the Federal laws to the territory, or the enactment of special laws to fit the peculiar condition thereof, the regulation, if need be, of the labor system therein, are all matters which the treaty has wisely relegated to Congress.

I have no doubt that this part of the message of the President of the United States was written in view of the fact that representations had been made to him that special laws were necessary in order to admit Chinese and Japanese that were excluded under the general operation of the laws of the United States. If it has not that meaning I fail to see what meaning it has. There must be special laws in regard to labor to fit the conditions existing in those islands. The conditions are that those sugar plantations can not be cultivated without the labor of the Chinese or the Japanese or people accustomed to the rays of a subtropical sun.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAFFERY. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. What does the Senator understand to be the effect of annexation upon existing contracts for labor, long-time contracts, which of course affect private rights?

Mr. CAFFERY. Of course all the contracts between the planters of Hawaii and their employees, being of a private character, must be maintained by the Government of the United States. They can not be abrogated, because that would be violating upon the part of the Government what it prohibits States from doing. It would be impairing the obligation of contracts.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course that limitation does not apply to the Federal Government.

Mr. CAFFERY. No.

Mr. SPOONER. The limitation on the power of the States does not apply to the Federal Government, but I speak of it with reference to the effect of annexation, whether Hawaii does not come in cum onere, so far as contracts and rights are concerned?

Mr. CAFFERY. Of course all valid legal contracts subsisting at the time of the incorporation of Hawaii into the United States must be maintained.

Mr. SPOONER. Valid according to the law of the place.

Mr. CAFFERY. Exactly.

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana if he wishes to be understood as saying that labor contracts, for instance, which are in contravention of our laws regarding labor contracts, would be maintained after the annexation of the islands?

Mr. SPOONER. That is the question I put.

Mr. CAFFERY. I think the labor contracts must be carried out.

Mr. MALLORY. That is the Senator's opinion?

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir; contracts made prior to the incorporation of Hawaii into the United States, contracts valid under the laws of Hawaii, I think must be carried out.

Mr. MALLORY. Notwithstanding they are in violation of the laws of the United States?

Mr. CAFFERY. I think so.

Mr. BATE. We take the islands cum onere.

Mr. CAFFERY. We take them cum onere. We might as well say that as some of our laws in regard to the holding of real property differ from the laws of Hawaii and denounce the holding of property under certain titles, they should apply to property held in Hawaii under titles contrary to our laws. I believe those labor contracts would be maintained. However, Mr. President, I have never given that question any attention. It is my impression that we take those islands, with their people and their contracts, just as they are. We have no more right to abrogate their contracts than we have to deport the Chinese or the Japanese who may be there, and we can not do that except as a matter of force. We can not do it legally.

Mr. PASCO. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana if he does not think that the Constitution of the United States, after all, would be the organic law and would control contracts of that character in Hawaii just the same as in other parts of the Union in case the Hawaiian Islands should become a part of the United States territory?

Mr. CAFFERY. The Constitution of the United States would extend over Hawaii, but all the statutory enactments of Congress would not extend over Hawaii.

Mr. PASCO. Would contracts in violation of the principles of our Constitution still stand if the Hawaiian Islands should change their nationality? That, it seems to me, is the point to which investigation should tend. Would not that still be the supreme law in spite of any contracts previously made?

Mr. CAFFERY. That is a question of great difficulty and embarrassment. I think that the labor contracts would endure. It is not a question whether they were made in violation of our statutes, but the question is whether, being made outside of the United States, under another jurisdiction, and valid where made, the incorporation of Hawaii would invalidate them because they might be repugnant to our statutes. That is a very serious question, and one upon which, while I have some doubt, I rather think the contracts would be maintained.

Mr. MALLORY. If, by treaty, we stipulated as to those contracts, we undoubtedly could wipe them out?

Mr. CAFFERY. Perhaps so.

Mr. SPOONER. We can not hear what the Senator says.

Mr. MALLORY. I say there is no question that by treaty we could wipe out those contracts if we chose to do so. That is my impression.

Mr. SPOONER. A treaty with whom?

Mr. MALLORY. A treaty with Hawaii. If we choose to incorporate that in the treaty we could do it.

Mr. CAFFERY. Not without the consent of the contractors. A treaty could not violate individual contracts.

Mr. MALLORY. I think it could.

Mr. SPOONER. How far does the power go, in the Senator's opinion, to interfere with private rights by treaty? How far does the right go by treaty to interfere with contracts under which rights have become vested which were lawfully entered into?

Mr. MALLORY. I think it goes to the extent that, if Hawaii is willing to do so, there is nothing to prohibit her from doing it and incorporating it into the treaty; and when the treaty is established, the treaty becomes the paramount law so far as we are concerned.

Mr. SPOONER. What about title to property? Suppose a citizen of the Hawaiian Republic has entered into a contract for property, does the Senator understand that a treaty entered into between this country or any other country and Hawaii could interfere with that property right?

Mr. MALLORY. I am inclined to think it could if that was a part of the treaty.

Mr. SPOONER. I am only asking to get at the Senator's opinion as to the power.

Mr. MALLORY. I think we have that power.

Mr. SPOONER. Then where is the limit of the power?

Mr. MALLORY. The only limit is in the sense of justice and propriety on the part of the Senate of the United States and the President of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator think that an absolute property right could be divested by treaty?

Mr. MALLORY. I think so. If the government with whom we treat is willing to do so, I do not know anything in our Constitution which prohibits it.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator mean to be understood, if a person has acquired, paid for, and owns under the laws of Hawaii a plantation, that by any contract or treaty between the United States and the Hawaiian Government that title could be divested? Does the Senator go that far?

Mr. MALLORY. I do not mean to say that I should advocate any such thing, but I am talking about the power. I do not think there is any limit on our power to do it if the other party to the compact or treaty acquiesces in it.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course our power would not be extraterritorial.

Mr. MALLORY. We are simply taking from Hawaii certain territory and treating for certain rights which she chooses to give us.

Mr. SPOONER. I was speaking of the right.

Mr. MALLORY. There may be a law in Hawaii to prevent it; the Hawaiian constitution might prevent it; but we are not observing the Hawaiian constitution.

Mr. SPOONER. But I am speaking about rights which are vested under the constitution and laws of Hawaii. What right would the Senator think would survive that treaty made by the Hawaiian Republic with this or any other Government? Does the Senator think, for instance, that the marriage relation as it exists in Hawaii could be disrupted by a treaty made by the United States and the Republic of Hawaii?

Mr. MALLORY. I have said that I do not see any limitation on our power to make a treaty and to include in that treaty any stipulation or provision that we desire. It is with Hawaii to say whether she would acquiesce in a violation of her constitution. Those people with whom we treat are not members of the United States Government; they are not citizens of the United States until after the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. SPOONER. I admit that, of course.

Mr. MALLORY. As soon as the treaty is ratified and takes effect it becomes the paramount law of the land.

Mr. SPOONER. I assume that the Hawaiian Government would be at liberty to change by its legislation, or it might change perhaps by treaty; but I am not referring to that. The class of cases I am referring to are valid rights under the existing laws of Hawaii.

Mr. MALLORY. It is an abstract question. I do not know of any power in our Constitution to prevent us from entering into any such treaty if we choose to do so. I think the question of whether it is wise or moral or proper is a question to be determined by the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. I am speaking about the legal effect of it.

Mr. MALLORY. The legal effect would be, I think, that as treaties are paramount, and as they are the supreme law of the land, together with the Constitution and laws, the effect would be that it could not be reached, it could not be attacked in any way that I know of.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. PETTUS. I desire to ask the Senator from Louisiana a question. If these contracts for labor are valid as made under the laws of the country, and they are afterwards, by the sovereign power over that country, declared to be invalid, does not the Senator know that they thereby become null and void?

Mr. SPOONER. Of course, if declared invalid by the courts of that country.

Mr. CAFFERY. If the courts declared them to be invalid, the parties litigant would have to obey the judgment of the court. So it would be a moot question. It would not make any difference whether valid or invalid, the court having determined them so to be, a superior power would compel obedience to its mandate. The question that was being discussed was whether or not we had a legal or other right to pronounce contracts invalid which at the time of the incorporation of the territory of Hawaii were valid, not whether after a court had pronounced them to be invalid the question could be again raised.

Mr. PETTUS. My question related to the enactment of a law by the sovereign power over the country declaring the contracts to be illegal. Would they not thereby become void?

Mr. CAFFERY. That would be a question for the courts to determine. That is all. If the power of the sovereign to declare these contracts invalid was questioned and brought before a court, the result of the trial before the court would fix the validity or invalidity of the law, but it would not deprive the citizen of a right to go before the courts and litigate the question.

Mr. PETTUS. I desired an answer from the Senator from Louisiana, he being the judge. I ask whether, these labor contracts having been declared void by the sovereign power over that territory, he as a judge would enforce one of them?

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, that is a question that reaches very far down into the merits of this controversy raised by these questions. I have stated that my view at first blush was that all contracts valid under the laws of Hawaii of a private character were to be maintained as valid under the incorporation of Hawaii into the United States. It may be that, upon further reflection, that opinion would give way either to authority or to precedent, but that is the present conviction in my mind.

Even if I were a judge I would have to decide that in regard to contracts valid under the laws of Hawaii, contracts that were not repugnant to good morals, were to be maintained as valid, notwithstanding the United States laws were of a different character. Of course there are some classes of cases where the contracts might be of a character to invade the domain of good morals, or might be repugnant to some provision of the Constitution of the United States. In that category of cases I rather think that the judges of the United States courts would set aside the contracts. That is a question that is very remotely connected with the question that I am now discussing.

I was attempting to discuss the question of the effect of the population in Hawaii on any government that the United States might install there. I believe that that population will have a reflex action upon all Americans who either govern the island or who live there. I believe that it is impossible for two opposite and opposed races to live together, a superior and an inferior race to live together under the same government, without the superior and paramount race dominating the inferior or subordinate race. I believe that that state of affairs works very deleteriously to American republican institutions.

I believe that the largest portion of the troubles which the Southern States have undergone since the war is due to the presence of an inferior race mixed up with the superior and dominating race. I believe that the presence of the negroes in the South has occasioned untold loss to that section, if it has not engendered the deenergizing in some particulars of our Southern people. I believe that we have enough of the black and colored races in the United States now. I believe if by prudence and wisdom and temperance and justice we can solve the problem which is presented for solution to the people living in my section, we shall indeed be a fortunate people.

I believe it will be dangerous in the extreme to incorporate into our body politic any more of the elements of the Mongolian or the Hamitic races. I believe that their presence in the South has been a strain upon our institutions, which, but for their elasticity and strength and power and the sobriety and judgment of the people, might have occasioned some very serious inroads in our republican institutions.

I therefore deprecate, Mr. President, the incorporation of these Asiatics, Japanese, and Kanakas into the body politic of the United States. It is impossible to hold them absolutely in tutelage; it is impossible to hold them forever under the contract-labor system, which now prevails in Hawaii, which is but little better than slavery. Sooner or later, if we annex that territory, these people must have a qualified or a full suffrage given to them. Sooner or later that territory must become a State, or the United States will inaugurate a system of provincial government of foreign territory, which I believe to be utterly foreign both to the views of the original framers of the Constitution and to the security and perpetuity of our institutions themselves.

Mr. President, what wise or good patriotic citizen of the South does not deplore that ever an African set his foot upon the soil of the United States as a slave? What man is there who does not know the evil and the calamities that have fallen principally upon the whites by reason of the presence there of the two races?

The history of our race, Mr. President, the branch of the Caucasian family from which we spring, shows that the Anglo-Saxon and the Anglo-American will dominate any inferior race.

We either have to dominate them or we have to leave the country to them, and by one process or another the character, of which it is not necessary for me to speak, the white man in the South has done what the white man of our kind and race has done everywhere he has planted his footsteps, he has maintained superiority and dominance of all black races with whom he has been thrown in contact. I do not want, nor does any other Southern man want or ought to want, any more of that unassimilable element that we find in the islands of Hawaii.

Last night, in a book which I happened to look over, I found a passage which I shall read. It is Problems of Greater Britain, by Mr. Dilke. He is writing about the crown colonies of Great Britain, and on page 223 of his book he says:

On the whole it will be seen that while in the French colonies property as well as power is passing into the hands of the "colored" population and of the blacks, in their English neighbors this is the case only in a less degree, while the importation of Indian labor has enabled the old system of large properties to be kept up in many of our Crown colonies. It has been shown also by our inquiries that it is a mistake to suppose that our tropical colonies are in a condition of decline. They hold a secondary place in our attention because of the immense development of Canadian and Australasian interests, but they are on the whole fairly prosperous and progressive.

There is indeed in our Crown colonies a remarkable expansion of trade and revenue, although the growth of population is more rapid still. The West Indies, which were once most important to our Empire, now figure for only 1 per cent in our trade, but they give us naval stations and they permit us to try experiments which are useful to the world in the production of the fruits of tropical labor. We have seen that the British West Indies, like Canada, are feeling to some extent the attraction of the enormous neighboring body of the United States, and there is now an American party in the West Indies. In my opinion, the islands will remain British and not become American, but will more and more be "black countries."

While the population of the French colonies, as well as the power of the French, are rapidly passing into the hands of the blacks, it is not so with regard to the English colonies; but it is true that the population in the British West Indies does not increase among the whites; it does among the blacks, and hence the conclusion of this author that these colonies, while they will not cease to be British and become American, they will become black countries.

Mr. President, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] presented some statistics in the Senate the other day while addressing it upon this question, showing that the white population in all these subtropical countries had not only not increased, but had diminished, and that the black or colored population had increased. Those statistics showed that the white men do not labor in the open air. In fact, I know from my own observation that a sun much hotter, with much fiercer rays than we have in my own section of the country, unfits a white man to labor in the open field; and I do not believe, Mr. President, that there is a solitary instance in all the history of our race where it can flourish under conditions that our yeomanry can not work in the open fields.

If you have a dominant ruling class of whites, they may endure living under the hot rays of the equatorial sun; but I do not believe that any country can prosper up to its full limit unless the race which governs that country has its yeomanry of its own kind and color tilling its soil and working in the open air. There is not an instance on record that I know of where the race to which we belong has ever thriven in such tropical countries. The sun seems to dry up the energy, the strength, the push, and the activity that characterizes our branch of the Caucasian family.

Mr. President, it occurs to me that when we are industriously excluding from our borders by immigration laws the undesirable class even of our own blood and color, it is inconsistent to introduce at one fell swoop about 40,000 people living in the Hawaiian Islands. If certain people of our own kind are undesirable, much more are these leprous Kanakas, these contract-labor coolies, these Japanese who come from the slums of the cities of Japan.

To incorporate that number of these Asiatics into our country is no light matter to me. That population is bound to have an injurious effect upon the white people among whom they live. It can not be avoided. The manner in which they must be ruled, the drastic authority which the white man is bound to exercise over them, is totally at war with our idea of that individual liberty, that individual independence, that manliness which ought to exist everywhere in the ranks of our people, the lowest as well as the highest.

These considerations appear to be of no moment, nor does the consideration as to the 13,000,000 inhabitants in the Philippines appear to be any obstacle to the aggressive spirit of empire. I have quoted from certain gentlemen that the flag must never be lowered, erected where it may be, in the Philippines, in the Madeira Islands, in the Ladrões, or in any other possession of the Spanish Crown, notwithstanding our institutions will be subjected to the strain of ruling these dusky tribes, these half-savage people, under an autocratic and despotic authority entirely repugnant to our ideas of civil government.

It will be a sorry day, in my opinion, when we go abroad and by conquest and war take outlying islands situated in the Tropics and incorporate them into our midst. It is bad enough to go outside of our own borders, to go outside of our own compact country, and incorporate people of our own kind, for we have enough to satisfy the greed of anybody for territory, it appears to me. Of the 3,000,000 square miles of land in the United States about one-half is arable. Of the 1,500,000 square miles of arable land there are not more than 300,000 square miles cultivated. Our 70,000,000 people can be very easily swelled to 300,000,000, and there will be plenty of standing room left in the United States. Why are we earth-hungry for these possessions?

Ah, Mr. President, they say it is the necessity of war. We have heard various pretenses heretofore for the annexation of these islands, and now military authority is quoted as to the necessity at the present time of incorporating these islands to keep off some imaginary foe, for we have no real one, at some distant, indefinite time in the future. To-day upon the deficiency bill was placed an amendment appropriating about $150,000 for the improvement of Pearl Harbor. I ask the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee whether it was not about $150,000 which is to be appropriated for that purpose?

General Schofield says that with the harbor fortified as we will fortify it it will be the key to the Pacific. We want no other part of the islands than the harbor for strategic purposes. We have the harbor. Why take all these seven little islands situated from 10 to 25 miles from each other, with their heterogeneous population, with the troubles and embarrassments that the government of those people will devolve upon the United States? If it is necessary from a military point of view—and that is doubted by a great many—to establish a coaling station at Pearl Harbor, fortify that coaling station with the necessary works; establish there, if you please, a garrison; but what more do they want? Do we have to take the seven islands in order to hold the key to the Pacific? Is not the island of Oahu enough—if we have to take one—in which Pearl Harbor is situated? Why do we want all of them?

Mr. President, we are not military experts; but when a matter is submitted to us of a military kind we must exercise the best judgment we have in the premises. It is a duty devolving upon us to look at the question from the standpoint of the intelligence that we have in regard to the matter. It never occurred to me that it was a wise thing, in common sense or military strategy, to go 2,100 miles from your own base to fortify an island as a defensive post. We then have the island and our own coast both to fortify and to defend, and each one of those islands that we take, each one of those outlying possessions in the sea that we have to defend, involves, in my judgment, just that much more military power and strength.

Upon that subject Mr. Bryce, a writer of great distinction, a man of great eminence, has written an article in the Forum of December, 1897, from which I will read a few passages. On page 386 he says:

The argument most frequently used in the United States to recommend the annexation of Cuba and Hawaii is that their annexation would strengthen the strategic position of America by giving her two points of naval vantage—one commanding the Caribbean Sea and the other the Eastern Pacific, thus protecting her southern and western coasts.

Now let it be noticed how exceptionally strong is the position which America already holds. Of the great powers of the world, she and Russia are the only ones that have no insular territories to defend. All the territory of the United States is territory on her own continent; and all of it except Alaska is continuous land territory. Accordingly America and Russia are the only countries no part of whose territory can be cut off from them by a naval enemy. They are also countries of such enormous size and such advantages for defense that no one thinks of invading their interior. Since Napoleon's failure in 1812 it is admitted that an attempt to penetrate the interior of Russia would fail; and an attempt to invade the United States would have even less chance of success.

Every other great European power has territories which lie at the mercy of a stronger hostile fleet. Britain has to defend not only Ireland but her vast colonial and Indian dominions. France has colonies which are practically hostages to England or to any other naval power that might be able to drive France off the seas. They are not very important hostages, but, so far as they go, hostages they are. Similarly, the even less valuable colonial possessions of Germany are hostages both to France and to England, as both these countries have fleets stronger than the German; and although the capture of these outlying territories would not affect the issue of a European struggle, still the loss would be felt by any of these powers as, in some measure, a humiliation, and would become an element to be considered in settling the terms of a peace.

Just in the same way, Cuba and Hawaii, in the hands of the United States, would be liable, at the outbreak of a war, to be seized by the fleet of any enemy stronger at sea; and the only way to prevent this would be for the United States to maintain a fleet in the Pacific and another in the Gulf of Mexico powerful enough to defend both islands. Now, of course, the United States can, if she likes, build and maintain a navy adequate for this purpose. But is it worth her while to do so? Why should she spend the hundreds of millions of dollars that would be needed? Of all the great powers of the world she is the one least likely to be attacked; not only because she has few occasions for quarreling with other states, but also because no other state has anything to win by fighting her.

There is not a power in the world which would not lose more than it could possibly gain by a war with America; so that the only circumstances that can be imagined as likely to induce a war is great exasperation of feeling arising from overbearing conduct or injurious language proceeding from one or other party to the dispute. The conclusion follows that unless the United States desired to undertake some war of aggression—also an improbable hypothesis—she has no occasion for a navy equal in numbers and armament to the navies of the greatest European powers. In other words, a great navy would be to her a luxury, and a very costly luxury.

We in England are unluckily obliged to have a formidable navy, because we are confronted by formidable and not always friendly rivals, and have an immense trade and wide colonial dominions to protect. We deplore the gigantic sums that we are annually obliged to devote to our fleet—sums all the larger because fashion in naval matters changes so fast that a ship which has cost some millions of dollars may in a few years be pronounced obsolete. It is, however, supposed, whether rightly or wrongly I need not inquire, that Britain can not help herself, and must go on increasing her annual naval vote.

Mr. President, not only does the distinguished Englishman advance arguments in this communication of his to the Forum which in my opinion are impregnable, but those arguments prevail with a large and intelligent portion of our fellow-citizens. The ordinary mind can not see how it is that we can defend our frontiers by increasing them. The more you increase your frontier the more force is required to protect it.

That proposition appears to me to be self-evident. But it is said that the modern method of warfare entirely changes the situation and makes it necessary for the different nations of the world, in order to carry on war successfully, to have naval stations situated at various points in the ocean in order to furnish coal to their vessels. If we have a naval station, as we have at Pearl Harbor, we have all that is necessary for defensive purposes, we have all that is necessary for aggressive purposes; and what nation can assail us from the Pacific, may I inquire. Will China do it? Will Japan do it? Russia has no navy. She could not do it. Even if she obtained the coveted portion of China, Manchuria, which is to be the terminus of the Siberian railroad, that possession would be too insignificant for her to build a vast navy which might operate offensively against the United States.

So any enemy from the Pacific is altogether out of the question. The fears conjured up in that direction have no foundation. None of the nations of Europe would sail around the Horn or through the Nicaragua Canal, if it were built, to attack us upon the Pacific coast. Any attack on our Pacific slope must necessarily come from the Orient or the oriental countries, or their borders; and if a steamship has to be coaled, and if we have a coaling station well fortified at the Sandwich Islands, is not that all that is necessary to prevent any offensive attack upon our frontier from that direction? It occurs to me so.

Then, again, it has been stated and not successfully controverted that islands which we already have in the Aleutian group afford better harbors and furnish a shorter route to the East from San Francisco than by way of Hawaii. We can fortify Unalaska, make it a coaling station, make it a point of defense or make it a point of offensive attack, if we have a war, and what more do we want?

Mr. Commander Melville has stated that the route on the Pacific by way of the Aleutian group was too difficult of navigation on account of the fogs and ice, but a member of our body who has traveled that route distinctly denies that statement. There are no fogs there of any consequence; there is no ice at all. So, therefore, from a military standpoint, even from a point of strategic advantage, all that Hawaii can afford is already ours, and if Pearl Harbor is not sufficient, we have the Aleutian Islands, just as good and better.

But if one will read the testimony of these military strategists—I do not care to refer to them too extensively—it will be observed that their reasons are more of a political character than of a military kind. None of them stop at the military point, but all of them indulge in speculations of the enormous advantages, political and commercial, to the United States of having the islands. They open up to us large avenues of wealth and trade, especially the wealth of the Orient, as if it were necessary for us in order to have that trade to occupy every intermediate island in the Pacific Ocean. Trade is not made by establishing outposts of a military character. That is not the way to make trade—to build fortifications and posts along your frontier or out in midocean.

Our trade with China or with the Orient will come about by natural trade conditions or it will not come at all. England trades with her colonies to some extent. She allows the Canadians and the Australasians and the New Zealanders to impose against her whatever tariff their colonial legislatures choose to adopt. The trade flows by natural laws and not by artificial and forced laws; and if England can not even command the trade of her distant colonial possessions by erecting a chain of posts and coaling stations in their proximity, how can we hope to establish trade with China by occupying the Sandwich Islands by military fortifications?

I do not see the force of this reasoning. I can not apprehend the doctrine that in order to have trade or even in order to have security it is necessary to go out and acquire outlying territories and expend vast sums upon their maintenance for uses to which they may be never applied. Our frontier can be defended at home. The way to defend it is by coast defense.

Our Navy ought to be augmented so as to be commensurate with the extent of the augmented coast fortifications, and when we have a navy commensurate with our needs, and have our coast towns fortified, we will have no need of these alleged strategic positions in midocean, either in the Atlantic or the Pacific, unless we go upon a war of aggression and conquest; and it would look as if all these arguments were directed not to the condition that ought to obtain in the United States, not to that condition of peace which has characterized us for a century of existence, but to a condition of unlimited conquest and of expanded empire, a condition that would befit a conquering czar or triumphant queen, but do not consist with our republican institutions.

Mr. President, it is said, and vociferously said, that the sugar trust is opposing this scheme of annexation. There is a paper published in this city that in nearly every issue publishes an article attacking the opponents of this scheme as being the agents of the sugar trust, not employed agents, but as representing the interests of the trust. Mr. President, if there is anyone not in opposition to this bill, in my mind it is the sugar trust. If it does not, it ought to want annexation.

The sugar trust controls the price of raw cane sugars the world over. What the sugar trust wants is raw cane sugar. The only competitor with the sugar trust to-day in the United States is the producer of beet sugar in the Western States. The sugar of the Hawaiian Islands amounts to about 250,000 tons annually. That sugar is sold in San Francisco to the sugar trust. That sugar is sold under a contract with the trust. It is bought by the trust. It is made up into refined sugars, and those are precisely the sugars that the Hawaiians can not make and that the sugar trust does make.

Not only does the sugar trust control the price of raw sugar in Louisiana, in the Philippine Islands, in South America, but it controls it in Hawaii. By annexation the trust would remove all danger of abrogation of the reciprocity treaty, which would impose a larger outlay on the trust for its raw sugar. The trust does not desire expansion of the beet-sugar output. For beet sugar, by its peculiarity, can be turned out directly from the centrifugals into consumption, and thereby compete with refined cane sugars. But cane sugars, to compete with beets, must be refined very largely. Hence, it would seem that to keep down beet sugar, the trust would not object to using Hawaii for that purpose. And that purpose can be better effected by having Hawaii always at hand, under the jurisdiction of the United States.

Why, therefore, these broad allegations that the sugar trust is in favor of this movement to oppose the annexation of Hawaii? Let those who make this charge prove it. It might well be that for selfish reasons the trust would oppose annexation. This would not be any reason for maligning those who, on broad grounds of policy and law, likewise opposed the scheme. The trust can be broken down in but two ways: First, by a combination between the beet and cane growers in the United States to refine all their sugars, and make an article as good as the trust's, and try to break them down by their unaided competition; and secondly, by legislation of a character to destroy the system which gives them control over prices.

The second plan might as well be given up. Legislation appears to be powerless to affect a monopoly which thives under the very law enacted to crush it. Now, the area of cane-sugar production in the United States is limited. The beet area is not accurately known, but is known to be very large—large enough to supply the domestic demand. If a competition strong enough to make head against the trust is to come, it must come mostly from beet sugar. The more cane sugar that Hawaii makes the less can beets compete with the trust. It would therefore seem, Mr. President, that the trust would like to use Hawaii as a club to destroy the beet competition.

Now, how does the trust command the price of sugar in Louisiana? It is simply this: The Louisiana planters make about 320,000 tons of sugar—I am not positive about the figures, I have not looked up the point lately—and they can only sell those sugars to the jobbers. The wholesale dealers do not buy sugars from the Louisiana planters. Why? Because if they do the sugar trust boycotts them. The sugar trust sells under a commission. Every wholesale dealer is virtually a factor of the sugar trust. They can not sell below a certain price, and they are allowed a commission.

Now, if they do not buy exclusively from the sugar trust, the sugar trust will not let them have any of their sugar. If they go off and buy a small lot of sugar from a Louisiana sugar planter and the sugar trust finds it out, they will blacklist him; he can not get any more sugar. That forces the wholesale dealers, therefore, to deal exclusively with the sugar trust; and the Louisiana planter has to peddle his sugar out at a price considerably below what he could get were not the sugar trust in entire control of the market.

Now, take the price of Louisiana yellow clarified sugars, for instance. Those sugars polarize about 98°. They are clean sugars. They are washed when they are coming through the centrifugal. An article of 96-test Cuban centrifugal, unwashed, polarizing 2° below, will sell for as much and more in the New York market than we can sell our 98 yellow clarified at the retail price. The general average of price has been from three-eighths to a half a cent lower for the Louisiana centrifugals, clarified, 98°, than for the 96-test Cuban centrifugals in New York. That shows that the sugar trust has control of the market for the raw sugars.

What more does it want? What better does it want? To keep Hawaii just where it is or to annex it.

But the reasons for the trust's desiring annexation are much stronger than its reasons for keeping the islands where they are.

But whatever the trust may want is no concern of ours. We can not be driven from opposing a scheme fraught with danger to our Constitution and our policy because an odious monopoly may concur with us on grounds of self-interest.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President—

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Does the Senator from Tennessee desire to go on this afternoon?

Mr. BATE. It is after 5 o'clock. We could go into executive session. If it is insisted on, however, I will proceed.

Mr. WHITE. I suppose there will be no desire to insist that the Senator from Tennessee shall go on at this late hour.

Mr. DAVIS. What is the desire of the Senator from Tennessee? Mr. BATE. I say if it is the desire that I shall go on, I am willing to proceed, but it is after 5 o'clock, and an executive session is to be had this evening.

Mr. DAVIS. Has the Senator taken the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The Senator from Tennessee has been recognized.

Mr. BATE. Yes, sir; I have taken the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. Has the Senator from Louisiana concluded?

Mr. CAFFERY. Yes, sir; for the time being.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 30, 1898, at 11 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate June 29, 1898.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS.

William Mahone, of Virginia, to be collector of customs for the district of Petersburg, in the State of Virginia, to succeed Thomas L. Shippen, whose term of office has expired by limitation.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY.

Lieut. John B. Bernadon, United States Navy, to be advanced ten numbers on the list of lieutenants, from No. 201 to No. 191, under the provisions of section 1506 of the Revised Statutes, for eminent and conspicuous conduct in battle at Cardenas on May 11, 1898.

Asst. Paymaster Richard Hatton, to be a passed assistant paymaster in the Navy, from the 26th day of September, 1897, vice P. A. Paymaster George W. Simpson, promoted.

Asst. Paymaster Barron P. Du Bois, to be a passed assistant paymaster in the Navy, from the 1st day of November, 1897, vice P. A. Paymaster Harry R. Sullivan, promoted.

Asst. Paymaster Harry E. Biscoe, to be a passed assistant paymaster in the Navy, from the 5th day of February, 1898, vice P. A. Paymaster Samuel L. Heap, promoted.

Asst. Paymaster John Irwin, jr., to be a passed assistant paymaster in the Navy, from the 12th day of February, 1898 (subject to the examinations required by law), vice P. A. Paymaster John Q. Lovell, promoted.

Asst. Paymaster George G. Seibels, to be a passed assistant paymaster in the Navy, from the 6th day of March, 1898 (subject to the examinations required by law), vice P. A. Paymaster Edwin B. Webster, discharged.

Asst. Paymaster Edmund W. Bonaffon, to be a passed assistant paymaster in the Navy, from the 15th day of March, 1898 (subject to the examinations required by law), vice P. A. Paymaster James S. Phillips, promoted.

Asst. Paymaster Joseph Fyffe, to be a passed assistant paymaster in the Navy, from the 30th day of March, 1898 (subject to the examinations required by law), vice P. A. Paymaster Thomas S. Jewett, promoted.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE VOLUNTEER ARMY.

FIRST REGIMENT UNITED STATES VOLUNTEER ENGINEERS.

To be assistant surgeon with the rank of first lieutenant.

Walter D. Webb, of New York.

The nomination of Charles D. Webb, of New York, for the above-named office, which was delivered to the Senate June —, 1898, is hereby withdrawn.

NINTH REGIMENT UNITED STATES VOLUNTEER INFANTRY.

To be lieutenant-colonel.

David M. Sells, of Colorado.

The nomination of David M. Sells, of Iowa, for the above-named office, which was delivered to the Senate June —, 1898, is hereby withdrawn.

SIXTH REGIMENT OF INFANTRY.

To be captains.

Ike T. Jobe, of Kentucky.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 29, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments to the Indian appropriation bill and agree to the further conference asked.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] asks unanimous consent to insist on its disagreement and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. CURTIS of Kansas, and Mr. LITTLE.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8498) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

J. G. CANNON,

WM. A. STONE,

JOSEPH D. SAYERS,

Managers on the part of the House.

W. B. ALLISON,

EUGENE HALE,

A. P. GORMAN,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a motion that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments, and I want to say a word or two about it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say to the House, first, that to-morrow is the last day of this fiscal year. This bill ought to be enacted before to-morrow passes by. If it is not enacted, I apprehend we shall have to resort to a joint resolution, such as has been resorted to in former years, extending the appropriations of the current year for a specific time into the coming fiscal year. I hope it will not be necessary to do that.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman state to the House the date on which the sundry civil bill passed the House?

Mr. CANNON. Away back in March some time, early enough to have been disposed of hands down long ago; but, after all, the Senate and the House must both act and agree. Now, I will take only a very short time touching these matters of disagreement. I want to state, however, a fact that is generally known to the House, that the body which proposes legislation, or a new provision involving legislation as well as appropriation, must recede if the other body does not agree to it. That is the practice between the two Houses.

Now, the matters in disagreement are six, or five, practically. The first one is the public building at Annapolis, Md., $120,000. The second is a public building at Butte, Mont., $50,000. Neither of these buildings is authorized by law. It is fair for me to state, however, that the contention of the Senate conferees is that Annapolis is a State capital, and that nearly all of the State capitals have public buildings. The policy, they claim, has been that buildings at the State capitals should be authorized anyhow.

Mr. MERCER. If that is so, then there are three other States which should be remembered.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that, but I want to state the contention of the Senate.

Mr. KING. I hope the gentleman will speak in behalf of Utah.

Mr. CANNON. Then they say that in some instances the House has assented to the creation of public buildings upon appropriation bills, and that is true in some instances. I want to state this exactly as it is, so that the House may act with full knowledge of the facts.

Mr. LOUD. In other words, we have established precedent and we must continue, I suppose.

Mr. CANNON. Well, that hardly follows, but they bring that up as a matter of argument. Of course our argument on the other side has been that this is not a public-building session, so far as the House is concerned, and that these two provisions make fish of one and fowl of the other. As to the Butte public building, Butte is not a State capital, but they say the building is very badly needed.

Now, as to Yaquina Bay, that is authorized by law. The Senate still insists. The House has time and again registered its opinion about it. That is the only matter upon the bill in difference between the House and Senate that is authorized by law. I will not speak further of it.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then I should prefer those items in controversy not authorized by law.

Mr. CANNON. The next is a Soldiers' Home sanitarium at Hot Springs, S. Dak. The proposal is to appropriate $50,000 to begin with, and to authorize $100,000.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is it the purpose to begin a series of appropriations for sanitariums at all the Soldiers' Homes?

Mr. CANNON. No; there is no Soldiers' Home at this place.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What is it?

Mr. CANNON. This is a proposal to establish one, to establish a sanitarium—that is, to begin the work, and then it is in order to add anything that Congress sees proper afterwards.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Do I understand you to say that it is the purpose to have the sanitarium there for soldiers?

Mr. CANNON. It is the purpose that anybody may go that is entitled to go. Now, I want to finish my statement.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to understand the purpose of the appropriation.

Mr. CANNON. The appropriation is to establish a sanitarium at this place.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. A sanitarium in connection with a Home?

Mr. PAYNE. This is a starter.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; this is a starter.

Mr. PERKINS. The State has a Soldiers' Home there now.

Mr. CANNON. The State has a Soldiers' Home at this point which is substantially supported by the United States; that is, we appropriate $100 a year for every inmate of every State Soldiers' Home. Now, your committee have from time to time taken counsel with the Military Committee of the House touching this matter. There is a sanitarium or hospital at Hot Springs, Ark., which was built for the Regular Army. The cost I do not recollect, but between $200,000 and $300,000. The Regular Army has no considerable use for it, but it is fully equipped. Now, the President, as he can under the law, has issued a proclamation which admits soldiers and sailors of the late war to this sanitarium at Hot Springs, Ark., and it is not very considerably occupied up to this time. It is presumed that it may be a little later on.

Now, it is proper that I should state these facts and what the contention of the House conferees has been touching this matter. The House conferees have held that there is no considerable soldier population in Dakota; that it is too far west; that its climate and location do not warrant the building of a Soldiers' Home from the standpoint of wise expenditure; that if there is to be a sanitarium, we had better take this one which we have taken at Hot Springs, Ark., that is already built and is ready for business, costing between $200,000 and $300,000, as it can now be taken under the law.

Mr. LOUD. Would it not be better to go out of the sanitarium business entirely?

Mr. CANNON. Now, I will pass this by until the specific motion comes, when I will let others discuss it. The next item is legislation that is intended to affect the status of the United States attorney for the District of Columbia. I believe his name is Davis. He was appointed by the President, but rejected by the Senate. Then, under the law which applies to United States attorneys in all of the districts of the United States, the supreme court of the District of Columbia appointed Mr. Davis United States attorney, and he is now acting. This amendment of the Senate provides that no money appropriated by the bill shall be used for the payment of the United States attorneys, under such circumstances, after the adjournment of Congress.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And that covers this case.

Mr. CANNON. That covers this case, and it was intended to cover this case, but the amendment if adopted changes existing law. The Senate conferees say that the law ought to be amended, that if a man is not confirmed by the Senate, his term of office ought to expire when Congress adjourns. We have not felt at liberty to assent to that amendment of the law.

Now, that concludes the matters of difference between the House and the Senate, and, in conclusion, I want the House to pass in earnest upon these various matters, because, in the nature of things, the coming conference is the last one practicable on this bill. It is a great bill, carrying over $50,000,000, running through the whole public service, and while these matters are of no great importance in amount, yet it involves a principle, and the time has come for either the House or the Senate, which proposes this legislation, to back down.

Mr. DOCKERY. I think in this connection we ought to have the judgment of the House conferees. It seems to me it is probable, judging by the history of conferences, that the House may finally recede on some amendments and the Senate on others. Does not the gentleman think that with a vote to further insist the House conferees can reach an agreement?

Mr. CANNON. I want to say to my friend from Missouri that on account of the position the House has taken touching public buildings I shall not agree unless the Senate recedes. I want to be entirely frank about it. If it is the sense of the House to recede, I want instructions to that effect. But somebody will say, "Are you going to lose a great bill like that on account of two public buildings?" No; I do not want to do it, but it is a matter that the House is interested in, and I do not want to be subjected to criticism that I have given away the House policy in this matter.

Now, the House can do that with propriety if it chooses, and I think the House ought to determine what it is going to do with this proposition. I think it is fair that the House should understand the gravity of the situation.

Mr. HULL. If anybody calls for a separate vote.

Mr. CANNON. If anybody calls for a separate vote.

Mr. DOCKERY. There is one proposition in difference that the House on three separate votes has rejected.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; on three separate votes by a decided majority the House rejected the proposition for the improvement of Yaquina Bay; and it would be a bold conferee indeed that would agree to that proposition now.

Mr. DOCKERY. I knew the position of the gentleman, but supposed the House would be glad to follow any suggestion of the gentleman in respect to the items in controversy.

Mr. CANNON. I want the House to deal with these amendments. If it is the sense of the House that the Senate, proposing the legislation, shall recede, say so, and march up and maintain that position. If it is the sense of the House that the House shall recede, this is the place and now is the time to do it.

Mr. SULZER. What is your opinion about the matter?

Mr. CANNON. My individual opinion? Well, if I could have my way about it, I would have the Senate recede. I believe the Senate ought to recede.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is it not true that it is the unbroken practice that the body proposing an amendment must recede if the other body stands firm?

Mr. CANNON. That is the rule—that is, touching matters that involve legislation.

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Now, mind you, all these matters involve legislation except one, Yaquina Bay.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then, under the custom and rule, the Senate must recede.

Mr. CANNON. That is the rule. "Must" is for the king. The Senate may not recede. It takes a majority to recede. But when the gentleman speaks of the rule, that is the rule.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, I hope the House will stand by the position taken by the distinguished gentleman and that the House will not yield one single point.

Mr. SULZER. I hope that will be done.

Mr. CANNON. I will be glad to have an expression of the House. It has been my object to be fair with the House.

Mr. SULZER and Mr. BABCOCK. We will stay with you.

Mr. LOVE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois what objection is raised against the sanitarium at Hot Springs, Ark.?

Mr. CANNON. It can be used now.

Mr. LOVE. What objection was there on the part of the Senate to the general use of this sanitarium, and why the necessity of establishing another in the extreme West?

Mr. CANNON. That is not involved in this matter.

Mr. LOVE. I thought you spoke of it as one of the questions on which the conference committee could not agree.

Mr. HULL. They are trying to establish one without legislation.

Mr. LOVE. I understood that there was some contention between the two Houses on this point.

Mr. CANNON. I was explaining that we have spent between $200,000 and $300,000 at this sanitarium at Arkansas, and that it can be used by our soldiers and sailors. They were talking about establishing another sanitarium in the West.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand the gentleman to say the public-building amendments involved the policy of the House, and I would ask the gentleman if it would not be well to further insist and let the House take a vote?

Mr. MERCER. Let them stand or fall on one proposition.

Mr. CANNON. Any gentleman can ask for a separate vote on any of these propositions.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question, as I do not clearly understand his statement in this respect. Do the Senate conferees insist, with respect to the public buildings, that they will give a public building to only one State, and not to two or three States that have no public buildings? Do they insist on that discrimination?

Mr. CANNON. By way of argument, they insist that one of these public buildings is at a State capital, and the policy has been to give one public building to each State capital.

Mr. KING. Can not the committee, under the rules of the House and the Senate, accede to that, with an amendment that they give to those States that have no public buildings a public building, so as to have no discrimination against any of the States?

Mr. CANNON. I am not speaking of the wisdom of the statement. I merely speak of the argument made by the Senate conferees.

Mr. KING. I ask, if the committee may legislate at all for the construction of a public building in one State, can they not amend by adding such legislation as will give a public building to each of the States not having one?

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, the conference committee would not dare to do what the gentleman wants us to do. There would be no authority for anything of that kind.

Mr. PAYNE. Such a report would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Perhaps that is true; but the conferees would have the right, when a measure of this kind comes before them, to insist that there should not be any improper discrimination.

Mr. SAYERS. There is no proposition whatever to put any other building on the bill.

Mr. KING. I understand that; but the conferees can certainly make the proposition.

Mr. SAYERS. Well, they will not do it, because they have not the authority.

Mr. CANNON. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE].

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, the position of the gentleman from Illinois who has charge of this bill is entirely right. It seems to me that both sides of the House ought to sustain him and his associates in this fight against extravagant appropriations and legislation which do not belong on this bill and which have not been considered by the House committees which have jurisdiction of the items. If the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds wants to single out these particular places above all others in the United States and give them public buildings, I dare say the House will promptly consider their recommendations. But the committee has already considered the matter of appropriations for public buildings and, so far as we are informed, is of opinion that these places do not deserve the distinction and favoritism which is sought to be given them by the Senate amendments.

They do not properly belong on this bill, and the House should insist upon its disagreement and support the conferees. So with the sanitarium. If it is a good hot-water sanitarium that you want for the soldiers, in my judgment Hot Springs is the only place for such an institution; and at that place you have one already well equipped and in operation. There the Government owns both the land and water.

Mr. SAYERS. In what State is that? [Laughter.]

Mr. McRAE. Hot Springs is in Arkansas, and there is no other place where such healing hot water can be had.

Equally strong objections apply to all the other items which are now in conference. In fact, we have repeatedly voted upon the only remaining items in the bill, and it is clear that the House does not want the amendment. It is necessary that this appropriation bill should be enacted before the 1st day of July; and, as the chairman of the committee has suggested, he is entitled to the instruction of the House as to whether it intends to stand by him on these propositions. There ought to be no doubt about the position of the House. Let us insist upon our disagreement, and let the Senate take the responsibility for the failure, if it must fail.

Mr. CANNON. I ask that my motion be put, unless somebody desires to submit a motion to concur.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the conference asked.

Mr. CANNON. Several gentlemen suggest that we have a rising vote. It will take but a minute; and I call for it.

The question being taken, there were on a division—ayes 117, noes 0.

So the motion of Mr. CANNON was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. CANNON, Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE, and Mr. SAYERS as conferees on the part of the House.

MILITARY STOREKEEPER.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned last night we were dividing upon Senate bill 3277, to authorize the appointment of a military storekeeper in the Army. I ask for a vote on that bill.

The bill was again read.

Mr. HANDY. I ask unanimous consent to make a proposition to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. HANDY. I should like to suggest—

Mr. BABCOCK. I wish to reserve the right to object after the statement is made.

Mr. HANDY. I am proceeding by unanimous consent to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Iowa. My suggestion is to this effect: Since this bill is not one that the gentleman considers a "war bill," and as it is likely to consume time and thereby delay proceedings, I suggest that he withdraw the bill. We on this side are very anxious not to delay proceedings touching genuine war measures.

Mr. STEELE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is on the third reading of Senate bill 3277, to authorize the appointment of a military storekeeper in the Army.

The question was put.

The SPEAKER. The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. HANDY. I demand a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 72, noes 47.

Mr. HANDY. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER (having counted the House). One hundred and fifty members are present—not a quorum. Under the rules of the House the doors will be closed, and a call of the House will be considered as ordered, and at the same time the yeas and nays upon the pending question.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 110, nays 67, answered "present" 20, not voting 152; as follows:

 Mr. BULL with Mr. BREWER.
 Mr. COCHRANE of New York with Mr. FOWLER of North Carolina.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from New York, Mr. ODELL. I have voted in the negative on this proposition, but desire to withdraw my vote and be marked simply "present," as the gentleman from New York is not here.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia will be recorded as "present."

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Speaker, I am noted by the Clerk as being paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. MCALEER. I had a general pair with him some time ago, but my understanding was that it had expired. However, I will withdraw my vote, and desire to be marked simply as "present."

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. VANDIVER, but transferred it to Mr. HARMER, and desire to be recorded as having voted in the affirmative on this proposition.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I find that I am paired with the gentleman from Florida, Mr. SPARKMAN. I thought he was present, but withdraw my vote, and desire simply to be marked as "present."

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, the Clerk announces that I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. BENNETT. If he is not present, and has not voted, I desire to withdraw my vote in the negative, and be simply marked as "present."

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make an inquiry if the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. ARNOLD, with whom I have had a pair, has voted?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has voted. Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask if the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. HEATWOLE, has voted?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not voted.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. He and I are paired generally, and I understood he had returned and the pair was canceled. But if he has not voted, I ask to withdraw my vote and that I may be marked as "present."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The bill, having been read the third time, was passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PROTECTION OF HARBOR DEFENSES, ETC.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, by instruction of the Committee on Military Affairs, I submit a report on the bill (S. 4714), and call it up for immediate consideration.

The bill (S. 4714) to protect the harbor defenses and fortifications constructed or used by the United States from malicious injury, and for other purposes, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who shall willfully or maliciously trespass upon, injure, or destroy any of the works or property or material of any submarine mine or torpedo, or fortification or harbor-defense system owned or constructed or in process of construction by the United States, or shall willfully or maliciously interfere with the operation or use of any such submarine mine, torpedo, fortification, or harbor-defense system, shall be punished, on conviction thereof in a district court of the United States for the district in which the offense is committed, by a fine of not less than one hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or with imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years, or with both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2. That when any offense is committed in any place, jurisdiction over which has been retained by the United States or ceded to it by a State, or which has been purchased with the consent of a State, or is occupied upon the written consent of the owner of the land, for the erection of a fort, magazine, arsenal, dockyard, or other needful building or structure, the punishment for which offense is not provided for by any law of the United States, the person committing such offense shall, upon conviction in a circuit or district court of the United States for the district in which the offense was committed, be liable to and receive the same punishment as the laws of the State in which such place is situated now provide for the like offense when committed within the jurisdiction of such State, and the said courts are hereby vested with jurisdiction for such purpose; and no subsequent repeal of any such State law shall affect any such prosecution.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, there is an amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs was read, as follows:

After the word "willfully," in line 3, insert the word "wantonly."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a blue print sent from the War Department, and I will ask the Clerk to read the indorsement on the back. I think members of the House can see the result of not having any regulation of vessels coming up the channel.

The Clerk read as follows:

On June 17, 1898, grand junction box of grand group No. 3 was raised in order to locate and repair the injuries caused to triple group No. 16 by a heavily laden three-masted schooner beating through the mine field against a head wind on the previous day. The picture shows what a snarl the cables were in when the grand junction box was brought to the surface. To unravel the snarl all the cables had to be taken out of the grand junction box and joints broken, and then each cable separately unwound from the tangle—a work of several hours.

S. W. ROESSLER,
 Captain, Corps of Engineers.

WILLETS POINT, June 19, 1898.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have read by the Clerk the letter which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE.

601 Eighteenth Street NW., Washington, D. C., May 26, 1898.

GENERAL: Notwithstanding that this office has refused to permit Capt. E. S. Randall, proprietor of the Potomac River Line of Steamboats and owner of River View wharf, to run his steamers from that wharf between 8 o'clock p. m. and 4 o'clock a. m., as such would be in violation of the regulations authorized by the Secretary of War for the navigation of the Potomac River in time of war, it is reported to me by Lieutenant Morrow that his steamer, the Samuel J. Pentz, left that wharf as follows:

May 22, 1898, about 8.30 p. m.; May 23, 1898, about 9.41 p. m.; May 24, 1898, about 10.07 p. m.; May 25, 1898, about 10.05 p. m.

Also that the bulletin announced her hours of leaving that wharf on those nights as follows:

May 22, 1898, at 8.30 p. m.; May 23, 1898, at 9.30 p. m.; May 24, 1898, at 10 p. m.; May 25, 1898, at 10 p. m.

Paragraphs 1 and 2 of the said regulations are as follows:

"1. No vessel will be allowed to pass through the channel between the fortifications at Fort Washington, Md., and Sheridan Point, Va., between the hours of 8 p. m. and 4 a. m., or at times of heavy fog. During these periods vessels must not approach within 2 miles below the wharf at Sheridan Point or within 2 miles above the fortifications at Fort Washington.

"2. No vessel will be allowed to anchor at any time within the above-named limits except by special authority."

Captain Randall's attorneys, Messrs. Dudley & Michener, in a letter of May 21, 1898, to the Secretary of War, reported upon by me under date of May 24, 1898 (24943-11), claimed in effect that he had the right under the law and regulations to run his steamboat from River View wharf to Washington at any time between 8 p. m. and 4 a. m., provided he got his boat to the wharf by or before 8 p. m. This claim is answered in my said report of May 24, to which I would respectfully refer.

Captain Randall's steamer carries passengers, excursionists chiefly, on his evening trips from River View to Washington.

It appears evident that he does not propose to fully obey the regulations referred to unless he is forced to do so.

I would respectfully recommend that proceedings be instituted by the United States against Captain Randall if there is any law under which they can be so instituted.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHAS. J. ALLEN,
Lieutenant-Colonel, Corps of Engineers.

Brig. Gen. JOHN M. WILSON,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army, Washington, D. C.

[First indorsement.]

OFFICE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY,
May 28, 1898.

Respectfully submitted to the Secretary of War for his information, in connection with my indorsement of May 28, returning letter of Messrs. Dudley & Michener in behalf of their client, Capt. E. S. Randall. I know of no law under which proceedings can be taken against Captain Randall for violating the regulations governing the navigation of vessels in time of war.

JOHN M. WILSON,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

[Third indorsement.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, JUDGE-ADVOCATE-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., June 7, 1898.

Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War.

This is a recommendation made by Lieut. Col. Charles J. Allen, Corps of Engineers, that proceedings be instituted against Capt. E. S. Randall, proprietor of the Potomac River Line of Steamboats and owner of River View wharf, for violation of regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War for the navigation of the Potomac River. There is, however, no law for the enforcement of the regulations.

G. NORMAN LIEBER,
Judge-Advocate-General.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, the blue print has to be returned to the War Department later, but in transmitting these letters to the Committee on Military Affairs the Secretary of War submits this letter, which I ask to have read, so that the House may have full information.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, June 10, 1898.

Sir: I have the honor to transmit herewith copy of a letter addressed to the Department by Lieut. Col. Charles J. Allen, Corps of Engineers, concerning a serious infraction of the regulations established by this Department for the navigation of the Potomac River, together with indorsements thereon by the Chief of Engineers and Judge-Advocate-General of the Army, calling attention to the fact that there is no law for the enforcement of such regulations. This case is brought to the attention of your committee for consideration in connection with a bill now before it on the subject, in the hope that the matter may receive the early favorable consideration of Congress.

Very respectfully,

R. A. ALGER, Secretary of War.

Hon. JOHN A. T. HULL,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, the major of the Corps of Engineers, in sending the blue print, was urgent that something of this kind should be enacted at once, so that we could at least compel these heavy vessels in going through the mine fields to be towed by tugs. I understand that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cox] desires to offer an amendment. I want to retain control of the floor, so that the consideration of the bill shall not take more than an hour. I ask the gentleman if he is ready to proceed with his amendment now?

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. I yield twenty minutes. I suppose that will be sufficient.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, if I can have the attention of the House for a moment, we shall have no serious trouble about this matter. This bill has for its object the protection of the mines placed by the Government in our harbors. A proper penalty is attached as a punishment for the destruction of mines, and so forth. That is all right, and it ought to be passed without any sort of discussion or hesitation. The trouble grows out of this, and this only: By a previous act of Congress it was provided that a fort or defense upon the land of a private individual might be erected by the consent of the individual.

Now, the question arises as to where the jurisdiction is in regard to these forts erected, with the consent of the owner of the land, upon private property. My point is this: That a private individual can not confer jurisdiction upon the Federal courts over territory within a State without the consent of the State. To make it plain, A owns land on the coast and gives his consent to the Government to put up a fort upon that land. The Government puts up a fort there, and a violation of this law occurs upon that territory upon which the owner of the land has conceded the right of the Government to put up the fort.

No action has been taken by the State in regard to the jurisdiction, so I contend that this bill ought to be passed for the punishment of those who interfere with these mines willfully, and I will go further and say carelessly; but you must confine it to the jurisdiction that is recognized by law, and there is no jurisdiction inside the territory of a State unless it is ceded by the State. That is the whole point.

Now, to reach that point, on line 7 of the bill, so as to make the connection as intelligently as I can, any person—who shall willfully or maliciously—

The amendment is put in there "wantonly"— injure or destroy any works or property or fortification or harbor defense owned or constructed or in process of construction by the United States.

And here would come the amendment:

And under the jurisdiction of the United States, as now provided by law, who shall willfully or maliciously.

So the only object of the amendment is to confine the jurisdiction of the United States to the present jurisdiction as established by law. Now, then, I will pass over that.

When any offense is committed in any place the jurisdiction over which has been retained by the United States or ceded by the States—

That is correct—

or which has been purchased with the consent of a State—

That is correct—

or is occupied upon the written consent of the owner of the land for the erection of a fort, magazine, arsenal, dockyard, or other needful building or structure.

That ought not to be in here. No individual of a State can concede jurisdiction to the United States. It must be the government of a State that concedes its jurisdiction, and not the action of a man or a citizen of a State.

Now, I make that point, and any gentleman listening can clearly understand it. Here is A. B. He concedes to the Government of the United States the right to erect a fort upon his land. A murder is committed upon that territory. Where is the jurisdiction? Not with the Federal courts, but in the courts of the State. The jurisdiction ought to be retained in the State courts, because no citizen can concede away by a private contract the jurisdiction of the State.

Now, that is this whole proposition; and I can not see why we should have a contention about this. It is only to keep us within the line of the law. Wherever the Government has jurisdiction that has been ceded by a State as the law now recognizes it, then there is no trouble about it. But this bill goes another step further, that, in my judgment, would not be sustained in the courts at all, and makes the jurisdiction of the United States depend upon the act of a citizen. I will yield the balance of my time to my colleague on the committee [Mr. HAY].

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the bill by striking out section 2.

As I understand the object of this bill, it is for the purpose of protecting the harbor defenses and fortifications constructed and used by the United States. Now, the first section of the bill covers all of that, and it states that the United States courts shall have jurisdiction of the districts over which they have jurisdiction.

Now, we all know that the States are divided into two or three United States judicial districts, and if any offense against the United States is committed in those districts, why, then the United States courts no doubt have jurisdiction over them; and there is no conflict between the jurisdiction of the United States and of the State. So that section 1 covers all that is desired in this bill. Section 2 refers entirely to magazines, arsenals, and dockyards which are within the States, over which the jurisdiction of the United States would apply. Therefore I can not see any reason for keeping in the bill section 2; and I hope that the chairman of the committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. COX. I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment made by my colleague for the amendment which I have proposed to the bill. Either one is satisfactory to me. The only objection I have is to the jurisdiction of the United States courts in this bill, and it ought not to be done as a matter of policy. It ought not to be extended upon doubtful questions, when the object of the bill is absolutely legitimate and proper, and that is for the United States to protect its own defenses. It ought not to be done. It brings complications and uncertainty without reaching the remedy that is intended.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, in the judgment of the committee the amendment now proposed by the two gentlemen, members of the Committee on Military Affairs, was considered unimportant and unnecessary. The first section of the bill provides a punishment for the offenses at which it is directed. The amendment suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee to that section is of no moment, because the section does not attempt to extend the jurisdiction of the Federal courts over any territory that it would not now have the jurisdiction concerning offenses committed within it, but confines the provisions of the bill strictly to a definition of what shall constitute the offense and the punishment for it.

Mr. HAY. That is what I say.

Mr. GRIFFIN. So far as the first section is concerned the gentleman from Virginia agrees with my statement. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Virginia insisted the second section of the bill should be stricken out. The purpose and object of the second section is to extend the jurisdiction to a class of offenses which it is now doubtful as to whether or not the Federal courts have jurisdiction, and upon reading the section it would seem to be clear to anyone that this class of offenses ought to be embraced within the penal powers of the Federal court.

There may be, and probably is, one question involved in this bill with reference to the jurisdiction of the Federal court being extended to territory which under existing laws is not recognized as proper for the court to exercise jurisdiction concerning offenses committed therein. That questionable provision is in section 2, in these words:

Or is occupied upon the written consent of the owner of the land.

I am not going to disagree so much with the gentlemen who raise the question upon that provision of the bill. But if they desire to perfect the bill, so that it shall be free from objections relating to their own views on the question of jurisdiction, why not say they will move to strike out these words which I have just read?

Mr. HAY. I did not catch the words.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Take the words stated in line 6, section 2, commencing with the word "or" down to and including the word "land," in line 7, and all objections would be removed.

Mr. HAY. I think so.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Because they are the provisions to that extent that extend the jurisdiction to a class of offenses therein intended to be regulated and controlled relating to territory the jurisdiction over which has been retained by the United States. That is one class. Who can object to the Federal court exercising jurisdiction within such territory?

Mr. COX. Nobody.

Mr. CONNOLLY. That is the law now.

Mr. GRIFFIN. "Or where it has been ceded to it by a State."

Mr. COX. That is right.

Mr. GRIFFIN. "Or which have been purchased with the consent of the State." There can be no question about that.

Mr. COX. That is right.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I say that the objectionable provision is contained in lines 6 and 7, on page 2 of the bill.

Mr. HAY. I will withdraw the amendment I have offered to strike out section 2, if the gentleman will offer that as an amendment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to offer it as an amendment.

Mr. HAY. Then I shall offer it as an amendment.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Because we can get to the point in a minute. The bill is all right, in my judgment, except as to this one point, and that is whether the owner of the land ceding the right to the Government of the United States to erect a fort can by law extend over it the jurisdiction of the United States. If the gentleman will take that out of the bill, I will support it cheerfully.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Then the gentleman from Tennessee virtually abandons the amendment that he offered to the first section of the bill.

Mr. HAY. He has withdrawn that.

Mr. COX. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I have withdrawn that.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The reason I am not willing to offer any such amendment as suggested is this, that the question is divisible. There may be attached to the shore, pursuant to a license or permit of the owner of the land, certain mine connections, and yet the mine itself be located so as to be within the provisions relating to riparian rights over which the United States has jurisdiction. Rather than strike that provision out and allow some who might be offenders to escape, I would prefer to see it retained, and the committee would so prefer, in order that if the mines beyond the shore should be injured the Federal court might have jurisdiction, and thereby secure punishment of the offender.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield once more? And then I will not interrupt him again.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Suppose you take a fort erected by the United States by consent of the owner of the land, under the legislation which we have had (and I voted for it), and an offense arises upon that territory where the consent of the owners was obtained. Now, the difference between the gentleman from Wisconsin and myself is this: I say that the owner can not concede jurisdiction to the Federal courts without the consent of the State, and I say the courts of the United States could not punish that offense on that territory unless the State itself ceded the jurisdiction.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will say to the gentleman that the offender then goes unpunished.

Mr. COX. No; you can punish him in the State court.

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will yield to me, I will withdraw the amendment I did offer and will offer as an amendment to the bill, to strike out of line 6, section 2, the words "or is occupied upon the written consent of the owner of the land."

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will yield to the gentleman to submit that amendment.

Mr. HAY. I do not wish to be heard upon it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). The gentleman from Virginia offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in lines 6 and 7, page 2, after the word "State," the following: "Or is occupied upon the written consent of the owner of the land."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COX. Now there is no objection to the bill, in my judgment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the committee.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I have read this bill very carefully, and it does not seem to cover the difficulty, which is that the steamers on the Potomac River and elsewhere violate the regulations of the War Department by sailing anywhere that they please.

The bill does not meet this difficulty. It does not punish breach of the regulations unless there is injury to the mines or interference with their operation. It provides only that any person "who shall willfully or maliciously or wantonly trespass upon, injure, or destroy any of the works or property or material of any submarine mine or torpedo, or fortification or harbor-defense system, owned or constructed or in process of construction by the United States, or shall willfully or maliciously or wantonly interfere with the operation or use of any such submarine mine, torpedo, fortification, or harbor-defense system," shall be punished by fine or imprisonment.

Will not the captain take the risk? Will he not take the responsibility of going ahead if his boat is of light draft and sailing around in the harbor defenses? Will he not take the chance of avoiding injury, with the further chance, in case injury result, that no jury will find that he did it wantonly and maliciously? This chance is what is now being taken, and there ought to be some punishment provided for men who insist on breaking the regulations of the United States and imperiling the lives of passengers aboard their boats. These regulations are for the benefit of the public as well as for the benefit of the Government, and I propose the following amendment:

Mr. PITNEY. Does the gentleman state that the bill makes no provision for the punishment of a person who breaks the regulations of the United States?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. No; and not even for actual injury to the mines unless the injury is done "willfully, maliciously, or wantonly." I therefore propose the following amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 10, page 1, after the word "system," the following: "or shall knowingly, willfully, or wantonly violate any regulation of the War Department that has been or shall be made for the protection of such mines, torpedo fortifications, or harbor-defense system."

Mr. HULL. That is right; that will help the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COOKS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. HULL. I call up the bill (H. R. 10693) directing the enlistment of cooks in the Regular and Volunteer armies of the United States.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be enlisted in each company, battery, and troop in the Regular and Volunteer armies of the United States, as a part of the authorized enlisted strength thereof, under rules to be prescribed by him, a competent person as cook, who shall take rank as and be allowed the pay of a corporal of the arm of the service to which he belongs, and whose duties in connection with the preparation and serving of the food of the enlisted men of the company, battery, or troop, and with the supervision and instruction of enlisted men hereby authorized to be detailed to assist him, shall be prescribed in the regulations for the government of the Army.

Mr. BARTLETT. What is to be the pay of these men?

Mr. HULL. They will get the pay of corporals, which, I think, is about $2 a month more than the pay of a private.

Mr. ALLEN. Will this bill interfere with the mess system?

Mr. HULL. The bill permits the detail of enlisted men for the instruction of others in cooking; and the men are permitted to divide themselves up into smaller messes if they want to.

The report is quite full and can be read if any gentleman desires it. The measure is essential not only to the health of the enlisted men, but as a matter of economy in caring for and preparing their food.

Mr. HANDY. I think this is a good bill.

Mr. HULL. I am much obliged to the gentleman from Delaware.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

POST QUARTERMASTER-SERGEANTS.

Mr. HULL. I call up the bill (H. R. 10051) to increase the number of post quartermaster-sergeants in the United States Army.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the number of post quartermaster-sergeants of the Army be increased by the addition of twenty-five post quartermaster-sergeants, to be appointed by the Secretary of War in the manner now provided for by law.

Mr. HANDY. Was not a bill for this same purpose passed recently?

Mr. HULL. This bill has not passed. It was up once before, and quite a majority of the House was in favor of it; but according to my recollection the question of a quorum was raised against it.

I will say to the gentleman from Delaware that within the last three days the commanding officer at Fort Washington has been urging me to get this bill through because these officers are very much needed; it is impossible to get along without them; and their appointment is, I think, a matter of economy.

Mr. HANDY. The gentleman refreshes my memory. The bill was up before; and the gentleman satisfied me then that the bill was a good one.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SECOND ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. HULL. I call up the bill (S. 4678) providing for a Second Assistant Secretary of War.

The bill was read.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I hope this bill will not be passed. So far as I can understand, there is no necessity for it. The civil war was fought through for four years, and for the first time then an Assistant Secretary of War was created.

Mr. HULL. If there is objection to the bill, I will ask unanimous consent to withdraw it for the present, until we get through with other measures.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

RANK OF CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER.

Mr. HULL. The Committee on Military Affairs at its meeting this morning instructed me to ask for the passage of the joint resolution (H. Res. 270) to correct an omission relative to signal officers on the staff of corps commanders. I call up that resolution.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That so much of section 10 of the act of Congress approved April 23, 1896, as provides that the staff of the general commanding an army corps shall consist of certain officers with the rank of lieutenant-colonel shall be held to include among such officers a chief signal officer.

Mr. HANDY. I should like to know the purpose of this bill.

Mr. HULL. There is no written or printed report accompanying the bill, as the committee did not act on it until this morning. The purpose of the bill is simply this: In the Volunteer Army bill that we passed some time ago provision was made that certain officers on the staff of corps commanders should have the rank of lieutenant-colonel. In designating those officers the chief signal officer was inadvertently omitted. A bill to correct the omission was sent to the committee some time ago by the War Department, but by reason of some oversight the measure was not considered until it was brought up here yesterday by my colleague [Mr. LACEY] as an amendment, and ruled out upon a point of order made by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. HANDY].

Mr. HAY. No; it was ruled out on a point made by me. I do not want my friend from Iowa to do any injustice to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. HULL. I would never do that willingly.

Mr. HANDY. I raised one point and the gentleman from Virginia objected to consideration at another time.

Mr. HULL. The Committee on Military Affairs took up this resolution this morning. They came to the conclusion that this signal officer on the staff of a corps commander is more necessary in this war than in ordinary wars; and I think there was no vote except in the affirmative as to the propriety of at once reporting and passing the bill. It creates no rank not already provided for in the volunteer staff, and will expire at the close of the war.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ERECTION OF CHAPEL, WEST POINT.

Mr. HULL. I now call up for consideration the bill H. R. 6149, a bill authorizing the Secretary of War to exercise his discretion in certain cases.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War, in his discretion, may authorize the erection of a building for religious worship by any denomination, sect, or religion on any military reservation of the United States: Provided, That the erection of such building will not interfere with the uses of said reservation for military purposes. Said building shall be erected without any expense whatever to the Government of the United States, and shall be removed from the reservation whenever, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, military necessity shall require it.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect immediately.

The Committee on Military Affairs recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of War, in his discretion, may authorize the erection of a building for religious worship by any denomination, sect, or religion on the West Point Military Reservation: Provided, That the erection of such building will not interfere with the uses of said reservation for military purposes. Said building shall be erected without any expense whatever to the Government of the United States, and shall be removed from the reservation or its location changed by the denomination, sect, or religious body erecting the same whenever, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, public or military necessity shall require it, and without compensation for such building or any other expense whatever to the Government."

Mr. BROMWELL. I would like to suggest to the gentleman in charge of this matter, Mr. Speaker, that he withdraw the bill for the present, because from my personal knowledge there are a certain number of members who are absolutely opposed to its present consideration and passage, and I shall myself be compelled to enter the point of no quorum if its consideration is insisted upon at this time.

Mr. ARNOLD. And it is not a war measure.

Mr. BROMWELL. It is not a war measure, certainly.

Mr. HANDY. It is just as much a war measure as the bill just passed to give a sinecure office for life to a military storekeeper.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in the reading of the resolution or rule giving to the Military Committee the two days that confines them exclusively to war measures. It is true the committee may not have had the rule if it were not for the fact that the passage of certain war measures was urgently demanded.

But in the four years of service which I have spent in the Committee on Military Affairs under Democratic chairmen of that committee, there was not in any long session of Congress an occasion where the committee had not the opportunity to report its measures, and justify its action before the House, and from one to two days were given that committee each session.

Mr. NORTHWAY. If the gentleman will permit me—

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. NORTHWAY. In view of the fact that a large number of bills are pending, which are necessary to be passed for the Military Committee, I would like to ask the gentleman if it would not be as well to withdraw this bill from present consideration, it not being absolutely necessary at this time?

Mr. HULL. Well, Mr. Speaker, I can only say that in one sense of the word the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is the servant of the committee. He must carry out, as far as he can, its dictates and wishes. Instruction has been given by a vote of the committee in reference to the matters to be called up. I was instructed by the committee positively to call up this bill. And let me say further to the gentleman and to the House that if anyone will take the trouble to go to West Point and look over the grounds he will see that this permit can be given without embarrassment, and without injury to any interest of the Government.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee will state it.

Mr. COX. Will the Speaker kindly inform me how this kind of a bill has any privilege under any of the rules of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rule under which we are operating to-day provides for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, and this bill is called up by the chairman of that committee.

Mr. COX. Do I understand that this matter is one reported from the Committee on Military Affairs?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill has been so reported, and has been called up by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HAY. I will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that it comes with the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. COX. Is the bill reported with an amendment?

Mr. HAY. It is.

Mr. COX. Well, Mr. Speaker, can this bill, under the rule which has been agreed upon, be considered as a privileged matter?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that under the rules it is privileged to be called up and considered now.

Mr. COX. Very well.

Mr. HAY. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAY. Can not the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs withdraw the bill now and bring it up afterwards? I mean, would he not have the privilege of bringing it up within the time given to the committee? Not that I desire personally that it shall be withdrawn, for I am in favor of the bill; but simply to meet the opposition which seems to have been incurred.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, this is a fair, honest, and just bill. It ought to pass this House to-day without opposition. In my opinion, no fair-minded man can object to it or will object to it.

This bill provides that the Secretary of War, in his discretion, may authorize the erection of a building for religious worship by any denomination, sect, or religion on the West Point Military Reservation. It also provides that said building shall be erected without any expense to the Government, and shall be removed whenever, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, military necessity shall require it. That is all there is to the bill, and the War Department is in favor of it, or, at all events, has no objection to it.

The bill has been carefully considered by the Committee on Military Affairs, and that committee unanimously report it to this House and favor its passage.

In my judgment, this bill is a worthy and meritorious measure, and its critics, I feel confident, will agree with me after careful investigation. The bill is also favored by the people at the West Point Academy.

Let me say, I stand for religious freedom in its broadest sense. I am very liberal in regard to religious matters. I respect every man's religion, and I want every man in this country to have the unquestioned right to worship his Maker in his own way and in accordance with his own faith. I hate bigotry and fanaticism, and I know the passage of this bill is absolutely necessary in order that a great many people at the West Point Military Reservation may enjoy the right to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences. No one here will dare to deny that right, and yet I know that in many ways and in many places it is substantially denied. This bill is sure to do some good. In no way can it do harm.

For one, sir, I make bold to say that I do not believe there is a man in this House who is so illiberal, so bigoted, and so narrow-minded that he is not willing to give his fellow-man the same religious rights he enjoys, that is, the right to worship his God in his own way, and according to his own heart. If there be such a man, he ought to hang his head in shame. He is not in touch with the liberal spirit of his age.

This bill was introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ODELL], and although he is necessarily absent to-day, I know he is heartily in favor of its passage. He represents the district in which the military reservation at West Point is located, and he knows how essential is the passage of this bill in the interest of a large class of people there. He advocates the passage of the bill in their interest. I sincerely hope now that no member of this body will raise an objection to its passage, but that unanimous action will be taken in reference to it.

There is not a single tenable objection that can be urged against this bill. It is as fair to one denomination as another. It lodges the whole discretionary power in the hands of the Secretary of War, and it does not apply to any of the reservations of the Government but the one at West Point, and that reservation is quite remote from any town or village of any size, and hence at West Point church facilities are extremely limited.

When we give this authority to the Secretary of War, I do not believe the discretion will ever be abused. I think we can safely trust this power and right to an officer of the Cabinet. And so, take this bill all in all, I can not see how any man can be opposed to it.

It ought to pass this House by a unanimous vote. And, sir, it will if you believe in the Constitution of the United States, if you believe in freedom of worship, and if you believe in religious liberty. If you do, you will support this measure. If you do not believe in the Constitution and the freedom of worship and religious liberty, you will vote against this bill. I know several times, when the bill has been brought up heretofore, it has been objected to. I am glad to say, sir, that several members who formerly objected to this bill withdrew their objection after a careful investigation, and they now say that the bill ought to pass. The bill gives no especial privilege to any church or any denomination. It is as fair to one as another. The bill simply gives the Secretary of War the discretionary power. The whole matter will be in his hands, and surely we ought to be able to trust him in regard to this matter.

A MEMBER. Is not this bill intended to give the Catholic Church a chapel at West Point?

Mr. SULZER. Oh, no. The bill provides that any church can build a chapel at West Point if the Secretary of War gives his consent, but I want to be entirely frank with all gentlemen. I do not believe in concealing anything regarding this bill from this House. If this bill becomes a law, I believe, in fact there is no doubt, that the Catholic Church will request the right to erect a chapel at West Point, and the permission will be given. We know that at West Point there are a great many officers, a great many cadets, a great many soldiers who live there, and who must live there, who belong to the Catholic Church and who demand the right to worship God according to the rites of that church. This bill will give them the right to worship God in a chapel of their own. They ought to have that right. I have only pity for the bigot in these closing years of the nineteenth century who would deny them that right.

Mr. POWERS. Do other denominations have chapels on this reservation?

Mr. SULZER. There is a Protestant church there now, a Government church, and there is a sort of a chapel there also used by the Catholics, which is utterly inadequate.

This little chapel is down in a hollow, and I will say to the gentleman from Vermont that it is totally unfit and inadequate. It is nothing more nor less than an old ramshackle, barn-like sort of a building.

Mr. POWERS. I have not the slightest objection on the ground that it is asked for by Catholics. The only question in my mind is whether we shall cover the entire reservation with churches.

Mr. SULZER. There is no danger of that. It can not be done, and it will not be done.

Mr. POWERS. Other churches will seek the same privilege.

Mr. SULZER. No; I think not, because all of the people of other denominations on the reservation, that is, those people who believe in the Protestant faith, worship in one church; that is the Government church. That is not so with those of the Catholic faith. They must worship in a church of their own or not at all. I believe this is so, although I do not belong to the Catholic Church myself. My parents were very strict Presbyterians, and I was brought up in that church. I believe in all churches, and I believe they all do good. I am now, always have been, and always will be a firm believer in religious liberty and in religious freedom.

I believe that every man in this country ought to have the right to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and I am proud of the fact that while I was a member of the legislature of the State of New York I placed on the statute books of the Empire State the law guaranteeing freedom of worship and religious freedom to all. [Applause.] We boast that this is a land of civil and religious liberty. Let us prove it to-day. One of the best ways to prove it is to pass this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BELKNAP] such time as he desires, reserving the balance of my time.

Mr. BELKNAP. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio rises to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BROMWELL. I want to know whether the gentleman from New York has any time to yield?

Mr. SULZER. I have the floor, Mr. Speaker, and I am a member of the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York was recognized, no other gentleman rising.

Mr. BROMWELL. I supposed he rose for the purpose of making a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SULZER. Not at all. You did not listen to me.

Mr. BELKNAP. Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my hearty approval of this bill. It is only just and fair that it should pass. From personal investigation at West Point I find that the young men there whose belief is other than that of the Protestant faith have on Sundays to be marched in charge of an officer or proper official down under the hill where there is an inconvenient and undesirable building. At the time of worship a temporary altar is erected. This building is not suitable for religious worship for any denomination. A temporary altar is erected, and when the services are concluded it is taken down.

This bill simply gives to any denomination the privilege, under proper restrictions, after obtaining the approval of the Government, of erecting a chapel there. It is simply right and just to every man to permit him to worship as his conscience dictates. It is not desirable that these young men should be put to this inconvenience and taken down under the hill in the manner in which I have described. I sincerely hope, as a matter of justice and simple fairness, that the bill will become a law. I was reared a Protestant, but I want every person to have the privilege and opportunity to worship just as they deem best and most proper.

Mr. CANNON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BELKNAP. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I merely want to ask a question, so as to understand the facts. There is a Government chapel on the West Point Reservation?

Mr. BELKNAP. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. And that is occupied by a Protestant chaplain?

Mr. BELKNAP. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Paid from the Government Treasury?

Mr. BELKNAP. Yes.

Mr. DANFORD. Not necessarily so.

Mr. CANNON. I am not asking whether it is necessarily so; but I am asking whether it is so?

Mr. BELKNAP. At present it is occupied by an Episcopalian minister.

Mr. CANNON. Whatever chaplain occupies it, he is the Government chaplain.

Mr. BELKNAP. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Paid from the Treasury?

Mr. BELKNAP. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I want to ask two more questions. This bill as amended, if I understand it, permits any denomination, under the approval and within the discretion of the Secretary of War, to build a church there at their own expense?

Mr. BELKNAP. It does.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I want to ask still another question. Well, I do not know that I want to ask it. This allows anyone to do that?

Mr. SULZER. It does.

Mr. BELKNAP. Exactly; and furthermore I will say—

Mr. CANNON. I do want to ask one further question. I want to ask whether one or more churches can be built there without injury to the public service?

Mr. BELKNAP. I can say frankly, in response to that inquiry, that I was a member of the Board of Visitors at West Point for the year 1897, and from personal observation there is plenty of room for one, two, three, or maybe more churches to be erected at convenient places for the men to worship, and it will not inconvenience the military requirements of the post.

Mr. CANNON. Is it proposed by this legislation to pay any of the expense of building the church or the maintenance and ministration there by the Government?

Mr. BELKNAP. Not one cent. The denomination erecting it must take charge of its own church and stand all the expense in every particular.

Mr. CANNON. One further question. Can the gentleman conceive now of any possible objection to the passage of this bill?

Mr. BELKNAP. Not to my mind, by any gentlemen who will look at it fairly and squarely.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman yield to me now for a question? Do you believe that any private body of people who want to build a church should be allowed to go upon a public reservation and build a church without the Congress of the United States passing a bill to give them that authority?

Mr. BELKNAP. I believe that when conscience dictates that men should worship in a certain way, they should have that privilege accorded them.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Do you think that there should be any power given to the Secretary of War or the President to permit any religious body to come upon the grounds of the Capitol here and build a church so that they might dictate religiously to members?

Mr. SULZER. That is entirely different. The case is not analogous.

Mr. BELKNAP. That is not this bill. The bill in question simply gives the men in the military service of the United States at West Point the privilege and opportunity to worship as their consciences dictate.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SULZER. I have the floor, but I yield it to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HULL. I have the floor in my own right, and had it in the beginning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Iowa, chairman of the committee.

Mr. HULL. I want very briefly to review for the House some of the past history of the Government in regard to matters similar to this. When Mr. McCreary was Secretary of War, a proposition came before the War Department for what is called a revocable permit to erect a chapel—I think at Leavenworth—and the Secretary of War, Mr. McCreary, held that he had power to grant a revocable permit; and there was permission given to build a chapel at Leavenworth, under a revocable provision, which provided that whenever the Government needed the ground the building should be removed without expense to the Government. Secretary McCreary was an able lawyer.

That has been maintained from that time to this. At one time the Government, needing the original location, required the removal to another site, which was done, and the Government has not suffered any loss and no citizen has been ruined. And the War Department held from that time down to two years ago that they could grant this revocable permit on any military reservation. Now, as to West Point; some two years ago the Catholic Church raised $20,000 and applied to the Secretary of War, Mr. Lamont, for a revocable permit to erect a chapel at West Point, and that was granted in the closing days of President Cleveland's Administration. Before it was consummated and the contracts drawn up, however, the Administration changed.

President McKinley brought into his Cabinet an Attorney-General—and while we are talking about Catholics I may say that Attorney-General McKenna is a devout Catholic—and when the question was brought before him for official construction, he held—and it is the first time it had been held that way since the days of the Hayes Administration—that the power rested only in Congress to grant this permission to occupy any reservation. I think Attorney-General McKenna was right. This question was up last Congress, but that was in another line—to pass a joint resolution prohibiting the Secretary of War or the Attorney-General entering into any such contracts without power being granted by Congress. It was never reported or acted on.

Now, this money has been raised for the purpose of erecting a chapel at West Point. The proposition was before the Committee on Military Affairs to give that right on all military reservations, but the committee was very strenuously opposed to that, and there is a reason why they should treat this differently from other reservations. West Point is a military school. We have some 5,000 acres of land there, only a small part of which is used for buildings, the rest being in drives and scenery, and ample room for anything whatever of this kind that may be done. It is a permanent school, where boys are gathered from all parts of the United States, one from each Congressional district of the United States, one from each Territory, and ten appointed by the President at large.

These boys represent both Protestants and Catholics. An average from 25 to 30 Catholic boys attend the school as cadets. The regulations of the school are that the cadets can not leave the grounds to go to church; they must attend on the grounds or go out under the charge of an officer, unless excused. At one time the authorities at West Point permitted the cadets to attend church in a small town below called Highland Falls, but it was so utterly subversive of discipline—the young fellows got out and into saloons—that the authorities put a stop to it. They then gave permission to the Catholics to use an old barn of a building on the grounds, but it is down under the hill in a place needed for a storehouse for coal and other things, and yet the Catholics to-day are occupying that.

Now, another thing. The detail of soldiers at the Academy have been for years more than three-quarters of them members of the Catholic Church. I say this because I do not think the Protestant churches will apply for a permit, although they have a right to apply on the same terms under this bill as have the Catholics. There is nothing in the bill that says "Protestant" or "Catholic" in any way; but, treating the matter fairly, we might as well recognize that it is for the purpose of accommodating the cadets and professors that can not be accommodated under present circumstances. There is an average of six professors at the school who are Catholics. I know very little about the Catholic Church myself. I was raised as a Methodist, but for the last fifteen or twenty years I have not worked at it very hard. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Speaker, if there were to-day 35 cadets of the Methodist Church, and there were 50 enlisted men of the Methodist persuasion, and 6 professors of the Methodist persuasion, who had no church facilities at all, and they came knocking at the door of Congress, and asking for a general law that would give them authority to build a church at their own expense, and pay the expenses and would agree to remove the building without expense to the Government whenever the Government ordered them to do so, I should say it was hard lines if my Methodist friends could not have the permission which they ask. This is not like a reservation in any other part of the United States. It is a school where they have good discipline. It is a permanent post for enlisted men experienced in instruction that can give it instruction in drill, etc.

Mr. SULZER. Is it not a fact that the officers and cadets and soldiers at West Point are forbidden to go off the reservation to attend church?

Mr. HULL. They have to get a permit to go.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Is there not a chapel there dedicated for worship in the Protestant faith?

Mr. HULL. I do not know whether it was ever dedicated or not. There is a Government chapel there. The post chaplain has charge of that absolutely.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. He is a Protestant?

Mr. HULL. He may be a Catholic under the law, but he never has been.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Then this bill is to put the Catholics on an equality with the Protestants?

Mr. HULL. No; the chapel that is there now is filled by a post chaplain, and the Government pays him $2,000 a year; in addition the Government pays all the expenses of caring for the building, lighting it, and so forth. This bill proposes to let the Catholics or the Presbyterians or the Methodists or any other sect that applies put up a building upon the reservation, if the Secretary of War consents, with a revocable permit that they shall take it down whenever the Government orders, and for the time the building is there the sect that erects it must keep it up and pay for heating and lighting it and for all the services connected with carrying it on. When it is ordered removed, it shall be done without expense to the Government. That is all there is to it.

Mr. POWERS. As I understand, the gentleman argues that the permit ought to be granted because the cadets should have the right to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. The practical test has resulted that when they had an opportunity to go outside of the reservation to attend church they brought up in a saloon. [Laughter.]

Mr. HULL. That is hardly a fair statement. I have known both Protestant and Catholic boys, when they got out from under discipline, to go astray. I have seen officers and privates from Camp Alger drunk within the last week, but that is no reflection on their religion, and I do not think it is a fair statement. Boys at school, kept under strict military discipline and training, are liable to go astray when out from under that discipline.

Mr. POWERS. I do not blame the boys.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL].

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss the merits of this bill. The objection which I have to it is to its present consideration by the House when there are at this time so few members present and when it is well known that there is a very considerable feeling of opposition to this class of legislation. I think so important a measure, establishing so important a precedent in regard to Government reservations, for this applies not only to West Point—

Mr. HULL. Oh, yes; the bill limits this exclusively to West Point.

Mr. BROMWELL. Well, suppose it does; it is one that will be used as an entering wedge for every other reservation in the United States.

Now, I say that the committee ought not to have brought in this bill at this time. It is well known that when this or similar measures have been brought up in this House heretofore they have met with very considerable opposition from conscientious members, who have a right to be heard. It was upon this ground more than upon the general merits of the bill that I proposed to raise the question of consideration. I presume, however, that the discussion of the bill has gone so far that that question can not be raised now; but I do propose to say to the gentleman in charge of the bill that in order to pass it to-day he will have to have a quorum of the House present.

Mr. SULZER. We had a roll call here a few moments ago, and there was a quorum present.

Mr. BROMWELL. If there is a quorum present and the bill can be put through, all right; if there is not a quorum, the bill will not go through, and other legislation far more important and necessary will be retarded by the fact that this bill is brought in at this time.

Mr. SULZER. Are you opposed to this bill?

Mr. BROMWELL. That is neither here nor there. The gentleman will find when I come to vote what is my position on the merits of the bill. I never shirk a vote.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to know whether you have the courage—

Mr. BROMWELL. I have the courage to say and do what I deem right, and I do not propose to be bulldozed or browbeaten by the gentleman from New York. When my vote is recorded, he will find where I stand.

Mr. SULZER. There is no attempt to browbeat or bulldoze; it is merely a question of the gentleman having the courage to declare his convictions.

Mr. BROMWELL. I decline to yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio declines to yield, and must be permitted to proceed without interruption.

Mr. BROMWELL. Now, Mr. Speaker, as I have said, I do not propose to discuss the merits of this bill. I am familiar with the situation at West Point. I know there is a chapel there which is controlled by the chaplain, who for the time being is resident at that post. If he is an Episcopalian, the services at that chapel are, I understand, the Episcopal services. If he should be a Presbyterian, the service would be the Presbyterian service; if he is a Methodist, the service will be a Methodist service.

Now, I want to say that among the various branches of the Protestant Church there are just as decided views and objections in reference to the different forms of Protestant service as the differences between the Protestant Church and the Catholics; and if we are going to open up a discussion as to what denomination shall control the religious services of the cadets at West Point, we might just as well have it understood that permission is to be given to all the various sects of the Protestant Church to put up chapels on those grounds and have separate religious services.

Mr. SULZER. This bill provides that.

Mr. BROMWELL. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the proper thing to do is to have a Government chapel that shall be open to all denominations and let the time be divided among those denominations, so that each can hold its own service in the one chapel. There would be no difficulty in permitting the Catholics to hold their service on Sunday morning and the Protestants to hold theirs in the afternoon. There is no desecration of a building by any particular denomination using it. That, it seems to me, would be the sensible and reasonable way of adjusting this matter.

There are but few Catholics among the cadets; there are but few enlisted men there who are Catholics; there are still fewer professors or officers at that post who are Catholics. Yet it is proposed to construct a chapel on those Government grounds and put it under the control of a particular sect, and practically to recognize in this way one denomination, opposed to the whole of the great Protestant denominations or churches, and without giving equal opportunity to these various sects of the Protestant Church.

Mr. HULL. My friend has not read the bill. It does not say a word to warrant the statement he has just made. It provides that the building or buildings which may be erected as chapels may be under the control of any sect.

Mr. BROMWELL. The bill is very skillfully worded, in general language; but every one of us knows, and the gentleman from New York admits it, that this bill has been prepared in order to enable a particular church to construct a particular chapel. I for one do not believe that such a bill should be permitted to pass this House when so large a proportion of its membership is prepared to object to it and to show good reasons why its provisions could not pass into law.

Mr. SULZER. How do you know that?

Mr. BROMWELL. I know it just as all of us know such things—by conversation among members.

Mr. SULZER. Has the gentleman made a canvass of the House in regard to this question?

Mr. BROMWELL. That is neither here nor there.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that this bill is subject to the criticism which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL] makes. Under the provisions of the bill my church, the Methodist Church—I am a kind of a brother-in-law to that church, that is about as near as I can get [laughter]—will have just as much right to build a chapel there as the Catholic Church or any other; and so long as the church which may erect there a chapel does not interfere with the business of the post or with the religious services of other denominations, and so long as it pays its own bills, I see no objection.

Mr. HULL. I yield now to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY] for ten minutes.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, I learned, a long while ago, when I read the Constitution of my country, that it was somewhat imperfect when it was adopted by the framers of that instrument; and the first amendment made to the Constitution, penned as it probably was by Thomas Jefferson himself, was to the effect that religious freedom should be one of the privileges of the people of the United States. Knowing that fact, I must confess myself somewhat astonished that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL] who has just taken his seat, living as he does in a Catholic center and among a Catholic community, should take the position he has assumed here; that is, to make this bill, if it be passed, applicable only to the Catholic Church. Under the bill, as its terms distinctly declare, any religious denomination in the United States can, with the permission of the Secretary of War, go on the public reservation at West Point and construct a chapel to be conducted in accordance with the tenets of their own particular faith. There is no exclusion for any, and no special privileges accorded.

Mr. BROMWELL. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. BERRY. Certainly.

Mr. BROMWELL. Did not the gentleman hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] a few moments ago explain what the purpose of the bill was?

Mr. BERRY. I do not care what any gentleman may say in reference to the matter. The facts are in evidence on the face of the bill.

Mr. BROMWELL. Did not the gentleman hear the statement that this is for the benefit of the Catholics?

Mr. BERRY. I say to the gentleman from Ohio that this bill does not give and does not propose to give a dollar to the Catholic Church or to any particular denomination in the United States for the erection of a church at West Point. I am only sorry, Mr. Speaker, that some of our Protestant denominations do not seem to have the same energy that has been exhibited by the Catholics and put up buildings for their people and for the worship of their God according to their religious belief. I regret that they have not shown the energy that the Catholic people have shown and are showing in this country.

This only gives to any denomination the right to use a part of the reservation for the purpose contemplated. It only authorizes them to erect a chapel, which may be removed whenever the Government so directs. It gives no one any permanent foothold. The Methodist, Baptist, or any other denomination can avail themselves of its provisions. Why, then, will you object to allowing men who have a particular belief, that is not in contravention of the Constitution or of any enactment that Congress has made in reference thereto, the privilege, at their own expense, to provide a place for worshipping God according to their own religious opinions and beliefs?

There are at West Point many young men, employees and officers of the Army also, who desire the privilege of worshipping in the church of their own selection. Why should they be denied that privilege? It is a right that is inherent in our people by virtue of the Constitution itself. It is illiberal to deny it, and no man can with propriety condemn the exercise of that privilege who respects the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. BERRY. With pleasure.

Mr. BAILEY. There is not anything that may be said of the pending proposition that even nearly or remotely denies to any other denomination the enjoyment of the same rights which this bill would confer on any religious denomination in the United States, as I understand it?

Mr. BERRY. Certainly not. I do not myself belong to any particular church; but, like my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], I may be "a brother-in-law" of some of these religious denominations, and while I stand aloof, yet I am willing that each man shall have the privilege of exercising his own religious views according to the dictates of his own conscience.

Mr. LOVE. I would like to ask the gentleman if the grounds at West Point are sufficient for all of these denominations in case they should exercise the privilege conferred by the bill?

Mr. BERRY. I do not know as a matter of fact. I have been told that they are sufficient. I understand that there is ground enough for all; but whether they be Methodists or Baptists, whether they want to go to heaven by water or by land, I say, give them all an equal chance and let them construct these chapels if they so desire. We ought not to deny the right to anybody.

I live in a Catholic community myself. They pay a very large proportion of the taxes. The gentleman from Ohio lives in a similar community just across the Ohio River.

West Point is part of the public property of the country, and there should be no favoritism, and none is shown by the bill. If the Catholic Church desires the privileges the bill accords, if they have the will and the power and the ability to erect a chapel there, so that the young men and the officials of that institution may worship God according to their own creed, it should not be denied them. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I will now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTHWAY].

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry that this bill should have been brought up here to-day, at the close of the session, because there is no use in attempting to disguise the fact that it at once excites some feeling and arouses a sentiment amongst the members of this body that ought not to be aroused.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], in response to some suggestions made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL], only a moment ago, when it was alleged that he lives in a Catholic community, made the remark that "he would hear from them in the next election." That is just the difficulty here.

I undertook in a mild way before, when this bill was up on another occasion, to oppose it, and I think I made no mistake in that opposition. And yet, Mr. Speaker, it has not been three weeks since I received a copy of a paper which contained in broad headlines the words, "Brand the traitors," and my name appeared in capitals, as opposed to the building up of religious denominations or institutions in this country. It is difficult, then, to consider a matter of this kind from a reasonable standpoint. When you enter upon legislation of this character, you are entering upon a dangerous field. There can be no question of that. I care not what church may be provided for at West Point. The same principle applies to any one and to all of them. I do not think that we ought to allow any to be built there, whether they be built by Catholics, Presbyterians, or Methodists.

What would you think if I should introduce a bill into this House providing that the President or the Secretary of State should allow any church that pleased to do so to build a great cathedral or church down here in the Agricultural Grounds, or on any other Government reservation in this city, on the principle that the young men of Washington need religious education? I am not opposed to the building of churches. I am not opposed to the Catholic Church or any church, for I am not a member of any church, and I do not say that boasting; but I do say that as a Government we ought not to give any special privilege to any church.

Let me tell you that if you pass this bill and let any church—I do not care what it is, Presbyterian, Methodist, or Catholic—build a great building up at West Point, that very moment you array all other churches, quietly or openly, against the West Point institution, and we can not afford to do that. We can not afford to do anything here to-day that will weaken the hold of that great military school upon the people. We want all the American people, whether they are Methodists, Presbyterians, or Catholics, to feel that they have an equal interest in that school. If you authorize the Secretary of War to allow a great Catholic cathedral to be built there—and we are told that is what is to be done—you array all the Protestant churches of America quietly against that school. It is an entering wedge that will not, I tell you, cease to be felt in its effects for the next generation. This Government ought not to interfere with the building of churches.

Mr. BERRY. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I have but very little time, but what is the question?

Mr. BERRY. I simply want to ask you, in view of the fact that you speak of this as a special privilege, if it is not to be extended to every church that wishes it?

Mr. NORTHWAY. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] told us, and the chairman of the committee said he did not want to disguise this matter, that the denomination which wants to build this church there is the Catholic Church. Now, there is no use in trying to disguise it.

Mr. BELKNAP. Protestants have a chapel there now.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Oh, Protestants, nonsense! I am just as much opposed to the Protestants as the Catholics having any special privileges there.

Mr. BELKNAP. The Protestants have a church there.

Mr. NORTHWAY. No, sir; it is a Government church. Anybody, whether Catholic or Protestant, has a right to go there and hold service.

Mr. BELKNAP. It is presided over by an Episcopalian minister.

Mr. NORTHWAY. It is nonsectarian. You know that if that church is built there sooner or later it will be expected that all cadets will be marched into it, noisens volens, to listen to the Catholic service.

Mr. HULL. I do not believe that.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Very well; if the Protestants do not go in there, then they are no nearer to religious services than they are now. I am opposed to the building of any church there, and I do not want it said here that I am opposing the Catholics. I am opposing the giving of this privilege to any denomination. I do not believe we should enter upon the business of permitting any school or any sect to build a schoolhouse or a church upon these grounds any more than we should permit it upon Government reservations in this city or anywhere else. The bill, as originally introduced, provided for all Government reservations. It is now narrowed down to the reservation at West Point.

The intent on the part of somebody is to get one denomination there that shall control the religious ideas of that great military school, so that sooner or later, ramifying from that school through all the Army, you will have one religion and one religious idea. I dare stand here and oppose that, and they may brand me as a traitor, whoever wants to do it. I am opposed to any denomination, whether Methodist, Presbyterian, or Catholic, entering upon the public reservations of this country and under the permission of Congress building a church there and attempting to inculcate its religious ideas.

Mr. EVANS. How large a town is West Point?

Mr. NORTHWAY. I do not know, sir.

Mr. BROMWELL. There is not any town there.

Mr. HULL. It is only a military school.

Mr. EVANS. Are there not other churches in the town which they can go to?

Mr. NORTHWAY. I suppose so. I have never stopped there, but I have seen the spires of the churches through the trees.

Mr. EVANS. If there are other churches there, that is enough.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I suppose the people of West Point have the same religious privileges as in other places, and I suppose they have churches there just as they do everywhere else. That is not the idea. The idea is to get the sanction of the Government to have a cathedral built upon the Government reservation. That is the idea; and if you enter upon that course, let me tell you you will start a fire in this country that will burn long after you and I are out of Congress.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman permit me to correct an error he has made?

Mr. NORTHWAY. Yes, if I have fallen into one.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman says the Catholic Church intends to build a cathedral there. That is not true.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Well, a church.

Mr. SULZER. The Catholic Church intends, if it gets the permission of the Secretary of War, to build a respectable little chapel there. That is all. No liberal-minded man should be opposed to that.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Well, I used the word cathedral as applicable to a church.

Mr. SULZER. And I will say to the gentleman that they have a place there now where they worship. The only difference is that the chapel that they have now is a ramshackle old barn of a building, and they simply want to build a respectable place to worship in. Besides the church now is in a bad location, and the military officers and cadets object to it, and—

Mr. NORTHWAY. I can not yield for a speech. I must decline.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield further.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I can not allow a speech. I must decline to yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. NORTHWAY. Yes.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I first desire to say that I am ardently in favor of this bill. Does not the gentleman know that under the doctrine of the Catholic Church she can not, as has been incorrectly suggested, occupy a building used for Protestant worship; that her church must be specially consecrated and used for her religion alone?

Mr. NORTHWAY. I understand that the doctrines of that church will not permit any of its members to enter into a church where Protestants enter and hold service. Therefore in the church upon the ground there the Catholics will not enter, because Protestants are permitted to enter; and therefore it is proposed to build this church for its exclusive use; and it thus seeks to dominate its own religion upon all the young men in that institution to the exclusion of all others. I want to say it is the proud boast of the American people that we seek to enforce no religious creed and no religion in this country; and when you undertake to enter upon any other course, you enter upon a course of death, I tell you.

Now, I am opposed to this bill; I am opposed to any denomination being permitted to go there. Let us stand where we have always stood. West Point has got along for three-quarters of a century without any complaint coming from that source. This is not a complaint that young men there do not get religious privilege. It is the church's complaint that it can not build a church without permission of Congress. I say let the ground stand as it has ever stood—nonsectarian. Let no church get exclusive use; let it be as it always has been, and our country will stand by us. You enter upon a different course and you enter upon a course that will drag that school down and make us an object of contempt in many parts of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas such time as he desires.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, the best way to absolutely refute the assertion that this is intended as a denominational favor is to have the bill read; and I desire it to appear in the RECORD by the side of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTHWAY]. The bill declares—

That the Secretary of War, in his discretion, may authorize the erection of a building for religious worship by any denomination, sect, or religion on the West Point Military Reservation: Provided, That the erection of such building will not interfere with the uses of said reservation for military purposes.

Said building shall be erected without any expense whatever to the Government of the United States, and shall be removed from the reservation, or its location changed by the denomination, sect, or religious body erecting the same whenever, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, public or military necessity shall require it, and without compensation for such building or any other expense whatever to the Government.

Mr. NORTHWAY. The gentleman did not understand me.

Mr. BROMWELL. Who introduced that bill?

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ODELL].

Mr. BAILEY. The bill was introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ODELL].

Mr. BROMWELL. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Was he present when the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] made the distinct statement that, while this bill was introduced in that general language, he did not want to deceive anybody, but that it was a bill intended for the purpose of permitting the construction of a Catholic chapel for the Catholic cadets at West Point?

Mr. BAILEY. It would make no difference with me. The gentleman from New York would not say that under this bill the Secretary of War might not allow the Baptist, Methodist, or every other denomination to do the same thing. Under this law he can allow any denomination to erect a building for religious worship. Will the gentleman from Ohio say that because one denomination will build a church, or that there is one denomination willing to furnish the young men with facilities for religious worship, they ought to be denied that privilege because some other denomination might not exercise it?

Mr. NORTHWAY. The gentleman did not exactly catch my point. I do not believe in permitting any denomination, Catholic or Protestant, to build there. [Applause.]

Mr. BAILEY. In other words, you would rather see these young men denied the privilege of worship than to see them admitted to its enjoyment. [Applause.]

Mr. BROMWELL. Will you permit me to ask you a question?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. BROMWELL. Down at Highland Falls there are churches dedicated to the service of God for the various denominations, and the men can go to these churches.

Mr. HULL. They can not.

Mr. BROMWELL. If they can not go there—

Mr. BAILEY. The statement is that they can not go there.

Mr. SULZER. That is so. They can not go.

Mr. BROMWELL. If they can not go to church without going to the saloons, they are a disgrace to the service.

Mr. BAILEY. Since the House permits a bar to be maintained in this Capitol, certainly it will not refuse to permit a church upon a military reservation. [Applause.] I have no religious prejudice; I was reared by a Protestant mother; but I would cut my tongue out of my head before I would try to inflame religious prejudices against a large part of my countrymen. [Loud applause.] It matters not to me under what name a man worships God; if he worships at all, he is infinitely better than the man who would deny him the opportunity for worship according to his own conscience. [Loud applause.]

It is the glory of this country that many of its great soldiers have been Christians, and there is not in the military annals of the world a higher example of a Christian soldier than was furnished by the late Confederate cause. Better than Caesar at Pharsalia, better than Wellington at Waterloo, better than Napoleon at Austerlitz, better than any of them—yes, better than all of them in their hour of mightiest triumph was Stonewall Jackson on his knees asking his God for the forgiveness of his sins. [Applause.]

Mr. NORTHWAY. And yet these gentlemen educated themselves in private churches without any help from the Government.

Mr. BAILEY. The Government does not propose to help anybody now. It proposes to allow them to help themselves, and you deny them that privilege.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I do not; but I say the Government should not institute any church.

Mr. BAILEY. The Government does not; it simply permits the church to institute itself upon a military reservation. The bill expressly provides that the Government shall be at no expense in the erection or maintenance of it. It simply allows any denomination to build a church in which the young men who are to glorify our country in future conflicts may worship God and enable them to learn of Him who teaches statesmen and teaches soldiers that the highest duty in this Christian day and in this Christian country is to be obedient to Him who inspired our fathers with the wisdom to found this, the greatest, the freest, and therefore the best Government that ever rose to animate the hope or to bless the sacrifices of mankind. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. HULL. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I returned a few days ago as one of the official Visitors of this House to the Military Academy at West Point, and I therefore feel that I am in a position to state what is the desire of the people at that place. Without exception, without any regard to the sectarian convictions of the officers or the privates or the people of that place, I say that they wish this bill to pass, so that the people may have the right to exercise their religious freedom in that regard.

Mr. Speaker, the article in the Constitution reads:

Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion or prohibit the free exercise thereof.

At West Point to-day there is a Protestant chapel, and a Protestant chapel, too, at the expense of our Government. As an American I deprecate the induction of any religious or sectarian argument into this matter, but in consideration of the fact that there is a Protestant chapel there, I contend that this bill is in the direction of carrying out the article of the Constitution which says that there shall be no restriction in the exercise of free religious opinion. It is the very foundation of our Government.

I am a Protestant, but I speak free from prejudice. Our country was founded by those who exercised religious freedom, and shall it be said now that after one hundred and twenty years of the free exercise for every man to believe that which he wants, we shall have men raise their voices in this Hall to protest against a bill which in its direction means the free exercise of that religion? When the Protestant commander and the Protestant chaplain and the other Protestants at the post do not object to the erection of this chapel for the believers of the Catholic faith, it will become Representatives in this House to raise their voices against the exercise of the right of religious freedom.

Mr. Speaker, I can only say, in closing, that this matter was presented to the Board of Visitors and it met their entire approval. We were told that not only the cadets, but the enlisted men want it. The enlisted men are sent to that post under military orders, and, as it now stands, they have no opportunity to worship in a house of God dedicated to their religion. The privates from the regular troops ordered to that post can not leave its boundaries except by special permit to go outside; and if the Protestants of the Regular Army are allowed to exercise their religious freedom, the Catholics should be accorded the same right.

For this reason I regret to see this question raised, for this proposition comes from those most interested; and I hope the House, which in this broad land of ours ought to know no sectarianism nor contain any religious bigot, will see that this bill passes, so that the Catholics and Protestants at the Military Academy of our country shall have the right to follow their convictions in the matter of religious worship. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS].

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I am a member of no religious denomination. I presume that in olden days I would have been termed a heretic. But, sir, I am an American citizen, and I believe that all religious denominations, under the Constitution of the United States, should stand on an equality. I do not believe that this House, in this Congress and in other Congresses, has treated the Roman Catholic Church fairly. I will give you one instance. In the Hall of Statues stands a work of art. It is the statue of a priest arrayed in sacerdotal gown, sent here as a contribution from the State of Wisconsin.

In the last Congress the Senate passed a bill accepting this statue; in the House the bill was put to sleep in committee, and never has been heard of from that day to this. On the other side of the Hall stands the statue of a Lutheran clergyman sculptured in marble, which was formally received by the House. I believe that Father Marquette is entitled to the same consideration at the hands of Congress as is the Rev. Mr. Muhlenberg. [Applause.] And, sir, I hope that when this vote is taken, at least every man on this floor who voted to give Government ground at Fort Monroe for the erection of the Hotel Chamberlin will vote to allow a little ground for the erection of a Roman Catholic chapel at West Point. [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee [Mr. HULL], who has knowledge of the legislation on this subject, whether it is true or not that the Government of the United States did by an act of Congress, passed here in the House and in the Senate, lease a large portion of the military reservation at Old Point Comfort for the erection of a hotel, free from the payment of any rent to the Government, and whether there is not now kept on that same property a high-toned, first-class saloon?

Mr. HULL. I can answer only a part of that question. The Congress of the United States, when the Secretary of War refused a revocable permit for the erection of a hotel there, did pass a bill specially granting permission for the erection of the Chamberlin Hotel.

As to the existence of a "first-class saloon" there, I assume that my friend from Ohio and others who have been able to visit Fortress Monroe since the hotel was erected can give evidence on the subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not visited Fortress Monroe since that hotel was built, or I should know, undoubtedly.

I want to give evidence upon another point. That bill was passed in the House of Representatives at about 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning; and I, with about two others, made a hard struggle to get a chance to make the point of no quorum. We could not get tellers; we could not get the yeas and nays; we could not get anything except the passage of the bill by gentlemen who did not want anybody to know that they voted for it.

Mr. HULL. I will say further that there are a large number of buildings at Fortress Monroe put up on revocable permits—permits granted during the long period I have referred to, when the Secretary of War and the Attorney-General held that the Secretary of War could grant such permits. I hold that at Fortress Monroe the grounds should have been kept for Government purposes almost entirely, because we have not any more ground there than we need, and in case of invasion we should be compelled to tear down a great many of those buildings.

Mr. HENDERSON rose.

Mr. HULL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I have just read this bill. I do not see any harm in it. Let me read it to the House:

That the Secretary of War, in his discretion, may authorize the erection of a building for religious worship by any denomination, sect, or religion on the West Point Military Reservation: Provided, That the erection of such building will not interfere with the uses of said reservation for military purposes. Said building shall be erected without any expense whatever to the Government of the United States, and shall be removed from the reservation or its location changed by the denomination, sect, or religious body erecting the same whenever, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, public or military necessity shall require it, and without compensation for such building or any other expense whatever to the Government.

There is not one word in this bill or this report that authorizes anyone to attack any religious denomination on this continent—not a word. [Applause.] It is a clean-cut authority for the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to allow any sect, whatever the altar at which it may worship, to erect a building at its own expense and without expense to the United States Government.

We have 5,000 acres of ground at West Point, only 1,000 being needed in any shape or form for military or educational purposes. Why are you raising "a tempest in a teapot" here? [Laughter and applause.] What is there to get scared about or to run away from? Have we reached a point when we are going to tear down places of worship in this country. Are we going to turn the batteries of legislation against the citadels of worship?

I am like my friend from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS]; I am not a very regular attendant at church. [Laughter.] I am somewhat of a believer in the idea of the poet—

For modes of faith let graceless zealots fight;
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right.

I believe a good deal in that doctrine. This bill being here, I for one say shame upon the American Congress if some one can get up here and by shaking before us a cross or a crescent or any other clerical emblem drive us from the performance of a simple act of justice to those who have in special charge the morals of the Republic.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

Mr. FLEMING. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs a question. I was perhaps absent from the Hall when that part of the subject was discussed, but I would like to ask whether or not there is now on the reservation at West Point a chapel used for Protestant service exclusively?

Mr. HULL. Well, there is a Government chapel there. I do not suppose you could say that it was specially used for Protestant services. But as a matter of fact, the chaplain who has always been in charge, so far as I know, for the last fifty years, is a Protestant.

Mr. FLEMING. Then an opportunity is offered for Protestant worship on the grounds there?

Mr. HULL. Undoubtedly.

Mr. FLEMING. Then until such privileges are accorded to other religious bodies, I am willing to support the proposition now before us. Let both sides, or neither side, enjoy these privileges.

Mr. HULL. If there was a Catholic chapel at West Point, I would be in favor of allowing any other denomination the same privilege and make no discrimination between them.

Mr. GILLET of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Iowa permit a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. GILLET of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the chapel now on the grounds at West Point is not open to every religious denomination, and the reason why it is not occupied by any particular denomination is that such denomination considers it somewhat of a sacrilege to use a building where another sect worships? In other words, is it not a fact that Catholic chaplains will not officiate in a building which is used by any other religious denomination for purposes of public worship?

Mr. HULL. That is not correct as to West Point.

Mr. GILLET of Massachusetts. Well, I would like the gentleman to state explicitly the facts in reference to it.

Mr. HULL. The chapel at West Point is under the control of the post chaplain, who holds two services, morning and evening. If any other clergyman desires to conduct services in the chapel and should present himself, he will be allowed to have a service during the day.

Mr. BERRY. And the chaplain is paid by the Government?

Mr. GILLET of Massachusetts. Is it not true that there are some chaplains who are Catholics?

Mr. HULL. Yes; I think that is a fact.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Why, Mr. Chidwick, the chaplain of the Maine, is a Catholic.

Mr. TONGUE. Some question has been raised here whether under the rules the students at West Point Military Academy are not compelled to attend church services, or whether they are forbidden to attend such services outside of the military reservation—

Mr. HULL. It has been found necessary, I will state to the gentleman, to withdraw the permission to go outside, because it broke up the discipline of the school.

Mr. TONGUE. Then the student would have no means of attending religious service except those which are presented by the chapel on the grounds.

Mr. HULL. Except by special permission.

Mr. FOOTE. Is the attendance, I would ask the gentleman from Iowa, compulsory at chapel services there?

Mr. HULL. I can not say as to that.

It is true that the students get so many demerits for failure to attend worship, but I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BELKNAP] is familiar with the matter.

Mr. BELKNAP. Each boy is expected to attend religious services on Sunday, if his religious belief permits him to do so. If his belief is such that he can not attend, he is excused, so that practically full liberty is allowed to the student to remain in his own room and conduct such religious services, either by himself or with two or three of his associates, as he chooses. [Laughter.]

Now, I have been there, Mr. Speaker, and I know the facts which I am stating. There are young men at West Point who exercise this privilege. They are neither Catholics nor Protestants, but Jews, and they worship properly, according to their own belief, and in their own rooms.

Mr. FOOTE. How about the Catholics?

Mr. BELKNAP. They are marched down, as I have said, to a building under the hill, a sort of a ramshackle contrivance, where a temporary altar is erected, and where they worship, and the altar is afterwards removed.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Would they not decline to go into a chapel which had been occupied or was being occupied by a Protestant denomination?

Mr. BELKNAP. Does the gentleman mean if such chapel had been occupied previously by a Protestant clergyman or any one of the Protestant denominations?

Mr. NORTHWAY. Yes.

Mr. BELKNAP. Would not the Protestants desire to have a chapel where they might worship according to their own faith if a Catholic priest had charge of the Government chapel now sustained by the Government at West Point?

Mr. NORTHWAY. They might not attend the Catholic service, but they would hold their own service immediately afterwards.

Mr. BELKNAP. Would you force them to go into the Catholic church?

Mr. NORTHWAY. No, sir; I would not force anybody.

Mr. BELKNAP. Then I want the Catholics given the same privileges as the Protestants. Give each man the opportunity to worship as he may deem right and most proper.

Mr. HULL. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ].

Mr. LENTZ. Mr. Speaker, the Military Committee gave this question considerable time, and in our investigation we found that at West Point it is obligatory upon all the students to attend religious services of some kind unless a special excuse be made by the parents of the boy. In view of that one fact alone, I fail to see how it is possible for this Congress or any member of it to comply with the Constitution of the United States to give religious freedom unless you permit the boys of the different denominations to select their own church.

Now, I care not what denomination the boy may belong to or what denomination his parents belong to, as long as you compel him to attend some church, and as long as there are any denominations ready to build churches or chapels for the holding of services according to their own faith, it is our sworn duty either to wipe off from the West Point Reservation the Protestant chapel, which we are now maintaining there at Government expense, or to permit any denomination to have the same privileges that are accorded to or rather forced upon the boys in behalf of the Protestant Church or one of the Protestant churches. We find from some of the graduates of West Point that at one time they had a Congregational minister in charge. At another time they had an Episcopalian minister.

But they never have had a Lutheran nor a Catholic nor a rabbi for the Hebrews, and so on along the list of other denominations. It seems to me a plain and simple duty for us, if we are going to have religious equality, if we are going to have religious freedom, to permit the Secretary of War, as long as it does not interfere with the uses and needs of the ground, to let all denominations put these chapels there at their own expense under the conditions of this bill. We had a bill before the Military Committee proposing to permit all denominations to go upon the eighty military reservations of the Union and put chapels upon each of them; but this was not necessary, because the men in the Army are not obliged to attend church every Sunday as the boys are at West Point. You compel these boys to attend church, and so long as you do the parents ought to be permitted to provide or select the church they see fit.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, Mr. BROMWELL demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 109, noes 21.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of no quorum. I tried to get the gentleman to withdraw this bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HULL. The point of no quorum being raised is just the same.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 134, nays 25, answered "present" 16, not voting 190; as follows:

Hitt,	Mesick,	Snover,	Zenor.

So the bill was passed.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. PITNEY with Mr. DOCKERY.

Mr. HICKS with Mr. BANKHEAD.

For this day:

Mr. WILLIAMS of Pennsylvania with Mr. BENTON.

Mr. DAYTON with Mr. PETERS.

Mr. PUGH with Mr. HENRY of Texas.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois with Mr. TERRY.

Mr. MITCHELL with Mr. TALBERT.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota with Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH with Mr. LANHAM.

On this vote:

Mr. BREWSTER with Mr. LIVINGSTON.

Mr. MAHON with Mr. UPDEGRAFF.

Florida, Mr. SPARKMAN, with whom I am paired has not voted. I therefore desire to withdraw my vote. If he were present, I would vote "yea."

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recorded as "present." I would vote for the measure if not paired with the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT]. If he were present, he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to suggest the sickness of my colleague, Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. He was taken sick in the Chamber and had to leave. If present, he would vote in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the gentleman will be excused.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with my colleague from Michigan, Mr. SPALDING. Not knowing how he would vote, I desire to withdraw my negative vote and be marked "present."

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Texas, Mr. LANHAM, but have transferred my pair to the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, and therefore desire to have my name called and to vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can be noted as "present." He is not entitled to vote at this time.

Mr. MAHANY. Mr. Speaker, I have just this moment returned from a journey to my home city, but I understand that the result of the roll call has not as yet been announced, and therefore I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is noted as "present." For the time being the gentleman is not entitled to vote, but may later.

After a pause,

Mr. MAHANY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether I am recorded?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has been noted by the Clerk as "present." Does the gentleman now desire to vote?

Mr. MAHANY. I do. I vote "yea."

The name of Mr. MAHANY was called, and he voted "yea."

Mr. CONNOLLY. How am I recorded, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is recorded as "present."

Mr. CONNOLLY. I desire to vote "yea."

The name of Mr. CONNOLLY was called, and he voted "yea."

Mr. RIDGELY. Mr. Speaker, I am marked "present." I desire to vote.

The name of Mr. RIDGELY was called, and he voted "yea."

Mr. BROMWELL. A parliamentary inquiry. I understand distinctly that the Clerk called the name of Mr. MAHANY, and he voted "yea?"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. BROMWELL. I want to inquire of the Chair whether the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAHANY] is entitled, under the rule of the House, to vote "yea?"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks so. The Chair directed him to be called. The gentleman from New York was noted as "present."

Mr. BROMWELL. Noted as "present." But has he the right to vote on this question?

Mr. MAHANY. Mr. Speaker, permit me to say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL] that immediately on my arrival in the House I acquainted the Chair with my presence here—in ample time to protect my right to vote, as appears from the fact that the result of the roll call is still unannounced.

Mr. BROMWELL. You were not present at the time your name was called. I have made a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. I wish to understand how the gentleman from New York has the right to vote "yea" on that question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In announcing the vote, which has not as yet been done, the gentleman would have been announced among others as "present." That being done, the gentleman from New York would be entitled to vote. Perhaps he was not entitled at the time to do that; and if the gentleman objects to it, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAHANY] will be, for the time being, noted as "present."

Mr. BROMWELL. I do object to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this question the yeas are 133, the nays 25, answering "present" 16; noted as present, Mr. BELL, Mr. NEWLANDS, Mr. GAINES, Mr. DAVIS, Mr. KNOX, Mr. DAYTON, Mr. MAHANY, and Mr. BABCOCK.

Mr. MAHANY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to vote now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Those additional to the 16 responding "present" and the 8 noted as present being 182 present. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MAHANY] states that he desires to vote.

Mr. MAHANY. I do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the name of the gentleman from New York.

The name of Mr. MAHANY was called, and he voted "yea."

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would like to vote, Mr. Speaker.

The name of Mr. NEWLANDS was called, and he voted "yea."

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The name of Mr. BELL was called, and he voted "yea."

Mr. CONNOLLY. I would like to know if I am recorded as voting?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is recorded in the affirmative. The aggregate vote stands yeas 136, nays 25; and a quorum being present, the yeas have it, and the bill is passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4583. An act for the relief of the estate of Abel Adams, deceased:

S. 4812. An act to pay J. and W. Seligman & Co. the sum of $1,794.56 for certain coupons detached from United States bonds, which said coupons were lost on the Cunard steamship Oregon, sunk at sea March 14, 1886;

S. 4807. An act directing the issue of duplicate of lost check drawn by C. C. Sniffen, major, United States Army, in favor of Fourth National Bank, New York City; and

S. 4717. An act authorizing the use of typewriting machines for the recording of deeds and other instruments of writing in the office of the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4810) to increase the efficiency of the Subsistence Department of the Army, had agreed to a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. CARTER, and Mr. COCKRELL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4809) to increase the efficiency of the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, had agreed to a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. CARTER, and Mr. COCKRELL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill

(S. 4571) to extend Rhode Island avenue, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HANSBROUGH, Mr. McMILLAN, and Mr. MARTIN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

- H. R. 369. An act for the relief of Benjamin S. Barnes;
 - H. R. 6897. An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes;
 - H. R. 3897. An act for the relief of Martha E. Fleschert;
 - H. R. 10585. An act designating Titusville, Crawford County, Pa., a port of delivery in the customs collection district of Erie, Pa.; and
 - H. R. 1004. An act for the relief of Theodore F. Swayze, administrator de bonis non of the estate of John S. P. Wheeler, deceased.
- The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:
- S. 4756. An act for the relief of Michael McNulty;
 - S. 3144. An act for the relief of Finetta Nalle;

MILITARY SECRETARY TO THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I want to call up the bill (S. 4742) providing for the appointment of a military secretary to the Secretary of War.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to select a person whom he may consider to be especially well qualified for the performance of the duties of the office by reason of long and faithful service in the War Department, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint him in the Army to be military secretary to the Secretary of War, who shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a major, and who shall perform such duties in the Department of War as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War or may be required by law: Provided, however, That when said office shall once have been filled and become vacant through death, resignation, or retirement, the provisions of this bill shall thereupon become null and void.

Mr. BAILEY. May I ask the chairman of the committee if this bill proposes to continue the office beyond the war, until death, resignation, or retirement?

Mr. HULL. It does. I will say that there are two bills that the Secretary of War has urged the committee to take up. One was for the creation of the office of Second Assistant Secretary of War, to last for the war, and the other is for the position of military secretary. His letter transmitting the latter bill to the committee was written on the 17th day of May. The committee considered it for some time, reported it some time ago, and the Senate passed the bill with this other limitation, making him a major, the office to be filled but once, and then the office to cease to exist.

It is the Senate bill we have taken up. I have only the statement of the Secretary of War that he is exceedingly anxious for it to pass. My impression is that, when it is passed and been filled once, if this man who holds the office should live a long time, it would be difficult to get the requirements for the next man in the place, as he must be a man "especially well qualified for the performance of the duties of the office by reason of long and faithful service in the War Department." I now yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I think—

Mr. BERRY. Will the gentleman from Virginia allow me? Has the man already been selected; and, if so, how old is he?

Mr. HAY. I do not know the gentleman's name who is picked out to occupy the office, and therefore I can not say how old he is.

Mr. GAINES. Then some particular man has been picked out already?

Mr. HAY. I understand so. The point I make in the bill is that it creates a new office, and creates it in the interest of one man. Now, I think we have gone far enough in creating an office, as we did to-day, for one man, and I do not think it is a wise thing to bring these measures up during the war which could not by any possibility pass if there was not a war pending.

Here we are asked to make offices for gentlemen who are about to retire, or who are getting too old, or of that age where they want some sinecure where they will have nothing to do. That is not what we are here for. We are here for the purpose of passing measures of urgent importance for the successful conduct of this war, and I do not think it is right to bring up measures of this kind at this time. I do not believe that it can be sustained upon any sort of argument that these measures creating offices, permanent offices, should be passed now under the stress of war measures.

If there is no quorum present, the burden is placed upon some gentleman on this floor to make the point of no quorum, and in that way try to get rid of the bill. For my part I shall not make any such point. I shall not obstruct the passage of any of these bills by any dilatory motion of that sort, because I believe there are other bills that the chairman of the committee has of more importance that ought to be considered at once. I do not think such bills as this should be thrown in until the others are disposed of.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman suggest what other bill the committee has that ought to be taken up before this?

Mr. HAY. It is not for me to suggest to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I now ask for the reading of the letter of the Secretary of War.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, May 17, 1898.

DEAR MR. HULL: I have found the need ever since I have been in the Department of an officer to assist me in the dispatch of business, and this in addition to the Assistant Secretary of War now provided by law. The officer needed should have a thorough knowledge of the business of the Department by reason of ability and long experience, in order that the work may not only be transacted expeditiously but with the greatest accuracy, and legislation is needed to provide for such an officer permanently. Accordingly I would suggest that this object may be accomplished by an enactment as follows:

"That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to select a person whom he may consider to be especially well qualified for the performance of the duties of the office by reason of long and faithful service in the War Department, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint him in the Army to be military secretary to the Secretary of War, who shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a lieutenant-colonel, and who shall perform such duties in the Department of War as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War, or may be required by law."

This will secure to the Government the services of a competent adviser, one who from long experience is fully informed of the laws, regulations, and customs of the War Department, and has rendered important service in the administration of its affairs and in the simplification of its business methods, by which great economy has resulted in many ways.

The benefit to the Government is apparent. The public business should be transacted with speed and accuracy, and this is especially true when the need of dispatch is the greatest.

The creation of the office is necessary, for the business required to be performed by the Secretary of War is constantly increasing in magnitude.

There are many questions coming before the Secretary which do not pertain especially to any bureau of the Department. To properly dispose of such questions reliance is had upon the usual course of procedure in the office of the Secretary, and hence the need of an officer possessing the requisite information.

I have written you thus informally thinking that there may be some bill in process of formation in which the proposed legislation may be ingrafted and the needs of the Department speedily relieved.

Very truly, yours,

R. A. ALGER, Secretary of War.

Hon. JOHN A. T. HULL,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

Mr. HAY. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if it is not a fact that no such office as this existed during the civil war?

Mr. HULL. I think that is true. I think the Secretary of War had a military secretary that was detailed.

Mr. GAINES. Is not he there now and ready to work every day?

Mr. HULL. I suppose he has all the officers there detailed. What they do and what their duties are I do not know.

Mr. OTEY. Does the chairman know who is to be appointed under this bill?

Mr. HULL. The chairman has an idea.

Mr. OTEY. Will he state to the House who it is?

Mr. HULL. I never heard the President say a word as to who he was to appoint, and the appointment lies with him.

Mr. OTEY. Let us into the secret.

Mr. HULL. The chief clerk of the Department is Mr. Tweedale, who has been there many years, and my impression is that if the office is created he would fill the description set out in the bill.

Mr. GAINES. He is there filling the bill now, is he not?

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to ask if the chief clerk now holds a position in the Army?

Mr. HULL. No.

Mr. BAILEY. Then this bill makes him an officer in the Army, gives him rank and pay and gives him the benefit of the law in regard to retirement, without having served one hour in the military service of the Government.

Mr. HULL. I do not know whether he has ever served in the Army or not. My friend from Indiana says that he has. All I can say is that he is not in the military service now.

Mr. BAILEY. If he has served heretofore, he is entitled to whatever benefits accrued from that service; but here you propose to take him from civil life and make him a lieutenant-colonel—

Mr. HULL. The Senate bill makes him a major.

Mr. BAILEY. Whether it be a major or a lieutenant-colonel, he is taken from civil life, is promoted over men educated at West Point, who have spent years in the service, who are fighting now the battles of the country in Cuba, and you create an easy place for him now and retire him hereafter.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

Mr. GAINES. I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa one question. Does he think the public welfare requires the creation of this office?

Mr. HULL. I think the Secretary of War is more competent to answer that question than I am, and he says it does.

Mr. GAINES. I ask the gentleman's honest opinion.

Mr. HULL. Assuming that the Secretary of War understands the duties of his office and the needs of the public service, I should say the creation of this office is required, because the Secretary of War has said so in writing two or three times.

Mr. GAINES. The gentleman could have said "yes" or "no." What I wanted was his personal opinion—not what the Secretary of War had said.

Mr. HULL. I have answered this as I have all other questions of administration.

The question being taken on ordering the bill to a third reading, it was decided in the negative.

SECOND ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. HULL. I now want to call up the bill which was before the House a little while ago, providing for a Second Assistant Secretary of War—Senate bill No. 4678. This is purely a war measure. I call for the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Has this bill been reported by the committee?

Mr. HULL. It has been—that is to say, the committee instructed me to call up this bill in lieu of the House bill which they had reported. The bill was considered by the House this morning and temporarily withdrawn.

Mr. COX. Let us understand what the report of the committee is.

Mr. HAY. The committee reported a House bill, and, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] has stated, he was authorized to call up the Senate bill in place of the House bill, the two being the same.

A MEMBER. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. HAY. It is not.

Mr. HULL. I believe the gentleman from Virginia voted against the bill in committee; but this is one of his "temporary" measures.

Mr. HAY. I do not think the gentleman can properly claim that this is a "temporary" war measure. When the bill was brought up this morning and read at the Clerk's desk, I pointed out the fact that there was no necessity for its passage; that we went through the civil war with only one Assistant Secretary of War.

A MEMBER. We had a Stanton then.

Another MEMBER. And we have an Alger now.

Mr. HULL. Let the bill be read.

The bill (S. 4678) providing for a Second Assistant Secretary of War was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be in the Department of War, during the existing war, a Second Assistant Secretary of War, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be entitled to a salary of $4,000 a year, payable monthly, and who shall perform such duties in the Department of War as shall be prescribed by the Secretary or may be required by law.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken on this bill I wish to point out the fact that it is an entirely unnecessary measure. It provides for the creation of an office for somebody—I do not know who.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I believe that if we are to trust the statement of the Secretary of War at all, this bill ought to pass. During the civil war there were sometimes more than two Assistant Secretaries of War. I am informed by officers of the War Department in private conversation that there were at one time three assistants. I know that once, for quite a while, they had an Assistant Secretary of War in the office and Mr. Dana in the field.

Mr. HAY. Was not Mr. Dana the Assistant Secretary of War, and did not other persons act in that capacity only temporarily?

Mr. HULL. He was one of the Assistant Secretaries.

Mr. HAY. I should like the gentleman to name any other.

Mr. HULL. Well, I have not looked the matter up.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Peter H. Watson was one; he was duly appointed an Assistant Secretary of War.

Mr. DALZELL. Thomas A. Scott was another.

Mr. HULL. I know that Mr. Scott was an Assistant Secretary of War at the same time that Mr. Dana was.

We have in the present war large transportation which we did not have in the civil war. Our ships are being sent to the different islands of the nation we are fighting. The duties of the Secretary of War have in this manner been multiplied beyond what they were even in the civil war, and require from him a more extended line of ability. The civil war was fought on our own soil, at our own home, while this war has extended to Cuba, to the Philippines, and, if the war continues, will be extended to Puerto Rico, and, as a gentleman near me suggests, even to Spain. We are obliged to provide great fleets. Large transportation is required by land and water; and if we can believe the Secretary of War, this assistant is required.

Mr. Speaker, another thing: The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] and others on that side of the House have said that wherever and whenever it is necessary to provide officers, men, or supplies for the present war, and during the continuance of the war only, they will join in giving the War Department such support, if the Secretary of War says that the Government must have it. If that is true, here is an office that complies strictly with the description that I understand the gentleman is willing to concede. It is an office created for the war only and for emergency purposes. It is of a temporary character, and not permanent. It is asked for by the great War Department of the Government and in a case of emergency. The Congress of the United States is notified that it is necessary and that the creation of the office is essential for the proper working of the Department.

I will say further, Mr. Speaker, that the Secretary of War stated to me within the last few days—and he would have put it in writing if necessary, and I may state it, as it appears in the House report accompanying some of these bills—that they frequently had to work at night to 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning in order to get through with the business which is pressing upon that Department under the present condition. He stated that he had left the Department the night before at half past 12 o'clock, and the work of the Assistant Secretary of War was still pressing; and that he had to work early and late. In view of these conditions the Secretary thought proper to ask for the appointment of this additional officer.

Now, I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the House will grant this additional appointment, in view of the urgency of the occasion and the statement of the Secretary of War that he absolutely needs the assistance.

I yield to the gentleman from Virginia such time as he may desire.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to rest quietly under the charge of insincerity in reference to the conduct of any of the bills on the floor of the House such as the gentleman from Iowa has intimated. I try to be always consistent in my actions in this body. Now, I did not say, and I never have said, that I would vote for any temporary bill which might be presented by the Committee on Military Affairs, if, in my judgment, I did not regard the bill as necessary.

How one man can relieve all of the additional pressure which the war has brought upon the Department, to which the gentleman refers, I do not understand. We are to keep an officer there, as the gentleman says, for the purpose of looking after the transportation of the Army. But at the same time we are informed that this service will carry him all over the country where transportation is to be had or where it is necessary. Now, how one man is to accomplish all of this is a question.

I ask the gentleman if he has got any idea, in this connection, as to who the man proposed to be provided for by this bill is?

Mr. HULL. I will state to the gentleman from Virginia very candidly that I do not know. I have not consulted with reference to anybody in this matter, and I neither know nor care who he may be.

Mr. HAY. I did not suppose, of course, that the gentleman was positively aware of who would be the appointee, but I thought he might have an idea. I understand—

Mr. MARSH. Do you know who he is to be?

Mr. HAY. I do not.

Mr. ARNOLD. The House does not confirm him, at all events.

Mr. HAY. I understand that. But when the bill goes through the House, he can be nominated and appointed.

Mr. LENTZ. Why not use the storekeeper for this purpose, who has recently been appointed? [Laughter.]

Mr. HAY. I should say that he might be appointed for this purpose, and might possibly relieve some of the pressure brought to bear now upon the War Department. If one man can relieve this pressure, he will probably be as good as any other. You have already made provision for him, and here is a plan to utilize him.

But, Mr. Speaker, in all earnestness, I ask gentlemen on both sides of the House whether or not it is necessary to have an office established which was never asked for before in time of war, when we were dealing with five times the number of men than we have to deal with now, and when a part of the transportation spoken of by the gentleman from Iowa is controlled, as we all know, by the Navy, and only a part of it by the Army. I simply want, if I can, to guard, as far as possible, against going into unnecessary expenses and appointing any more unnecessary officers.

I trust the House will vote down the bill. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question was taken on the third reading of the bill; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HAY) there were—ayes 50, noes 62.

So the House refused to order the bill to a third reading.

DAILY ARMY RATIONS.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 10686) to increase the daily army rations.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the daily army ration now provided by law shall be increased by the addition thereto of one-quarter of a pound of American cheese.

Mr. HULL. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GRIFFIN] such time as he may desire.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, my opinion is that the reading of the report accompanying the bill will enable the House to have a better understanding of the purposes of the bill than any statement which can be made in connection with it. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. GRIFFIN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10686) to increase the daily army ration, having had the same under consideration, would respectfully report thereon as follows:

The committee recommend that the bill be amended by inserting, in line 4 of the printed bill, after the word "thereto," the word "triweekly;" also by inserting, after the word "of," in line 5, the words "full cream;" also by adding, at the end of line 5, after the word "cheese," the words "and also 2 ounces of canned corn;" so that the bill when thus amended will read as follows:

"That the daily army ration now provided by law shall be increased by the addition thereto triweekly of one-quarter of a pound of full cream American cheese, and also 2 ounces of canned corn."

The Commissary-General of Subsistence, in a communication addressed on the 17th instant to the honorable Secretary of War, and by that officer transmitted to your committee, expressed his views concerning the advisability of adding cheese to the army ration, as follows:

"The mistake was made in the late war of the rebellion of increasing by law the bulk of actual food materials which was to be carried into the field and issued out daily for the subsistence of the soldier in the ranks. This addition largely increased the amount of transportation which was necessary to be provided, and consequently the cost of the Quartermaster's branch of the service was augmented. As a matter of fact, this legislative increase of the bulk of food materials to be carried into the field was unnecessary, as was conclusively shown in an inquiry instituted by Hon. Henry Wilson, chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, on March 8, 1864.

"The restoration of the ration to what it was on July 1, 1861, was thereupon directed by law (see section 2, act June 20, 1864, 13 Stat. L. 144), and in its essential constituents it remains the same to-day. To forcibly increase the bulk by law to-day would only be to repeat the error of 1861. The article which is proposed to be added is cheese. This article has been used experimentally in the Army. In 1878 it was made a part of the ration of troops traveling upon cars or transports, or in the field, when it was impracticable to cook rations.

"The quantity to be issued with each ration was increased in 1870. This travel ration was used principally by recruits traveling to join their companies. From reports received during the three years in which it was on trial, an opinion was found to exist unfavorable to its continuance. It was accordingly dropped from the supply table as a regular article of the soldier's diet; but it has been, and is now, kept on hand for sale to officers and enlisted men (including the company messes of enlisted men, by whom it can be purchased from company savings when wanted)."

The foregoing observations of the Commissary-General were submitted prior to the committee's action on the bill whereby the amendment relating to canned corn was adopted; hence no departmental opinion has been procured concerning that amendment.

Your committee submit that so far as the increase of the bulk of actual food materials proposed by this bill may add to the amount of transportation which may of necessity have to be provided, and the consequent augmentation of the cost of the quartermaster's branch of the service is concerned, it is of but little moment if the comfort or living of the enlisted men of the Army shall thereby be improved.

Whatever may have been the experience during the civil war or the results disclosed by the investigation referred to, it is a well-known and indisputable fact that frequently it was impossible for the Government to furnish to the troops in the field the full ration provided by law. This is especially true as to the variety of different food products constituting the daily ration. The test referred to in the communication during the three years that cheese was issued as a travel ration, having been made principally by the issue of a cheese ration to recruits traveling to join their companies, should be regarded as of but little value, owing to the fact that recruits are usually very deficient with respect to the proper method of caring for themselves or making the best use of the rations issued to them. This knowledge can only be acquired by service and experience in the Army.

The controlling questions with reference to the advisability of adding cheese to the Army ration are:

First, as to its nutritive properties when compared with other foods now a part of the Army ration; and, secondly, as to its comparative bulk.

If upon a proper investigation it shall be made to appear that, for the same or a less quantity in bulk, cheese possesses greater nutritive properties than many other components of the army ration, the necessity for adding the same to the ration will be fully established.

The honorable Secretary of Agriculture, in a communication under date of 23d instant, replying to a request submitted to him by a member of your committee concerning the value of cheese as an article of food, gave his views as follows:

"A table showing the composition of cheese and various components of the Army ration is herewith inclosed. It will be seen that cheese is far ahead of other articles of food in amounts of the two most valuable food ingredients, viz, protein and fat. Compared to fresh beef, it contains two or three times as much protein and fat, and its fuel value, expressed by calories, is about twice as large. One pound of cheese is made from 10 pounds (5 quarts) of milk, and with the exception of milk sugar, which is lost in the whey, it contains practically all the nutritive matter of that quantity of milk. It is a highly concentrated, nutritious food, and, like meat, is rich in protein and should be balanced with carbonaceous foods, such as bread and potatoes.

"As to the digestibility and wholesomeness of cheese, would say, if sufficient care is exercised to procure a well-made, properly cured article, there should be no trouble on this account. Cheese selected should be firm, rich, of good flavor and keeping quality, and well ripened, as well as in convenient form for transportation. In some parts of Europe cheese of this description is the chief article of diet, being used largely in the place of meat. Statistics of the diet of public institutions show that the per capita consumption of cheese is highest where the dietaries are in charge of physicians, and this is an emphatic testimonial as to the value of cheese as a food from members of the medical profession.

"Few accurate experiments upon the digestibility of foods have been conducted, but the report of one investigator shows that old cheese required no more time for digestion than did hard-boiled or fried eggs, roasted fresh beef, or fresh bread. The milk fat of cheese is more easily digested than beef fat, and the casein of a well-cured cheese is partly broken down in the process of ripening and thus made readily digestible.

"The economy of using cheese need not be mentioned further than to say it can now be purchased for 6¢ to 7 cents per pound. Other special advantages of cheese as a part in the army ration are in the facts that it requires no special preparation for use, and there is no waste connected with its use. "I believe that good cheese, which can easily be obtained in our markets, would be most acceptable to the soldiers, and its addition to the army ration is recommended."

The following is the comparative table referred to in the honorable Secretary's letter:

Average composition of cheese and of various components of the army ration.

An analysis of this table shows that cheese, comparatively speaking, contains more nutrition than nearly every other component of the army ration. It surpasses all meats in the army ration, with the exception, perhaps, of smoked bacon.

In view of the fact that both chemical analysis and practical experiments by dietetic experts agree that cheese is a most healthy and nutritious article of food and known to be superior to good beef in its life-giving and strength-sustaining qualities and its well-known compact and convenient form for transportation, it is clearly established that it should have preference of many other articles now among the components of the army ration.

No purchase of cheese not having sufficient age should be made for army use. The improvements in cheese making which have occurred during the past twenty years, since it was last experimented with as an army ration, have been such as to overcome many of the objections which its use then developed. Cheese should not be rejected as an army ration because it involves a new departure. In transacting public business the disposition is too great to follow in a certain line or rut rather than to improve the service by boldly striking out for a more intelligent and beneficial system. There are many exceptions to this unfortunate rule, and hence your committee is of the opinion that cheese should not be discriminated against or the soldier deprived of its advantages as a part of the army ration solely because it is not now included therein.

An amendment has been recommended providing that the ration of cheese shall only be issued triweekly. As to the addition of canned corn, while it is not as nutritive as cheese, it may nevertheless serve a good purpose as a part of the ration, if issued in accordance with the amendments providing for its addition triweekly to the existing ration.

Your committee is of the opinion that both cheese and canned corn should be added to the army ration, and therefore recommend the adoption of the amendments set forth in this report, and that when so amended the bill do pass.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the various complaints that come from one source and another in reference to the food which is being furnished to the Army, it seems very proper that we should enter upon some beneficial reforms in reference to army rations as they are now provided by existing law.

The only question in reference to the bill is this: Is cheese desirable as a part of the army ration to be furnished to our soldiers? Many will say that the army ration now is sufficiently large and abundant. But, sir, I want to speak from experience when I say that the Government seldom furnishes a full army ration so that the enlisted man shall have his full portion.

There are times when they can not procure for the purpose of issuing to the Army all the component parts which constitute an army ration. Hence, the addition of cheese or the addition of canned corn triweekly, as this bill proposes, is not an overloading of the army ration beyond the limit at which it ought to be maintained. If, Mr. Speaker, we have up to this time omitted from the army ration an article of food which is more beneficial than many of the others, it is time and now is the hour when we ought to inaugurate a reform with reference to furnishing food for the Army.

It is true a test was made about twenty years ago with reference to the use of cheese as a part of the army ration, and that test satisfied some that it was not desirable to continue it as a part of the army ration; but upon unearthing the difficulty and the real facts concerning that test, it was found that the ration was used to supply recruits, green soldiers, on their way to join their command. Let me say to the House, Mr. Speaker, that there are two things in which the newly enlisted man is exceedingly deficient which one would naturally suppose he might be proficient in from the very outset.

Those are, first, the care of himself as an independent factor in the Army, and second, the proper care of his food. Hence I say that if that was the only test—and it seems to have been the only test made, as stated in the letter of the Commissary-General of Subsistence—the test was insufficient at that time. Furthermore, since that day great improvements have been made with reference to the manner of making cheese so far as its keeping qualities are concerned. So that the cheese made to-day is far ahead of the cheese made twenty years ago so far as being able to properly protect it in its transportation is concerned.

Again, experiments have been made with reference to the value of cheese as a food product in comparison with the other articles that constitute the army ration. The result of that experiment is that cheese is found to have more nutritive qualities than any other article of the army ration except smoked bacon. It is twice as valuable as good beefsteak. This fact being established, it would naturally follow that it is a useful article to add to the soldiers' ration. I may say that aside from bacon there is no component part of the army ration to which cheese is not far superior in its nutritive properties. That being the case, who shall say that we have not made a mistake in the past in continuing this old army ration so long without placing cheese at the disposal of the soldiers?

Mr. Speaker, I say that if this question were submitted to a vote of the enlisted men of the Army, every man would say, "Give me cheese as a part of the army ration." Those who have served in the Army at a time when the Government was unable to supply the food that soldiers required to maintain themselves properly will recall the fact that if they could have had cheese as a part of their ration it would have been a blessing. I am speaking from experience. How often have I seen a man cut a piece of raw fat pork, lay it on a piece of hard-tack, and apparently enjoy it better than any meal which can be furnished in any eating house in the city of Washington. And how much more would they have been pleased with a ration of cheese, rather than to have been obliged to eat with their hard-tack a piece of salt raw pork, as they were obliged to do.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I care not what the Commissary-General of Subsistence may say with reference to increasing the cost of transportation of the army ration if cheese and canned corn be added to it. If it is of benefit to the enlisted man in the Army, whatever the cost may be, it is our duty to afford him the opportunity of having cheese as a part of the army ration. This is an article which is condensed in form, 1 pound of cheese being equivalent to 5 pounds of milk. There is no other article of which I know in which you can find as much in the way of nutritive qualities in as small space or compass, or that will cost less in transportation and care, than the 4 ounces of cheese provided as a triweekly part of the ration. This being true, it possessing these superior qualities and properties, why should we hesitate to add it to the army ration?

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I desire to know how much time the gentleman from Delaware wishes?

Mr. HANDY. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that, having been recognized by the Chair, I am entitled to an hour. I propose to use a part of my time and then to yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN], who wishes to discuss this question.

Mr. OTEY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OTEY. Amendments can be offered to this bill, can they not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will pass upon that question when it comes up.

Mr. OTEY. That is what I want to know, when it is coming up, so I can be prepared.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Delaware at present has the floor.

Mr. HANDY. You will have time to prepare your amendment, I think, while the gentleman from Mississippi is speaking, if not before.

Mr. OTEY. My amendment is ready now.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Speaker, this bill is a matter of more than slight importance. It is, in the first place, of considerable financial moment to the Government, involving no small sum of money. If this bill is passed the Government of the United States will be required to buy for the Army now in the field 50,000 pounds of cheese three days in every week, making 150,000 pounds of cheese per week. It will cost to the Government of the United States at current prices between $4,000 and $6,000 every day when the cheese is bought. With this additional demand coming upon the market, cheese will probably rise very considerably in price, and it is almost impossible to tell with any accuracy what it will cost before the war is over. To furnish this proposed ration to 200,000 men for one year will require 7,800,000 pounds of cheese. This sudden and persistent demand for cheese will naturally force up the price.

Mr. SIMPSON. Is this cheese to be foreign or American?

Mr. HANDY. Full-cream American cheese.

Mr. HAY rose.

The SPEAKER. To which gentleman is the gentleman from Delaware yielding?

Mr. HANDY. The gentleman from Virginia is a member of the committee; I will yield to him first, and then I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HAY. I just want to ask the gentleman from Delaware if he knows it is a fact that the Commissary Department of the Government has reported against this bill?

Mr. HANDY. I do, and will call attention to it in a moment. Now I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SIMPSON. I was going to ask you, if we can make the foreigner pay the tax, why not have foreign cheese, and have the foreigner pay for the cheese?

Mr. HANDY. We will have to pay for the cheese, and doubtless a good round price at that. I would like to call the attention of the House to the present ration of the enlisted man, just what every soldier gets at the present time, under the law, to eat every day.

THE RATION.

A ration is the allowance for subsistence of one person for one day, and consists of the meat, the bread, the vegetable, the coffee and sugar, the seasoning, and soap and candle components.

The kinds and qualities of articles composing the ration for troops where cooking is practicable, and the quantities computed for 100 rations, are as follows:

Articles.	Quantities per ration.		Quantities per 100 rations.
	Ounces.	Gills.	Pounds.	Ounces.	Gallons.
Meat components.
Fresh beef.....	20	125
Or fresh mutton when the cost does not exceed that of beef.....	20	125
Or pork.....	12	75
Or bacon.....	12	75
Or salt beef.....	22	137	8
Or, when meat can not be furnished, dried fish.....	14	87	8
Or pickled fish.....	18	112	8
Or fresh fish.....	18	112	8
Bread components.
Flour.....	18	112	8
Or soft bread.....	18	112	8
Or hard bread.....	16	100
Or corn meal.....	20	125
Baking powder for troops in the field, when necessary to enable them to bake their own bread.....	4	4
Vegetable components.
Beans.....	22	13
Or peas.....	22	15
Or rice.....	12	10
Or hominy.....	12	10
Potatoes.....	16	100
Or potatoes, 12½ ounces, and onions, 3½ ounces.....	16	100
Or potatoes, 11½ ounces, and canned tomatoes, 44 ounces; or 44 ounces of other fresh vegetables not canned when they can be obtained in the vicinity of the post or transported in a wholesome condition from a distance.....	16	100
Coffee and sugar components.
Coffee, green.....	1½	10
Or roasted coffee.....	1½	8
Or tea, green or black.....	1½	15
Sugar.....	2½	15
Or molasses.....	1½	15
Or cane sirup.....	1½	15
Seasoning components.
Vinegar.....	4	4	1

Pepper, black.....	4	4
Soap and candle components.
Soap.....	4	4
Candles (when illuminating oil is not furnished by the Quartermaster's Department).....	1	1	8

In addition to this ration set forth in full in the table I have read, every soldier is given, under the act of June 16, 1890, 1 pound of fresh vegetables every day.

It is plain to see that our soldier is not starving by any means. The present ration of the soldier is ample. If he gets all the law allows him, the soldier of the United States gets enough to eat and a fair variety. Along comes this bill and proposes to impose upon the soldier a quarter of a pound of cheese three times a week. This cheese does not come in as an optional ration. It comes in as an additional ration. The soldier can have beef or mutton or pork or bacon, but under the provisions of this bill he must have cheese.

This astonishing request for a large and steady diet of cheese is not coming from the Army. I wish the members of the House to understand that and fix it firmly in memory. The Army is not coming in the condition pictured by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GRIFFIN], with uplifted hands, exclaiming by unanimous vote, "Oh, give us cheese!" Quite to the contrary, the body of men who are crying out in the ear of Congress for cheese to feed soldiers are more interested in selling cheese than in eating cheese. They are not in the Army. The Commissary-General speaks for the Army in the matter of its diet. He wrote to the Committee on Military Affairs, and he wrote in opposition to cheese. I will read you what he said. It is as follows:

The mistake was made in the late war of the rebellion of increasing by law the bulk of actual food materials which was to be carried into the field and issued out daily for the subsistence of the soldier in the ranks. This addition largely increased the amount of transportation which was necessary to be provided, and consequently the cost of the Quartermaster's branch of the service was augmented. As a matter of fact this legislative increase of the bulk of food materials to be carried into the field was unnecessary, as was conclusively shown in an inquiry instituted by Hon. Henry Wilson, chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, on March 8, 1864.

The restoration of the ration to what it was on July 1, 1861, was thereupon directed by law (see section 2, act June 20, 1864, 13 Stat. L., 144), and in its essential constituents it remains the same to-day. To forcibly increase the bulk by law to-day would only be to repeat the error of 1861. The article which it is proposed to be added is cheese. This article has been used experimentally in the Army. In 1878 it was made a part of the ration of troops traveling upon cars or transports, or in the field, when it was impracticable to cook rations. The quantity to be issued with each ration was increased in 1879.

This travel ration was used principally by recruits traveling to join their companies. From reports received during the three years in which it was on trial an opinion was found to exist unfavorable to its continuance. It was accordingly dropped from the supply table as a regular article of the soldier's diet, but it has been, and is now, kept on hand for sale to officers and enlisted men (including the company messes of enlisted men, by whom it can be purchased from company savings when wanted).

This letter argues, in the first place, that cheese is bulky and from a military reason it is not wise when you are sending troops into the field, and particularly when you are sending them to distant places, to increase the bulk of provender which they must carry along. It argues, in the second place, that cheese has been tried as a ration and proved undesirable, and that action had been taken against its use.

Mr. RIDGELY. I did not understand the word. Did you say "bulky" or "buggy?"

Mr. HANDY. "Bulky." The Commissary-General kindly omitted all reference to the bugs.

Mr. SIMPSON. The bugs will come later on.

Mr. HANDY. In reply to the Commissary-General, in the report of the committee of this House, we find a very funny argument. The committee says "the test referred to in the communication." That is the test referred to by the Commissary-General when he says that cheese proved itself undesirable as a regular article of the soldier's diet.

The test referred to in the communication during the three years that cheese was issued as a travel ration, having been made principally by the issue of a cheese ration to recruits traveling to join their companies, should be regarded as of but little value, owing to the fact that recruits are very deficient with respect to the proper method of caring for themselves or making the best use of the rations issued to them.

In other words, our committee says because this cheese was eaten largely by the recruits on entering the service and going to their companies—the recruits not yet having a regular army digestion, and not yet having that training which comes with the dangers of army life—that naturally cheese was not a fit thing for them and was too much for them to manage in their raw and jejune state.

But, according to our committee, after men are inured to battle, after they have gone through the hardships of the march, after they have been used to army diet, after they have been trained, reasoned, and disciplined to hardship, then they can tackle the cheese and masticate it with success and digest it. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Wisconsin made a long argument about how nourishing cheese is and how good it is, but a little experience will overcome and put to shame a whole world full of fine-spun theories. I have in my hand a copy of the New York Herald of this morning, and it contains an article on cheese. It is not a theoretical article, but a little news article. It gives a bit of experience from camp life. The headlines are "Troops made ill by eating cheese." It relates to an occurrence at Camp Alger.

Members of the Third New York had a most unpleasant experience last night. An uncle of Colonel Hoffman, of the Third, had sent a big cheese to Company L from Elmira, and the men made their supper from it.

This is not an ancient trial of cheese. It is a trial of to-day. It is a trial by the boys now in the field. They are brave boys from New York State. They are willing not only to fight for their country, but to face hidden dangers in behalf of the cheese makers of their native State. [Laughter.]

When the cheese makers selected a fine large cheese and sent it to the brave soldier boys, they volunteered without a dissenting word or the holding back of one timid man to tackle the cheese and dare fate to do her worst.

A quantity was also taken to the officers' quarters, where it was made into a Welch rarebit.

Our bold officers meet the dangers side by side with the men, only using a little more caution, for instead of eating the cheese raw they cooked it.

Now, what was the result?

Every member of Company L became ill an hour or two later, while one or two of the officers were also ill. The latter, however, escaped lightly, probably because the cheese was cooked.

Every member of the company, every one of the brave boys who sacrificed or put in peril his digestive apparatus for the sake of the suffering farmers and cheese makers in New York State felt the blow.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Let me say to the gentleman from Delaware that what they needed was a little beer with the cheese. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. Did they have any corn with it?

Mr. HANDY. I may get to the corn later. Well, Mr. Speaker, there was one gallant boy who just escaped being a hero.

One man of Company L was dangerously ill, but this morning all had recovered. The surgeon pronounced illness due to ptomaine poison.

He escaped as did the boys on the Merrimac, but, like them, he faced a great danger with heroic composure.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is not in the interest of the soldier. This bill is not asked for by the soldier. This bill is asked for by the men who manufacture cheese and want to sell cheese. I suppose the mental attitude of the cheese maker is something like this: Two hundred thousand men have enlisted to fight their country's battles. Two hundred thousand men have put on the uniform of the United States, and now they must obey the regulations of war. These cheese makers think, and their representatives on this floor reflect the thought, that these soldiers are in a position where they can not rebel against the imposition. So they have brought in a bill here which will require every mother's son of them to eat a quarter of a pound of cheese three times a week in order to rescue from the evils of dropping prices the cheese makers of the great State of New York. [Laughter.]

Well, Mr. Speaker, that is not fair; that is not according to the contract. When the men enlisted to fight their country's battles, they knew that they must go into the Tropics and face the insidious and deadly diseases; they knew that they must face the hurtling bullets of death; but they did not know that beyond the Tropics and the bullets they were to face another and cruel peril. It is not fair now and not according to the contract to stuff them with a third of a pound of cheese apiece three times a week. Many would doubtless survive the torture, but have gentlemen no mercy on those who might find the burden greater than they could bear?

Mr. SULZER. You have no dairy interests in the State of Delaware.

Mr. HANDY. I have a little dairy interest in my State; but I also have in my Congressional district, which covers the whole State, a whole regiment of soldiers. I believe I represent on this floor as many volunteers in the Army of the United States as any one Representative here, and, please God, I raise my voice in protest against making the gallant boys consume all the cheese that the cheese makers of New York may desire to force down their manly throats.

Mr. SULZER. Would you not amend the bill by putting peaches in the place of cheese? [Laughter.]

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Speaker, I confess that I should feel less opposition to the bill if it were peaches instead of cheese. It would be a much more sensible thing. These boys are going down into the Tropics; they are going where some more fruit added to their diet might be of use. Why send them to Cuba, why send them to far Manila, why send them into these tropical regions, and force them to a diet of cheese? If you want to send the water-melons of Georgia, the pineapples of Florida, or the peaches of Delaware to the soldiers, if you want to give them fruit, there would be some reason in it, but there is no sense nor rhyme nor reason in giving them large quantities of cheese.

There is not a man in this House who can not have cheese when he wants it. Every one of us is his own commissary department. For my part, I am fond of good cheese in due proportion and at proper times. I venture to say that neither I nor any other gentleman here ever eats 4 ounces of cheese three times a week. I venture to say there is not one free man in the United States, not under duress or restraint, who could be made, year in and year out, to eat 4 ounces of cheese three times a week. [Laughter.]

Ah, Mr. Speaker, we must do something, I suppose, for the constituents of our friends here who make cheese. How would it do to call out another hundred thousand men to face this additional danger? We have an army to attack Cuba; we have an army to go to Manila; we shall have an army to go to Puerto Rico; we may yet have an army to go to Spain. Let us also raise an army to attack this surplus cheese. Let men enlist knowing what they are going to do. Let the President issue a new call for 100,000 men—immunes, if you please, to the dangers of cheese. [Laughter.]

Let the President of the United States appoint all the officers. We will not raise the point any more that the governors of the States must appoint the officers. Have it your own way, gentlemen. Put these men in a cold country; put them near to drug stores; or, better still, put them alongside of some patent medicine factory, so that you can please and promote two interests at the same time—the cheese maker and the pill maker. Let them devote their whole energy and warlike zeal to eating the cheese that is manufactured in New York State. Let them sweep the country; and we shall have a cheese hero to put alongside of our naval and our military heroes who are winning imperishable renown on distant lands and seas.

Mr. Speaker, let us go into the thing right. Let us have a cheese secretary appointed with the rank of major to consult with the Secretary of War about these things. [Laughter.] Let us have a Third Assistant Secretary of War to attend to the inspection of the cheese.

A MEMBER. A secretary of cheese.

Mr. HANDY. Yes; a secretary of cheese, with the rank and pay of a Third Assistant Secretary of War, to go upon the retired list shortly.

A MEMBER. With the rank of rank cheese. [Laughter.]

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Speaker, while I am discussing this serious question these frivolous interruptions much upset my balance of mind [laughter]; for this is a great proposition; this is a patriotic proposition. I am not surprised that the Committee on Rules brought in a rule to devote these two days to the great military question of cheese, and others of similar import.

This is a war measure; it is a pressing measure. Doubtless the Democratic party is to be pitied that it has so degenerate a member as myself unpatriotic enough to stand here and orate against cheese. Ah, it surely shows great degeneracy in the Democratic party that any member of it should be opposed to this cheese scheme of gentlemen who have cheese factories in their districts.

Mr. Speaker, this is a sample of a good many things that we have seen and may yet expect to see in this war. It is a sample of interests quite other than patriotic, interests purely financial, striving to make the opportunity of this war an occasion, under the cloak of patriotism, for advancing themselves.

While we all talk patriotism, while we all want to be patriots, while we all fear that any attitude we take in opposition to proposed legislation may be used unjustly to our disadvantage, we are more or less timid. This is the golden opportunity to pass bills through Congress as full of snakes as any cage in the museum of natural history. In come such interests as these and under the cloak of patriotism appeal to us; and this appeal becomes—I do not like to use harsh terms and will not do so—a cloak of righteousness covering that which is not righteous.

Mr. Speaker, thanking the House for its attention, I yield to my distinguished friend from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN] such time as he may desire. [Applause.]

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to discuss this proposition to make cheese a part of the regular ration for the Army if I can be permitted to do so without being charged with a want of patriotism. I want to say a few words about the patriots and what constitutes patriotism. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, in his speech before the Republican convention of Ohio the other day, in speaking of those who do not train with the Republican party in this House, said:

And if you will notice the passage of the fifty-million war-emergency bill in Congress, it marks the last echo of patriotism of nine out of every ten of those gentlemen. They were willing to gain some sort of popularity before the people of the country by shouting about the suffering reconcentrados of Cuba. But when the money has been asked for the suffering soldiers of the Union, nine out of ten of them have voted "no" on every appropriation bill.

They were willing to demand that the President should send his Army and his ships to bombard Havana, but when they have been asked to raise the money to carry on the war, all but 6 of them in the House, and all but 8 of them in the Senate, voted "no" upon every proposition.

I have also noticed where the gentleman from Indiana [Mr.

OVERSTREET], the secretary of the Republican Congressional committee, in a carefully prepared interview published in the Washington Post on the 29th of May, among other reflections on the political organization to which I belong, said:

The Democratic leaders in Congress, who were so loud in their declamation for war and seemingly so patriotic in their determination, were really prompted by a desire to take advantage of the situation to foist their financial fallacies upon the country. The people have noticed that while the Democrats in Congress claimed a willingness to lay aside all partisanship for the purpose of aiding the Administration in conducting war against Spain, when it came to the test and a vote was required, voted almost unanimously against the resolution which authorized the President to take the initiative in the war and insisted upon recognizing the independence of Cuba, an act which events have demonstrated would have been disastrous, and voted against the necessary provisions to raise funds with which to carry on the war. At each step, instead of manifesting their cordial sympathy, which they had for nearly a year proclaimed, they insisted in bringing to the front plans for the "coinage of the seigniorage" in the Treasury, and the issue of greenbacks and other fallacies of finance, which shows clearly that they are more interested in continuing the effort for the success of the free silver cause than in maintaining the national honor and driving the Spaniards from the Cuban Island.

QUOTAS OF DEMOCRATIC STATES.

When the $50,000,000 appropriation was authorized a great number of Democrats took occasion to pledge the support of the people of their States for the aid of the nation, and in eloquent terms declare their intention to stand by the flag and furnish all the men necessary from their respective States. Our people have observed that in the call for volunteers there is hardly a State where Democratic Representatives so eloquently pledged their people to the cause that has furnished its quota under the call.

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, there was never a more unjust and baseless accusation brought against any political organization than the charge that the Democrats and Populists in this House had exhausted their patriotism when they voted for the first $50,000,000 appropriation. If ever a set of men "marched up to the rack, fodder or no fodder," patronage or no patronage, cheese or no cheese, and gave their unstinted support to an Administration opposed to them in politics, the Democrats and Populists of this House have done so in their support of the Administration in the conduct of this war.

We have believed, Mr. Speaker, that when our country is engaged in a war with Spain or any other foreign country we should forget all partisanship—forget, so far as measures necessary to successful conduct of the war are concerned, whether we are Democrats or Republicans, and only remember that we are American citizens. [Applause.]

And thus believing, we have stood here recognizing William McKinley as the President of our common country, and have given him and his Administration everything asked for. I do not believe that the history of this or any other country will show money as lavishly appropriated, with as few restrictions on its use, and with as little opposition from the political opponents of the Administration that was to expend it; and we have voted almost without question for every measure asked for by the Administration in aid of the successful prosecution of the war.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that most of us on this side of the House did vote against the proposition to issue bonds. There was more than $100,000,000 of unnecessary surplus in the Treasury; there was a large amount of silver seigniorage lying idle in the Treasury uncoined. We favored utilizing these resources of the Government first, and then, if more money should be needed, we favored issuing greenbacks or Treasury notes to carry on the war, but it was our vote against the bond issue that, with most Republicans, stamps us as unpatriotic.

I confess, Mr. Speaker, that in the minds of many gentlemen on that side of the House no man can be a patriot who does not stand for and vote for every proposition to issue bonds. Some gentlemen regard that as the very highest test of patriotism. Dewey, with his brave men, might be willing to go into what appeared to be the very jaws of death, as he did at Manila; or Hobson and his brave crew might exhibit their willingness to go to the bottom with the Merrimac; but neither of them would be patriots in the eyes of some people unless they favored every proposition to issue bonds.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether the proposition to issue cheese will be made a test of loyalty or not, but I hesitate now to raise my voice against the addition of cheese to the regular army ration lest I be accused of a want of patriotism. But being an old and experienced soldier and having had much experience with rations and the want of them [laughter], I might be permitted to express some opinion on this subject. I want to say that my experience was with the rations issued to an army that, judged by its achievements, was as good as the world ever saw. And when I look over the bill of fare now issued as the rations to our soldiers, I can but think of what a banquetting feast it would have been to the soldiers who made such a reputation for soldierly qualities on both sides in this nation thirty-five years ago. Just listen to this bill of fare. This is the daily ration now required by law to be furnished the soldiers:

THE RATION.

A ration is the allowance for subsistence of one person for one day, and consists of the meat, the bread, the vegetable, the coffee and sugar, the seasoning, and the soap and candle components. (Paragraph 1251, Army Regulations, 1895.) See also paragraph 1258, ibid:

Why, Mr. Speaker, when I was a soldier, this ration cooked, as we knew how to cook, would have furnished a feast more tempting than any that could be set before me now by Delmonico. It is admitted the Commissary Department is opposed to adding the cheese ration. My understanding is the regular soldiers are well satisfied with the present ration. If there are complaints from the volunteers who are unaccustomed to the hardships of war, I think they will cease when they become inured to camp life.

I am willing to do everything necessary for the good and comfort of our soldiers. But if you want good soldiers, you do not want to coddle them too much. You hear a great deal of talk about "hard-tack" and "sow belly," but I have not been real hungry since the war that I did not crave hard-tack and bacon.

Why, Mr. Speaker, a man with a good appetite who is really hungry, who can get some hard-tack or baker's bread and a piece of bacon, put a stick through it, hold it over the fire and broil it, and drip the grease on his bread and eat it has what is to me a very good repast, if he can get enough of it. When I get hungry, as I have many a time, I think much more about broiled or fried bacon and bread than I do about terrapin and champagne or lobster a la Newberger or punch a la Romaine. [Laughter and applause.]

Why, sir, last year I bought a few boxes of hard-tack and took them down to some of my old Confederate friends just as a reminder of old times. [Laughter.] I do not want our soldiers confined to hard-tack and bacon, but you see by this bill of fare they are not confined to it. You do not want to overdo this thing and get your ration too big. Our Army is not going out just for the purpose of eating. [Laughter and applause.] They have other business in hand to which they will properly attend if you will give them a reasonable amount of food and a chance to fight.

Look at the Regular Army, who have been furnished with the rations now prescribed by law. You will not see a finer, healthier, or hardier set of men anywhere. They have plenty of such things as experience has demonstrated were best for them. Let the Government see that the contractors do not swindle them in the quality of the food furnished. I doubt very much if this proposition to furnish cheese is made as much in the interest of the soldiers as it is in the interest of the people who have cheese for sale.

Mr. Speaker, so far as I am individually concerned and those who cooperate with me in this House, we want to give to the Administration every possible facility for the proper conduct of this war. I do not believe there will be found on either side of this House anyone voting to obstruct a successful prosecution of this war; it should not be a partisan war.

I do not believe any party would attempt, for partisan purposes, to hamper or impede the Administration in the conduct of this war, and I for one enter my protest against the efforts which have been or may hereafter be made to make political capital in favor of or against any political party, especially when there is no more ground for it than exists up to this time.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say to my Republican friends, let us lay aside our bickerings and contentions until we have "licked" the Spaniards [applause], and then we can resume our partisan quarrels and fight it out before the American people. [Applause.] In the face of a common enemy let us put efforts for partisan advantage behind us. I do not intend that any of you shall display any more patriotism than I or my people.

It will be seen that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], who seems to have felt he had discharged his duty to the country when he delivered his interview against the Democratic party, and who, I believe, has ever since been absent from his seat, took occasion to reflect on the patriotism of some of our States by saying they had not at that time furnished their quota of troops. I think the States have been remarkably prompt in supplying the troops called for.

But I want to call attention to the fact that in most of our Southern States conditions are very different from those in which most of you reside. In my own State the majority of our population is colored. The call having been made in the States according to population, and no call for colored troops from the State, has left our quota to be filled from the whites. Besides, we have no surplus population. The war found our people all at work; most of them are farmers; they had commenced their crops, and it is a more serious problem for a man dependent on his work to give up his job or his crop than one who has nothing to do.

They doubted if their services would be needed, for they did not believe that with our 75,000,000 of the greatest people on the face of the earth, with our unlimited resources and unlimited credit, with our 4 per cent bonds worth $1.20 on the dollar, that a nation like Spain, incomparably our inferior in numbers, in wealth, in intelligence, and in all the attributes that make good soldiers, with her 4 per cent bonds worth 30 cents on the dollar, one-fourth of what ours are worth—they did not think it could be much of a war, and that it would necessarily soon be over.

And if they did not go as readily as some others, under these conditions, our quotas have been filled reasonably fast, and you will find that when it comes to fighting, the troops from no State in this Union will show more courage or do better fighting than the Mississippians. They will go where ordered, and I am willing for the patriotism of my section to be tested by the way they discharge their duties as soldiers rather than by whether their Representative votes for or against bond issues or for or against the cheese ration. [Laughter.]

I notice the gentleman from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, when called down by an editorial in the Washington Post about his speech, to which I have already referred, in a card in answer to that editorial threatened at some later day to furnish a catalogue of the crimes or votes of the Democrats as evidencing their want of patriotism in connection with the prosecution of the war. I suppose these charges will be chucked into the RECORD just about time of adjournment to be used for campaign purposes, and I suppose those of us who vote against this proposition to furnish a market for the cheese makers will be held up as obstructing the successful prosecution of the war, and it may be that the secretary of the Congressional Republican committee will supplement his charges against the Democratic party with this accusation. But, Mr. Speaker, I am going now to make a proposition that I think is a better test of fervent patriotism than a vote for or against bonds or a vote for or against cheese, and I make it in the most perfect good faith. It is understood we are going to adjourn in a few days. I am willing to head the list of a company of Congressmen to be commanded by General GROSVENOR [applause] to start from here and go down to Cuba and join Teddy Roosevelt's Rough Riders right at the front. [Applause.]

A MEMBER (on the Democratic side). Cheese or no cheese.
